TILLING (LIMITED) v. BLYTHE. (a.)

Practice—Receiver—Equitable execution—Summons for appointment of receiver—Personal service—Ord. 67, rr. 4, 5.

Where the defendant has not entered an appearance to the writ in the action, a summons for the appointment of a receiver cannot be served upon him by filing it at the Central Office under ord. 67, r. 4, but must be served personally, or an order obtained for substituted service.

Appeal from Ridley, J., at chambers.

The plaintiffs recovered judgment against the defendant upon default of appearance for a sum of money, and applied ex parte to the judge at chambers for the appointment of a receiver, by way of equitable execution, of the defendant's reversionary interest in certain property. The judge, however, refused to make the order ex parte.

The plaintiffs accordingly took out a summons for the appointment of a receiver, and served it by filing it at the Central Office in accordance with ord. 67, r. 4, and upon the summons coming on for hearing the defendant did not appear. Ridley, J., made the order asked for, but upon the order being taken to the Central Office the officer refused to draw it up upon the ground that the summons had not been personally served. The plaintiffs thereupon applied again to Ridley, J., at chambers, when a memorandum, setting out the practice at the Central Office in such matters, was laid before him, and he held in accordance therewith that the summons for the appointment of a receiver must be served personally, and he rescinded his order.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Morton Smith, for the plaintiffs.—The defendant not having entered an appearance to the writ in the action, ord. 67, r. 4, provides that all writs, notices, pleadings, orders, summonses, warrants, and other documents, proceedings, and written communications in respect of which personal service is not requisite may be served by filing them with the proper officer. There is no rule requiring a summons for the appointment of a receiver to be served personally. Ord. 50, r. 15A, and following rules relate to the appointment of a receiver, and there is nothing in them requiring personal service. In Dymond v. Croft, 24 W. R. 700, 3 Ch. D. 512, at p. 514, a notice of motion for judgment where the defendant did not appear was held to be properly served by filing it with the proper officer; and in Evans v. Noton, 41 W. R. 230, [1893] 1 Ch. 252, it was held that a notice of motion for leave to issue a writ of attachment was properly served by filing it in the same way. The service of the summons was therefore properly effected.

The defendant did not appear.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—In my opinion the decision of Ridley, J., was right. At first the application for the appointment of a receiver was made ex parte, but the learned judge very properly refused to make an order upon such an application. Formerly at common law chambers an order for a receiver was obtained very easily upon an ex parte application. It was then laid down in this court, more particularly by Lindley, L.J. (see Lucas v. Harris, 35 W. R. 112, 18 Q. B. D. 127, and In re Potts, Ex parte Taylor, 41 W. R. 337, [1893] 1 Q. B. 648), that such an order should not be made ex parte, except in a case of emergency. The meaning of that is that an order appointing a receiver should not be made except upon notice to the other party, so as to give him the opportunity of appearing and contesting it. It is said that the rules relating to receivers do not require personal service. It is, however, pointed out by Collins, L.J., that ord. 67, r. 5, contemplates the necessity for personal service in cases other than those in which it is specifically required by the rules, for that rule speaks of personal service being "required by these rules or otherwise." It seems to me that this is one of those cases in which personal service is required. I do not think that the plaintiffs will have much difficulty in serving the defendant because they know where he lives, but if they are unable to do so, they can then apply for an order for substituted service.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

Appeal dismissed.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Lawrance and Channell, JJ.) on an appeal from the Westminister County Court.

The action was commenced in the High Court to recover £73 8s. 3d. for goods sold and delivered. On an application by the plaintiff under order 14, the defendants stated that they desired to set up a counterclaim. The master made an order giving the plaintiff leave to sign final judgment for £53 8s. 3d., and giving the defendants leave to defend as to the balance of £20, and directing the action to be tried in the Westminster County Court under section 65 of the County Courts Act, 1888. The order gave no directions as to costs. At the trial in the county court, judgment was given for the plaintiff for £20 on the claim, with costs, and for the defendants for £13 upon the counterclaim, with costs.

The question was whether the plaintiff's costs in respect of the proceedings subsequent to the master's order ought to be taxed upon the county court scale A, the scale applicable where the sum recovered exceeds £10 and does not exceed £20, or upon the county court scale C, the scale applicable where the sum recovered exceeds £50. The registrar of the county court taxed the said costs upon scale A.

The county court judge and the Divisional Court, following the case of Bailey v. Watson & Co., [1898] 2 Q. B. 270, 46 W. R. Dig. 40, affirmed the decision of the registrar.

The plaintiff appealed.

Hansell, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff has recovered over £50 in the action, and he is therefore entitled to have his costs subsequent to the master's order taxed upon scale C. The case is governed by Keeble v. Bennett, 42 W. R. 539, [1894] 2 Q. B. 329.

Eldridge, for the defendants.—The plaintiff's claim, so far as regards £53 8s. 3d., was finally disposed of by the judgment under order 14. The only part of the action which was remitted to the county court was the claim to the balance, and in the county court the plaintiff only recovered £20. He is therefore only entitled to have his costs taxed upon scale A.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The county court judge and the judges of the Divisional Court decided this case on the assumption that they were bound by Bailey v. Watson & Co. The action was commenced by a writ indorsed with a claim for £73 8s. 3d. The plaintiff took out a summons under order 14, and was successful up to the amount of £53 8s. 3d., but as to the residue of £20 he was unsuccessful, and the action was remitted to the county court under section 65 of the County Courts Act. In the county court the plaintiff succeeded in obtaining judgment for £20. He therefore recovered in the action £73 8s. 3d. I am clearly of opinion that, when the case was remitted to the county court, the action was not cut into two. It is not right to say that the action as to £53 8s. 3d. remained a High Court action, and as to £20 became a county court action. Section 65 of the County Courts Act says that "where in any action of contract brought in the High Court the claim indorsed on the writ does not exceed one hundred pounds"—that is this case—"it shall be lawful for either party . . . to apply to a judge of the High Court at chambers to order such action"—not a part of the action, but such action—"to be tried in" a county court. And the section proceeds to say that "thereupon the plaintiff shall lodge the original writ and the order with the registrar" of the county court, "and the action and all proceedings therein shall be tried and taken in such court as if the action had been originally commenced therein." It is clear, therefore, that the whole action goes down to the county court. "And the costs of the parties in respect of proceedings subsequent to the order of the judge of the High Court shall be allowed according to the scale of costs for the time being in use in the county court." Here the plaintiff recovered in the action £73 8s. 3d., the whole of the sum indorsed on the writ. He is therefore entitled to have his costs taxed upon scale C, the scale applicable where the sum recovered exceeds £50. I think that Keeble v. Bennett was rightly decided. As to Bailey v. Watson & Co., I cannot see any difference between it and Keeble v. Bennett, and I think that it cannot be supported.

PRICE v. MARSDEN & SONS. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accidental injuries—Amount of compensation—Average weekly earnings—"If he has been so long employed"—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), Schedule I., 1 (b).

The words "if he has been so long employed" in Schedule I., 1 (b), to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, mean "if he has been so long employed by the same employer," and not "if he has been so long employed in the same grade of employment."

Appeal from the decision of the judge of the Bolton County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The claim to compensation was made by a workman who at the time of the accident had been in the employment of his employers as a factory hand for more than three years. Prior to the 9th of September, 1898, he was employed as a little-piecer, earning wages at 9s. 6d. a week. On that day he was promoted to be a side-piecer, earning wages at 13s. 8d. a week. The accident happened on the 28th of September. The question was as to the amount of compensation to which the applicant was entitled under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

By the First Schedule, s. 1, "The amount of compensation under this Act shall be . . . (b) where total or partial incapacity for work results from the injury, a weekly payment during the incapacity after the second week not exceeding 50 per cent. of his average weekly earnings during the previous twelve months, if he has been so long employed, but if not, then for any less period during which he has been in the employment of the same employer, such weekly payment not to exceed one pound."

The county court judge calculated 9s. 6d. a week for 49 weeks and 13s. 8d. a week for three weeks, and divided the total by 52, which gave an average weekly earning of about 9s. 10d., and he made an award for a weekly payment of half that sum.

The workman appealed.

Clarke Hall, for the appellant.—The question is as to the meaning of the words "if he has been so long employed" in section 1 of the First Schedule to the Act. The county court judge erroneously construed them as meaning merely "if he has been so long in the employment of the same employer." They ought to be construed as meaning "if he has been so long employed in the same kind of employment." Here the appellant entered into a new kind of employment three weeks before the accident. The case comes within the second part of sub-section (b), and the appellant's average weekly earnings for the three weeks was 13s. 8d. The award ought to have been for a weekly payment of half that sum.

Lochnis, for the respondents, was not called upon to argue.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I think that the appeal must be dismissed. It is argued for the appellant that the words "if he has been so long employed" in section 1, sub-section (b), of the First Schedule of the Workmen's Compensation Act, mean "if he has been so long employed in the same grade of employment." I do not think that is right. Sub-section (a) says that, where death results from the injury, the compensation is to be a sum equal to the workman's earnings in the employment of the same employer during the three years next preceding the injury, and if the period of his employment by the said employer has been less than three years, then the amount of his earnings during the three years shall be deemed to be 156 times his average weekly earnings during the period of his actual employment under the said employer. Then sub-section (b) says that, where total or partial incapacity for work results from the injury, the compensation is to be a weekly payment "not exceeding 50 per cent. of his average weekly earnings during the previous twelve months, if he has been so long employed"—that is, as it seems to me, by the same employer—"but if not, then for any less period during which he has been in the employment of the same employer." It will be seen that "employment of the same employer" is spoken of in sub-section (a) and in the second part of sub-section (b), and I am of opinion that the words now in question must be taken to be used in the same sense, and must be construed as meaning "if he has been so long employed by the same employer," and not as meaning "if he has been so long employed in the same grade of employment."

Walker v. Nussey, 16 M. & W. 302, followed.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Wright and Darling, JJ.) in an appeal from a county court.

The action was brought to recover the price of twelve stationery cabinets which by an oral contract the plaintiff had agreed to manufacture and supply and the defendant had agreed to buy. In a previous transaction for the purchase of six similar cabinets the defendant had by some mistake overpaid the plaintiff £1, and it was made a term of the oral contract that the sum of £1 so overpaid should be retained by the plaintiff and accepted by him as part payment in respect of the twelve cabinets. The defendant having refused to accept delivery of the twelve cabinets, the plaintiff commenced this action, and the question was whether there had been a part payment sufficient to satisfy the requirements of section 4, sub-section 1, of the Sale of Goods Acts, 1893, which substantially re-enacts section 17 of the Statute of Frauds.

The county court judge held that the statute had not been complied with, but the Divisional Court reversed his decision.

The defendant appealed.

Lewis Thomas, for the defendant.

G. Thorn Drury, for the plaintiff.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—I take the facts of this case to be these, that the defendant, who had previously ordered some cabinets from the plaintiff, gave a new order for an additional number of cabinets, and at the same time agreed that the sum of £1, which he had overpaid the plaintiff in respect of the earlier order, might be retained by the plaintiff as appropriated to, and as part payment in respect of, the new order. The dry question of law arises, whether that satisfies the Statute of Frauds, or the Sale of Goods Act, which has superseded it. In my opinion it does not. The Legislature has provided that, whenever a contract is made for the sale of goods of the value of ten pounds or upwards, there must be a note or memorandum in writing of the contract, or there must be acceptance of part of the goods, or something must be paid. It is argued that, where an order for goods worth more than £10 is given orally, if something passes by the same oral contract, which by the contract is to be treated as part payment, that satisfies the statute. But if that argument were correct the statute would be idle. The policy of the statute is that in cases to which it applies the court shall require something more than mere words. The statute assumes that there is a dispute between the parties as to what the agreement was, and it says that reliance shall not be placed merely on oral testimony as to what was said. This view of the meaning of the statute was taken in the case of Walker v. Nussey, 16 M. & W. 302, which has stood the test of half a century, and must now be taken as decisive. In my opinion the appeal ought to be allowed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

CHITTY, L.J.—I also am of the same opinion. The statute requires something more than a mere oral contract. Here the supposed part payment was part of the contract itself.

Appeal allowed.

HEMANS v. HOTCHKISS ORDNANCE CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Articles of association—Classes of shareholders—General meetings of each class—Quorum.

The articles of association of a limited company provided that whenever the capital was divided into different classes of shares, the rights of each class might be modified by agreement duly confirmed by resolution passed at a general meeting of that class, the quorum at the meeting being members holding or representing three-fourths of the nominal amount of the issued shares of that class. Another article provided that the quorum at general meetings of the company were to be at least three mmebers present, and holding or representing not less than one-tenth of the issued capital of the company. If the meeting was adjourned, a quorum not being present, the members present at the adjourned meeting should form a quorum for the transaction of the business of such meeting.

Held, that the provisions with regard to the general meetings of the company did not apply to general meetings of classes of shareholders; and therefore, at a meeting of a particular class of shareholders summoned to deal with the rights and privileges of that class, the necessary quorum was members of that class holding or representing three-quarters of the nominal amount of such issue, and not members holding or representing one-tenth of the issue of the company.

Defendants' appeal from Kekewich, J.

The action was brought by the plaintiff on behalf of himself and all others the shareholders of the above-named company, both ordinary and preference, for a declaration that certain resolutions purporting to have been passed on the 3rd of August, 1898, at separate meetings of the ordinary and preference shareholders were not duly passed and were not binding and operative; also for an injunction to restrain the directors and their agents and the company from acting on the resolutions.

The company was formed in March, 1887, with a capital of £800,000 divided into 80,000 shares of £10 each. Power was given by the articles for the division of the shares into different classes, with such preferences, priorities, restrictions, or special incidents as might be attached thereto.

The material articles were as follow: Art. 12. "The company in general meeting may from time to time increase the capital by the creation of new shares of such amount as may be deemed expedient. The new shares shall be issued upon such terms and conditions, and with such rights and privileges annexed thereto as the general meeting resolving upon the creation thereof shall direct, and, if no direction be given, as the directors shall determine; and in particular such shares may be issued with a preferential or qualified right to dividends and in the distribution of assets of the company, and with special or without any right of voting."

Art. 13. "Whenever the capital, by reason of the issue, of preference shares or otherwise, is divided into different classes of shares, all or any of the rights and privileges attached to each class may be modified by agreement between the company and any person purporting to contract on behalf of that class, provided such agrement is confirmed by an extraordinary resolution passed at a separate general meeting of the holders of shares of that class; and all the provisions hereinafter contained as to general meetings shall, mutatis mutandis, apply to every such meeting, but so that the quorum thereof shall be members holding or representing by proxy three-fourths of the nominal amount of the issued shares of the class."

Art. 66. "Three members personally present shall be a quorum for a general meeting for the choice of a chairman, the declaration of a dividend, and the adjournment of the meeting. For all other purposes the quorum for a general meeting shall be members personally present, not being less than three in number, and holding or representing by proxy not less than one-tenth part of the issued capital of the company. No business shall be transacted at any general meeting unless the quorum requisite be present at the commencement of the business."

Art. 68. "If within half-an-hour from the time appointed for the meeting a quorum is not present the meeting if convened upon such requisition as aforesaid [i.e., a requisition by holders of one-tenth of the capital] shall be dissolved, but in any other case it shall stand adjourned to the same day in the next week at the same time and place, and if at such adjourned meeting a quorum is not present, those members who are present shall be a quorum, and may transact the business for which the meeting was called."

The whole of the share capital had been issued.

On the 15th of July, 1898, notices were sent out for separate meetings of the ordinary and preference shareholders for the 27th of July, 1898, to confirm certain agreements made for the reduction of the company's capital; at neither meeting was there a quorum of shareholders present as required by article 13, and consequently the meetings stood adjourned to the 3rd of August. At the adjourned meetings the requisite quorums were not present, and resolutions for the confirmation of the agreements were put to each of the meetings and purported to be passed.

The plaintiff then commenced his action and moved before Kekewich, J., for an interim injunction as above stated.

KEKEWICH, J., made the order.

The company appealed.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Kirby, for the appellants—Article 68 must be applied unless it is repugnant to article 13, and it is no more repugnant to article 13 that is article 66. There is no express provision as to the procedure if at a meeting of either class of shareholders a three-fourths quorum is not present, and therefore the provisions of article 68 must be resorted to. The articles are in the common form: see Palmer's Company Forms (7th ed.), p.410.

Warrington, Q.C., and Martelli, for the respondents were not called upon.

LINDLEY, M.R.—My own opinion is tolerably plain that the construction put upon this article 13 by Kekewich, J., is the right one. Now, just observe what it is. Article 12, which is important, says, in substance, that the shares may be issued with special privileges. That means that you immediately get a class of shareholders with rights and privileges unlike those of the ordinary shareholders. Then there is no provision made for altering those rights and privileges, and that may be done in the way pointed out by article 13, which says that the privileges may be altered and modified by agreement between the company and anybody purporting to contract on behalf of the class. Of course that would be far too wide; therefore you have to safeguard that, and provision is made for safeguarding it. "Provided such agreement"—that is to say, an agreement mentioned for altering the rights and privileges of a class — "is confirmed by an extra-ordinary resolution passed at a special general meeting of the holders of shares of that class" — that is to say, it must be confirmed by an extraordinary resolution of that class of shareholders. Then it goes on to say, "and all the provisions hereinafter contained as to general meetings shall, mutatis mutandis, be applied to such meeting"—that is, to every class meeting—"whether adjourned or not"—all those provisions are to apply mutatis mutandis, but subject to this, and this is put in for the protection of the classes—"but so that the quorum thereof"—that is, the quorum of every class meeting which is to alter the privileges of the others—"shall be members holding or representing by proxy three-fourths of the nominal amount of the issued shares of that class." Now, what does that mean? That means, to my mind, exactly what it says: Work in all the regulations as to general meetings; but, if you are going to alter the rights of the class, you must not take those provisions in the articles relating to general meetings to relate to the quorum. You are to have a quorum for every class meeting, "the quorum thereof"—adjourned or not, it does not matter—"shall be members holding or representing by proxy three-fourths of the nominal amount of such issue." To my mind, that is the plain meaning of article 13, and unless you adopt this, the other construction would imply this: that the rights and privileges of the members of the class may be modified, taken away, and destroyed without the protection of this quorum at all, because they are too supine to look after their own interests. That is not at all likely, at all events to me, to be the true construction. If on the adjourned meeting they have not the necessary quorum, the meeting must be adjourned until they have, or they cannot alter the special rights and privileges of the class.

I think, therefore, that the judgment appealed from is right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Under their memorandum of association the company had power, consistently with the articles, to attach special preferences to certain shares, and that the company did. Article 13 deals with meetings of the persons who have such priority or privileges attached to their shares, and provides for having a separate meeting of the class of persons whose rights are proposed to be modified. The point appears to me to be a very simple one. Do these words which are found at the end of the 13th article as to a quorum run throughout the provisions which are incorporated by reference? If the articles had run thus, "substituting three-fourths for one-tenth," the case would have stood entirely differently; but it appears to me that the right reading is that the quorum of three-fourths is required for all the purposes of the provisions which are here incorporated—namely, not merely in the 66th, but in the 68th article also. The 68th article would, if it applied without the variation which I think is to be found in it, admit of two persons only, members of the class, at an adjourned meeting giving away all the privileges which had been attached to the shares held by that class. That is a strong reason for construing the 13th article as it stands; and I think that as it stands it does not substitute three-fourths merely for one-tenth, but it maintains the requirement of a quorum of three-fourths right throughout all the articles that have been referred to.

For this reason I think the judgment was right.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree.

BAIRD v. STAVELEY HILL. (a.)

Trustee—Breach of trust—Principal debtor—Surety—Indemnities—Release of debt.

Where the life tenant (a married woman) of the income from investments of a settled fund of £30,000, having a power of appointment by will over the capital and income of the same, requested the trustees to sell so much as would realize the sum of £10,000, which she was desirous of handing to her husband, himself one of the trustees; and where, all parties understanding that the said sale and payment were breaches of trust, the other trustee only consented on the life tenant and the co-trustee agreeing to enter into a covenant to indemnify him against all claims; and where the said sum was not repaid to the life tenant prior to her death nor to her estate since her death upon the demand of the other trustee, Held, that the husband of the life tenant was the principal debtor to his wife's estate, and that she was surety.

Held, further, that, upon the true construction of the will of the life tenant, the £10,000 passed to the husband.

Action and summons.

By her will, dated the 24th of November, 1876, Mrs. Dorothea Baird, after appointing as her trustees the plaintiff George Baird and Thomas Tower, since deceased, in whose place the defendant the Rt. Hon. Alexander Staveley Hill was appointed on the 5th of March, 1891, bequeathed to them the sum of £30,000 upon trust to invest the same in certain authorized securities and to pay the income thereof as it should become due and not by way of anticipation to Mary Frances Staveley Hill, then Mary Frances Baird, for her separate use, and after her death as to both capital and income thereof on trust for such person or persons for such purpose and in such manner as the said Mary Frances Staveley Hill should by will or codicil appoint, and in default of and subject to such appointment in trust for such persons (exclusively of a husband) as should be the next-of-kin of the said Mary Frances Staveley Hill.

In 1876 the said Mary Frances Baird was married to the defendant Alexander Staveley Hill. In the year 1895 there had been no child born of the marriage and it was regarded as certain that there would be no issue of the marriage. In that year the defendant Hill required the sum of £10,000 for his own personal purposes, and Mrs. Staveley Hill requested the plaintiff to concur with the defendant as co-trustee with the plaintiff in raising that sum out of the said trust funds. The plaintiff consented on Mr. and Mrs. Staveley Hill agreeing to enter into a covenant to indemnify him against all claims in respect of the breach of trust. The whole of the said sum was accordingly paid to Mrs. Staveley Hill, and she paid to the defendant the sum of £2,500 as a gift, and as a mortgage advanced to the defendant the sum of £7,500 on the security of an equitable mortgage of certain estates dated the 26th of November, 1895.

By a deed of indemnity dated the 19th of November, 1895, Mr. and Mrs. Staveley Hill and each of them covenanted to indemnify the plaintiff in respect of the breach of trust and, further, to repay or secure the repayment of the said sum when required. By another deed of indemnity dated the 16th of December, 1896,

(a.) Reported by W. H. DRAPER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mrs. Staveley Hill alone covenanted to indemnify the trustees in respect of a further sum of £2,600 raised out of the same trust fund and paid to her. The defendant did not repay the £10,000 prior to the death of Mrs. Staveley Hill, which occurred on the 7th of August, 1897, and has not since repaid it to her estate, as the plaintiff had requested him to do.

By her will dated the 20th of January, 1897, Mrs. Staveley Hill, after reciting that the trustees had raised and paid to her the said sums of £10,000 and £2,600, and after reciting the said deeds of indemnity, appointed that her trustees should hold "the residue of the said sum of £30,000, and all other moneys, securities, and property held by the trustees of my said mother's will over which I have any power of appointment in the first place to satisfy indemnities given by me by the said indentures," and she further appointed "that the said sum of £30,000 or so much thereof as shall remain after providing such indemnities as aforesaid and all other moneys over which I have power of appointment under my said mother's will shall be held by my trustees" upon trusts, after payment of certain debts and legacies, to pay the income to Mr. Staveley Hill for his life and after his decease to residuary legatees as therein appointed. "And as to all the rest, residue, and remainder of my property of whatsoever nature or kind over which I have a disposing power I give, devise, and appoint the same unto my said husband absolutely."

The action was brought to obtain the payment of the £10,000 to the trustees of Mrs. Baird's will, and in the alternative specific performance of the covenants of indemnity on behalf of the plaintiff. Simultaneously with the action, a summons was heard in the matter of the estate of Mrs. Staveley Hill, in which Mr. Staveley Hill was plaintiff and Mr. H. Staveley Hill and Mr. J. C. F. Tower, the two remaining executors and trustees of Mrs. Staveley Hill's will, and Mr. G. Baird, and Miss M. A. Baird as representing all other parties other than Mr. Staveley Hill beneficially interested in the said will, were defendants.

Bramwell Davies, Q.C., and Eustace Smith, for the plaintiff, who sued upon the covenant in the deed of the 19th of November, 1895, by which Mr. Hill covenanted to pay Mr. Baird the £10,000.

Mr. Hill had benefited by the breach of trust; he and his wife had both covenanted to repay on demand, and the demand had been made but had not been satisfied. Until the liability of Mr. Hill was determined Mr. Baird the plaintiff could not say whether he would require to fall back on the indemnity given him by Mrs. Hill's will. For that reason, and by reason of an order of the 26th of May, 1898, and because the residuary legatees pressed for the £30,000, the plaintiff was obliged to sue for the repayment of the £10,000. The plaintiff, recognizing that everything depended upon whether Mr. Hill was surety or principal debtor, contended that there was nothing to show that Mr. Hill did not occupy the position he did under the deed—viz., that of principal debtor. It was evidently intended that he should repay Mrs. Hill, and there was nothing to prevent the normal operation of the deed. Everything in the evidence was consistent with the assumption that she was surety only: Paget v. Paget, 46 W. R. 232, [1898] 1 Ch. 47, 470, following Huntingdon v. Huntingdon, 2 Wh. & Tud., Lead. Cas., 6th ed., 1147, and Hudson v. Carmichael, 2 W. R. 503, Kay, 613, at p. 620.

J. F. Waggett, for the executors of Mrs. Hill, asked for the directions of the court and whether, on the words of Mrs. Staveley Hill's will and in the event of it being held that the £10,000 should be repaid to the estate, the £30,000 was the primary fund chargeable or whether it should be borne by the rest of the estate pro rata.

H. H. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., T. R. Warrington, Q.C., and F. P. Onslow, for the defendant.

It is shown by the correspondence, documents, and oral evidence of the solicitors, that Mrs. Staveley Hill was the principal debtor, as between herself and her husband on the one hand and the plaintiff on the other, and the defendant a surety only. The authorities showed that it was competent for the defendant to show that he was a surety, assuming the deed to be a simple one without recitals; here there were recitals, but not such as to preclude the present defence. These recitals and the execution of the mortgage for £7,500 on the same day went to show that she herself instigated the breach of trust; she was minded to do what she was at liberty to do—viz., to lend the money; and she did lend it. Assuming that Mrs. Hill was the principal, the plaintiff could not sue her executors for the £10,000, for he would have at the same moment as he received that sum to repay it to them for the £30,000; and no action could be brought by her executors against the plaintiff for breach of trust, for she had in her will exercised her power of appointment, making the fund applicable for her debts. The defence was based on two grounds: (1) that if you once get an action by the creditor against a surety, it is competent to the surety to show that the creditor could not sue the principal debtor, so that he was surety for nothing; (2) that if a surety is sued by the creditor, he is entitled to all the securities that the creditor has. It had been held by the Court of Appeal that all circumstances and facts in the relations of husband and wife could be examined to discover who was principal debtor and who was surety, and whether there was any right of indemnity, Paget v. Paget. The defendant owed the money, not to the plaintiff, but only to Mrs. Hill's estate; it was impossible that he could owe £7,500 to that estate and £10,000 to the plaintiff.

W. C. Renshaw, Q.C., and Douglas Eyre, for the residuary legatees, claiming the residue of the £30,000, and coming in under Mrs. Hill's will, so far as it exercised the power under Mrs. Baird's will.—Under the deed of the 19th of November, 1895, the plaintiff alone was entitled to the first indemnity given by Mr. and Mrs. Hill; Mrs. Hill's will did not touch that part of the deed which operated as an indemnity given by Mr. Hill himself. Mrs. Hill intended only to protect her own estate if her husband's estate failed; if as between herself and her husband her estate was called upon to indemnify the plaintiff, it was to be as her will directed, but not so, if Mr. Hill did not become liable. The real truth was that a breach of trust had been committed in respect of the £10,000 entirely for Mr. Hill's purposes; that his indemnity was not worth much, as he was under imminent risk of bankruptcy proceedings, and the joint covenant of indemnity by Mr. and Mrs. Hill was only worth his separate estate, consisting of the furniture. Mr. Hill was the principal debtor and Mrs. Hill only a surety; the mortgage for £7,500, all he could give, was executed as a counter-security to protect Mrs. Hill against Mr. Baird. This £7,500 was not in fact paid by her "out of her separate estate," but was raised out of moneys in which she had a life interest by a breach of trust consisting of (1) the neglect to give regard to the restraint on anticipation, (2) the paying over of the corpus of the fund to the extent to which it was paid: Married Woman's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 5; Reid v. Reid, 31 W. R. 332, 31 Ch. D. 402. The presumption that the wife is the surety was capable of being rebutted, and Paget v. Paget does not therefore apply to the present case.

Dec. 1.—KEKEWICH, J., said that the only contention, as between Mr. and Mrs. Staveley Hill, was, who under the deed of indemnity and covenant dated the 19th of November, 1895, was the person primarily liable to the plaintiff and who was surety. His lordship was of opinion that the defendant was in the position of principal debtor and that Mrs. Staveley Hill had been surety.

The case was stood over for further hearing as to the effect of Mrs. Staveley Hill's will.

Dec. 7.—KEKEWICH, J., having intimated that the question remaining to be decided was whether in the interests of all parties the right of action in respect of the covenant ought to be exercised, and that there was a difference between the terms of the two deeds of indemnity,

H. H. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., T. R. Warrington, Q.C., and F. P. Onslow, for Mr. Staveley Hill, contended that there never was a point of time when anyone could make the plaintiff liable to be sued for breach of trust. Under the will of Mrs. Baird, Mrs. Staveley Hill was entitled to the separate use of the estate, in the events which happened, with a power of appointment by will which she did in fact exercise. The two deeds of indemnity were on the same footing, the terms of the covenants being reddendo singulo singulis. The direction contained in Mrs. Staveley Hill's residue was one as to the residue rebus extantibus—i.e., the £30,000 less the £10,000 and the £2,600. There was nothing on the face of the will to justify the liability of the plaintiff; rather, the true effect of the will was to give the sum the subject of the debt to the defendant, that sum, in fact, if not in law, having been originally paid to Mrs. Staveley Hill by the trustees. The final clause of the will exercises every power hitherto unexercised, and the £10,000 passed under that appointment to Mr. Staveley Hill, to whom alone the plaintiff, if he could recover, could pay it back.

W. C. Renshaw, Q.C., and Douglas Eyre, for the residuary legatees, relied on the distinction between the deeds of indemnity, and contended that the will simply satisfied the indemnity given by Mrs. Staveley Hill, the surety, and not those given by the defendant, and that nothing was left to pass to the defendant under the general appointment at the end of the will.

KEKEWICH, J., said that the question had really become one of the construction of Mrs. Staveley Hill's will. It was clear that the indemnities were not to be considered in ascertaining "the residue of the said sum of £30,000" of which the testatrix spoke. She recognized on the face of the will that the two sums of £10,000 and £2,600 had been taken from the £30,000 and had passed to her. By the indemnities for which she did provide, she possibly meant indemnification for the costs under the covenant or for the breach of trust in respect of certain Canada debenture investments. The awkward mention of the sum "£30,000" later in the will had to be explained by what had gone before, and it would be quite an absurdity to suppose that she meant to refer to the whole £30,000, when she had said in effect that it was the sum of £17,400 which represented the residue of the £30,000. Some little violence was done to the grammatical meaning of words. Mr. Staveley Hill was the principal debtor in respect of the £10,000, but she was liable, as far as a married woman could be, to be sued, and she had, in fact, something to give; so that if the plaintiff were to recover, he would have to pay to the defendant, which his lordship preferred to take as an argument in aid of what he had said above.

His lordship declared that, in the events which had happened, and according to the true construction of the will, the £10,000 passed under the residuary bequest to Mr. Staveley Hill; one order in action and summons, and no other order except a direction that the costs of all parties should be taxed as between solicitor and client, including any charges and expenses of the plaintiff, and that the trustees of Mrs. Baird's will should transfer and hand over to Mrs. Staveley Hill's executors the funds in question, out of which to pay and retain the costs ordered to be taxed.

DINGLE v. COPPEN. (a.)

Mortgage—Statutes of Limitations (21 Jac. 1, c. 16 and 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 42)—Statute-barred arrears of interest—Statute-barred debt—Mortgage of reversion—Mortgagee the tenant for life—Foreclosure and redemption action—Accounts between mortgagor and mortgagee.

A tenant for life, with the duty of keeping the property in repair, became mortgagee of the reversion. After her death her executors brought an action for foreclosure. The mortgagor counter-claimed for redemption and also for damages for non-repair, and he was held entitled to them. The tenant for life had lent him a sum of money greater than the amount of such damages, but this debt was statute-barred. There were arrears of interest owing under the mortgage deed for more than six years.

Held, that the executors of the tenant for life could not treat the mortgagor as having been repaid his damages out of the statute-barred debt.

Held, also, that, in taking the accounts between mortgagor and mortgagees, all the arrears of interest must be brought in, and not merely those which had accrued within six years.

In this case the testator, J. L. Coppen, gave all his real estate to trustees, of whom the plaintiff Fortescue was the survivor, upon trust to permit his wife, Elizabeth Coppen, to receive the rents and profits for her life for her separate use, she keeping the buildings insured and in good tenantable repair, and subject to such life interest upon trust as regards fifteen acres of land at Dagenham and six cottages, together known as "New Years" for the defendant Coppen in fee simple. The testator died on the 20th of June, 1878. On the 13th of April, 1882, the defendant Coppen mortgaged his reversionary interest in New Years to the widow, Elizabeth Coppen, the tenant for life, to secure £500 and interest at 5 per cent. per annum. In 1884, the defendant Coppen again mortgaged the property to the defendant Temple. There was also a third mortgagee whom it was arranged should be made a defendant. Elizabeth Coppen died in 1897, and the plaintiffs were the executors of her will. The sum of £500, and considerable arrears of interest, were still owing to her estate by the mortgagor. The plaintiffs brought this action for an account of what was due to them under the mortgage of the 13th of April, 1882, and for payment of what should be found due, and in default foreclosure; but did not claim under the covenant in the mortgage deed. The defendant Coppen put in a defence which was substantially abandoned at the trial, and a counterclaim claiming damages for neglect and non-repair of the premises by the widow as tenant for life, and redemption upon payment of the balance of what should be found due to the plaintiffs under the said account after deducting rents and profits come to the hands of the plaintiffs since the death of Mrs. Coppen and the damages for non-repair. The plaintiffs in their defence to the counterclaim submitted that the defendant's claim for damages should be limited to defaults within six years before the death of Mrs. Coppen. They also stated that Mrs. Coppen had lent the defendant Coppen £220, which, with interest, was still owing to her estate and claimed that if any damages were awarded against her estate they might retain such damages against the said sum of £220 and interest. This sum was statute-barred, and the defendant pleaded to it the statute 21 Jac. 1 c. 16. It was agreed at the trial that the judge should decide summarily what was due from the estate of Mrs. Coppen for damages (if any), and his lordship found that damage had been sustained to the amount of £85. It was also agreed that this amount should go in reduction of what the defendant Coppen would otherwise have to pay upon redemption. This was called the first question in the action. The second question was whether the plaintiffs were entitled to the benefit of the statute-barred debt of £220 in reduction or discharge of the damages; and the third question was whether on taking the account between the plaintiffs and the defendant Coppen, the plaintiffs could claim to bring into the account all arrears of interest, or only the arrears of interest for six years. It was agreed that the third question should be determined as though it had arisen in an action by the defendant Coppen to redeem the plaintiffs.

Astbury, Q.C., and H. L. Fraser, for the plaintiffs.—We admit that there cannot be strict set off between the damages we have to pay and the statute-barred debt due to us: Rawley v. Rawley, 24 W. R. 995, 1 Q. B. D. 460. But we say that the defendant must be treated as having repaid himself these damages out of the debt: Jeffs v. Wood, 2 P. Wms. 128; Mills v. Fowkes, 5 Bing. N. C. 455; In re Cordwell, 23 W. R. 826, L. R. 20 Eq. 644; In re Compton, 30 Ch. D. 15; even although the damages were not ascertained: In re Morris, 23 W. R. 120, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 68; Courtenay v. Williams, 3 Hare 539, 15 L. J. Ch. 204. We also submit that this is an action to recover land, and time does not begin to run against us till we came into possession upon the death of Mrs. Coppen: Pugh v. Heath, 30 W. R. 553, 7 App. Cas. 235; Harlock v. Ashberry, 30 W. R. 327, 19 Ch. D. 539; Hugill v. Wilkinson, 36 W. R. 633, 38 Ch. D. 480; In re Owen, 43 W. R. 55, [1894] 3 Ch. 220; and that this being a redemption suit does not come within 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 42, and consequently we can bring all our arrears of interest into the account: Edmunds v. Waugh, 14 W. R. 257, L. R. 1 Eq. 418; In re Marshfield, Marshfield v. Hutchings, 35 W. R. 491, 34 Ch. D. 721.

J. G. Wood, for the defendant Coppen.—The cases cited upon the first point are either cases of the bankruptcy of a testator or cases of contract, and do not apply to a case of damages. The plaintiffs are only entitled to claim six years' arrears of interest. There is no case exactly deciding this, but the observations of the judges are in favour of this view in the cases of Du Vigier v. Lee, 2 Hare 326; Sober v. Kemp, 6 Hare 155; Sinclair v. Jackson, 1 W. R. 400, 17 Beav. 405; and Mason v. Broadbent, 12 W. R. 118, 33 Beav. 296.

Ingpen, for defendant Temple.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 21.—BYRNE, J.—Now I come to the second question. The plaintiffs say they are entitled to treat the amount recovered by way of damages as being repaid to the extent of the statute-barred debt of £220, or to retain an amount of assets otherwise applicable in payment of damages in discharge of such damages. They admit they could not set off, but they say that this is not set off, but analogous to the right to retain a legacy in discharge of a statute-barred debt. They say that they have no authority establishing their contention, but they refer to the case of Courtenay v. Williams, 3 Hare 539, as showing the principle upon which they assert this claim, and as fairly enumerating the previous cases upon which the plaintiffs rely. [His lordship read the passage (p. 551) commencing: "The statute of limitations that governs" to "rebutter to the plaintiff's demand" on p. 554.] Now, it is to be observed that the decision in that case relates to a legatee, there being a bounty intended by the testator, and the same remark applies to Jeffs v. Woods, and the learned judge in Courtenay v. Williams expressly recognises that the debtor cannot plead by way of set off a debt barred by the Statute of Limitations. Then the case of Courtenay v. Williams came on for appeal, 15 L. J. Ch. 204, and the decision was affirmed. At p. 207 the Lord Chancellor says: "Now it is quite certain —[His lordship read the passage to "in the course of this argument," p. 208]. What, then, do these decisions amount to? To my mind they come to this, that in the case of a legacy the person indebted to the testator's estate is not entitled to claim that legacy, unless he treats the legacy in one way or another as being pro tanto, or wholly satisfied, as the case may be, by the amount due from him to the testator, although barred by the Statute of Limitations. Counsel for the plaintiff was unable to refer me to any authority which would make it applicable to a case like the present where, there being a statute-barred debt due by a person to a testator who was dead, an action is brought against the executors of the testator in respect of waste committed during his lifetime. If this had been a simple action for waste brought against the tenant for life during his lifetime it would have been no answer to say, "But you are indebted to me." Of course that would have been a simple set off. Is there any difference here? If a right exists at all, it appears to me that it must be a right existing by reason of set off. In the absence of authority I am not going to be the first to decide that there is any such right as that claimed.

On the other point I have been referred to the earlier cases, and invited to accept certain dicta in those earlier cases rather than dicta in the later cases. [His lordship then referred to the judgments in the cases of Du Vigier v. Lee, Sober v. Kemp, Sinclair v. Jackson, Mason v. Broadbent, and Edmunds v. Waugh, in which latter case proceeds of sale of the estate by the trustees of the mortgagee had been paid into court, and the trustees were held entitled by Kindersley, V.C., to more than six years' arrears as the suit was not one to recover interest under the 42nd section of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27:] The Vice-Chancellor there says, "I am bound to say that, with all deference, I cannot concur in the conclusion that a bill by a mortgagor to recover the surplus moneys comes within the terms of the 42nd section as being a suit by which arrears of interest are sought to be recovered. Moreover, it does not appear to me to come within the spirit of the Act, which, it must be remembered, is an Act taking away existing rights, and which must be construed with reasonable strictness. The intention of the Legislature, I think, was that if a man chose to let interest run for more than six years, and then come to a court of justice to recover the interest, he should only be entitled to recover six years' interest; but it does not follow that the Legislature intended that a mortgagor who has lost his legal right, and comes to the court insisting on his equity to redeem, should be allowed—although he has failed to pay the interest which he ought to have paid for more than six years—to redeem on payment only of six years' interest. There would be no justice in such a construction of the statute. Is the omission of the mortgagor to pay the interest which he ought to have paid less culpable than the omission of the mortgagee to demand and enforce payment of it?"

Now, like Kay, L.J., in In re Marshfield, I confess I am not able to resist the reasoning of Kindersley, V.C., in Edmunds v. Waugh. The truth is this. Before the passing of the Act in question there were certain rights as between a mortgagor and a mortgagee in existence. In respect of the recovery of arrears of interest, the 42nd section has affected the right of the mortgagee when coming to recover money, but not his right when he has exercised his power of sale and holds the proceeds, or where his mortgagor comes to redeem and take away from him his legal rights. I think, therefore, that the true view is that in a suit to redeem there is no such right as that contended for on behalf of the defendant.

SPIERS & BEVAN'S CASE. (a.)

Company—Winding up—Contract—Consideration for shares other than cash—Registration of contract—Matter of prejudice—"Just and equitable"—Companies Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 26), s. 1.

Before granting relief under the Companies Act, 1898, the court will consider the consideration given for the shares which were issued and the nature of the contract sought to be registered. It lies on the applicant to show that, when entering into the contract which he is applying to register, he acted with due caution and conscientiousness, and that he did nothing to disentitle him to a relief at the cost of innocent persons.

Summons by Messrs. Spiers & Bevan to vary the list of contributories by inserting their names in the list of fully paid up shareholders with regard to certain shares which had been allotted to them, or in the alternative for relief under the Companies Act, 1898.

The applicants were accountants in a large way of business. One Rideal had converted his publishing business into a limited company under the name of the Roxburghe Press (Limited); as vendor he was to have allotted to him 30,000 fully-paid shares. These his co-directors resolved should be 7 per cent. cumulative preference shares. Nothing, however, was said in the contract as to allotment to his nominees. Rideal also became a "governing director" of the company. The applicants agreed with him that they would issue the prospectus of the company to 600 of their customers with personal letters recommending the shares in consideration of receiving from Rideal as his nominees, 200 of his shares and also the sum of 6d. for every share applied for on their recommendation. The shares were allotted direct to the applicants by the company and not to Rideal. No contract as to this transaction was ever registered under section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867. The company having gone into liquidation, the names of Messrs. Spiers & Bevan were placed on the list of contributories by the liquidator as holders of unpaid shares. They now applied to have their names removed from the list of contributories, or in the alternative for relief under the Companies Act, 1898.

Wright, J., held that they were not entitled to have their names removed from the list of contributories, but took time to consider their application under the Act of 1898.

S. O. Buckmaster, for the applicants.—The applicants are entitled to relief as they are "persons interested," and it is "just and equitable" that the contract should be filed.

R. Neville, for the liquidator:—The contract with the vendor was a mere speculation, and the applicants are not entitled to relief.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 21.—WRIGHT, J.—This case raises a question of great importance under the Act of this year for giving relief against the provisions of the 25th section of the Companies Act, 1867—namely, whether under this Act relief can properly be refused on the ground of what may be called matter of prejudice, as distinguished from bad faith, or gross negligence, or illegal conduct. The applicants would, in my judgment, have been entitled to relief if the shares which they took in the belief that they were fully-paid shares, and which the company issued to them as fully paid, had been taken by them at their real or supposed value as payment for services of an ordinary business kind. Ought it to make any difference if the services rendered were the recommending or puffing of the vendor's shares with the view of helping him to unload them on the public, and in ignorance or without full inquiry whether they were valuable or worthless, and if, instead of taking them at an estimated value sufficient to pay the real worth of the services given, the claimants took them by way of a large commission of 100 shares for every 200 or 300 persons to whom they might recommend a purchase, besides a commission of 6d. per share, the sale of which their introduction might effect? It is argued with much force against the applicants that on this view of the facts this was a speculative and questionable transaction, in which they must be left to protect themselves by their own vigilance, and that they ought not to be relieved at the expense of creditors or bonâ fide contributories. In some cases of this kind the amounts involved are very large. To allow the relief may be to deprive creditors of the principal or the only fund for their payment, or to subject to a greatly increased burden contributories who have already paid money on their shares. To refuse the relief may mean ruin to applicants who have done nothing contrary to law. In some instances, especially where relief is sought by vendors, the questions which will have to be solved in this court—and in other courts if regard is to be had to considerations of the kind now in question—will be of the most difficult kind, governed by no definite principles of law, and varying with every complexity of circumstance. Yet to disregard them is hardly possible when it is left to the court to exercise a discretion as to what is "just and equitable." It seems to me that such considerations cannot be wholly disregarded, and that it must in each case be a question of degree and fact. I cannot attempt to lay down any general rule beyond this—that I think it lies on the applicant to show that he has acted with due caution and conscientiousness, and that he has done nothing to disentitle him to a relief at the cost of other innocent persons. In the present case I have come to the conclusion that the applicants ought not to be so assisted. They are accountants in a large way of business. One Rideal had converted his own publishing business into a company named the Roxburghe Press (Limited), of which he made himself "governor director," and he was to get as vendor about 30,000, 7 per cent. cumulative preference shares issued as fully paid. Then he was anxious to unload, and he asked the present applicants to help him by circulating the prospectus of his company among their customers with what are called personal letters recommending the shares. They agreed to issue copies with such letters to 600 persons on the terms that they should be given for themselves as nominees of the vendor 200 of his shares, and also the sum of 6d. for every share applied for on their recommendation. It does not appear that they made any inquiry, except from Rideal himself, as to the truth of the statements in the prospectus or the real value of the shares which they were recommending to the public. Under these circumstances, I am not disposed to relieve them from the consequences of their not having taken the trouble to look at the filed contract. If they had looked at it they would have seen that it omitted all mention of the most material part of the real contract under which the vendor's shares were actually issued—namely, that they were to be 7 per cent. cumulative preference shares. I think the application must be dismissed with costs.

Leave to appeal was given, and execution stayed in the meantime on the terms of an appeal being lodged within a week.

Solicitors, Ward, Perks, & McKay, for the applicants; Weatherfield, Son, & Baines, for the liquidator.

Company—Director—Unauthorized payment of capital to shareholders—Liability of shareholders to refund.

The directors of a company owning ships, having received a sum of money under a policy of insurance of one of the ships which had become a total loss, distributed the money among the shareholders in the company, with their knowledge and consent. Subsequently the company was wound up. An order was made in the winding up, under section 10 of the Companies Act, 1890, declaring that the payments to the shareholders were payments in reduction of the capital of the company, and were unlawful, and the directors were ordered to repay the amount to the liquidator. This order was made without prejudice to the right of the directors to be recouped by the shareholders.

Held, that the directors were entitled to recover from the shareholders the money paid to them.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal by the defendant from the Swansea County Court.

The plaintiffs were the directors of a company called Cory's Steamers (Limited). The defendant was a shareholder in the company. In 1894 The Primrose, a steamer which was the property of the company, became a total loss. The Primrose was insured and the underwriters paid to the company £719 2s. 6d. in respect of the loss. In April, 1894, the directors of the company sent the following circular to the shareholders, including the defendant: "We have a sum of money in hand from insurance received on account of the loss of The Primrose. We propose remitting 10s. per share. If you see no objection we will send you £——, being 10s. on your —— shares, on your sending a receipt on enclosed form and provided all the shareholders consent. There will be a considerable sum more to receive for insurance of The Primrose." The receipt was as follows: "Received of Cory's Steamers (Limited) the sum of £——, being a reduction of 10s. per share on the —— shares held by me." The defendant wrote a letter in answer to the circular, in which he said: "I quite agree with the proposition of your letter of the 10th of April and enclose my receipt for £13, being 10s. on my twenty-six shares." Further payments were made to the shareholders out of the insurance money of The Primrose, the total amount received by the defendant being £35.

On the 29th of December, 1896, a winding-up order was made against the company, and on the 22nd of December, 1897, the liquidator of the company obtained an order under section 10 of the Companies Act, 1890, declaring that the payments made to the shareholders out of the moneys received in respect of the insurance of The Primrose, amounting in all to £719 2s. 6d., were payments of part of the capital of the company, and were unlawfully and improperly paid in reduction of the capital of the company, and it was further ordered that the directors should pay to the liquidator the sum of £719 2s. 6d. This order was expressly made without prejudice to the right of the directors to be recouped by the shareholders the sums paid to them. This action was brought by the directors against the defendant to recover the £35 paid to him.

The county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendant appealed.

Witt, Q.C. (Poley with him), for the appellant.—This action will not lie. The directors and the shareholders were joint tortfeasors, and as such there is no right of contribution between them. Further, the directors were in the position of trustees, and a trustee cannot recover money paid under a mistake of law to a third person who has full knowledge of the facts.

He cited Rogers v. Ingham, 25 W. R. 338, 3 Ch. D. 351; Whittaker v. Kershaw, 39 W. R. 22, 45 Ch. D. 320; Lindley on Company Law (5th ed.), p. 389.

Meager, for the respondents.—This is not a case of joint tortfeasors. In the case of a trustee who has committed a breach of trust, he may follow the property, for it is his duty to get the fund back: Godefroi on Trusts (2nd ed.), p. 687, and cases cited there. A cestui que trust who has instigated a breach of trust is liable to indemnify the trustee: Trafford v. Boehm, 3 Atk. 440; Raby v. Ridehalgh, 3 W. R. 344, 7 De G. M. & G. 104; Sawyer v. Sawyer, 33 W. R. 403, 28 Ch. D. 595. The right of directors, who have been ordered to repay money paid to shareholders out of capital, to recover from the shareholders was recognized by Jessel, M.R., in In re National Funds Assurance Co., 27 W. R. 302, 10 Ch. D. 118; and by

Fry, J., in In re Alexandra Palace Co., 30 W. R. 771, 21 Ch. D. 149.

Witt, Q.C., replied.

LAWRANCE, J.—In my opinion the decision of the county court judge in this case was right. The facts of the case are as follow: The plaintiffs are the directors of a company which for some years had carried on the business of shipowners. One steamship belonging to the company was lost, and the company received about £700 insurance money from the underwriters. For some reason the directors of the company determined to divide this money among the shareholders of the company. A notice was sent to the shareholders asking them whether they agreed to the proposed division of the money. The shareholders did agree, and the money was accordingly distributed. In 1897 the company was wound up under the Act of 1890. The transaction as to the distribution of the insurance money was discovered by the liquidator. He considered that the payment was improper, because the effect of it was to diminish the capital of the company by the amount in question, to which the creditors of the company were entitled. The liquidator obtained an order against the directors for repayment of the money, and now the directors bring their action against one of the shareholders to recover the amount paid to him. The position of the parties is this. The shareholders have all benefited by the payment, which they assented to, and they have no good answer to the claim which the directors now make against them. As between the shareholders and the directors, it is perfectly right and just that the directors should not be held personally liable for payments made to the shareholders, who acquiesced in the payments. This appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. As to the law, the case is not free from difficulty, but on the merits, apart from any question of law, there is no difficulty whatever, because it is clear that the shareholders who received payment of this money ought to be the persons to repay it rather than the directors, who were merely the instruments—whether by a mistake of law or of fact—in paying away the money. The directors did improperly pay this money to the shareholders, but as between the shareholders and the directors, the shareholders ought to repay the money, for the directors committed no real fault, other than an error of judgment and company law, which might have been put right by getting an order in the Chancery Division for the reduction of the capital of the company. The substance of the defendant's contention is that in this case the technical rule as to there being no right of contribution between joint tortfeasors applies. In my judgment this is not a case of joint tortfeasors. At first I was in some doubt as to the position of a trustee who commits a breach of trust through paying away money, not dishonourably, but through a mistake due to the misconstruction of a trust deed, as, for example, where a trustee makes a wrongful payment to the tenant for life. But when the cases are looked at, it is clear that that is not a case in which the trustee and the tenant for life are considered to be in pari delicto. Trafford v. Boehm, 3 Atk. 440, is the earliest case on this question which is usually quoted. The doctrine is also clearly stated in Sawyer v. Sawyer, and most clearly of all in Raby v. Ridehalgh, which is referred to by Chitty, J., in Sawyer v. Sawyer, where he says: "The well-known case of Raby v. Ridehalgh proceeds upon the footing that each person at whose instance the trustees have committed a breach of trust is liable to recoup the subject of that breach of trust to the trustees." In Raby v. Ridehalgh, personalty was bequeathed upon trust for tenants for life, with executory trusts in remainder, but without directions as to investment. The trustees, at the instance of the tenants for life, abandoned their original intention of investing in the funds, and invested on mortgage so as to obtain an increased income, but it did not appear that the tenants for life approved of the particular securities which were taken and which proved insufficient. The trustees had to make good the loss, and it was held that the tenants for life were liable to recoup the trustees. Turner, L.J., in giving judgment, said: "Now, the cestuis que trustent for life who instigated the trustees to commit the breach of trust have derived from that breach of trust the advantage of enjoying the increased income of the fund not duly invested according to the trust, and the consequence of that is, that the cestuis que trustent in remainder have a right to have that income refunded and made good by the cestuis que trustent for life. It is trust money received by them under a breach of trust to which they were privy, and the effect, I apprehend, must be that, as the loss which ought to fall on those who instigated the breach of trust has been laid by the court upon the trustees, the trustees are entitled to stand in the place of the cestuis que trustent, in remainder, for the purpose of recovering against the cestuis que trustent for life who instigated the breach of trust, or their estates, the benefit actually received by them in consequence of such breach of trust." It seems to me that if it can be said that in this case the shareholders instigated a breach of trust, the case is perfectly clear. It is said that trustees in these circumstances are entitled to stand in the shoes of the cestuis que trustent, and that is equivalent to saying that in this case the directors are entitled to stand in the place of the liquidator for the purpose of recovering against the shareholders who received the money. Jessel, M.R., in In re National Funds Assurance Co., and Fry, J., in In Re Alexandra Palace Co., both made orders against directors without prejudice to the right of the directors to recover over against parties privy to the transaction. It is difficult to suppose that such orders would have been made if the right to recover over did not exist. It was probably with a view to putting the directors in that position that the orders were expressly made without prejudice to the right of the directors to recover over. On the whole, therefore, when the matter is fairly considered the point seems to me to be one in which there is no substantial difficulty, and in my opinion there is no doctrine which prevents us from deciding that the shareholders and not the directors should bear the loss in this case.

There is one other point which might have caused a difficulty, and that is the question whether the judgment should have been for an indemnity and not for the recovery of the actual money paid. In my opinion the proper form of the judgment would be a judgment for an indemnity, but the point was not taken before the county court judge, and therefore it is not open to the appellant to take it here. The point is not one of any considerable importance, because most of the money has been repaid by the shareholders since this action was brought. We therefore need not interfere with the judgment of the county court judge, which will stand.

Appeal dismissed.

BEARDSLEY v. BEARDSLEY. (a.)

Estoppel—Res judicata — Probate — Practice — Heir-at-law party as one of next-of-kin only—Decision establishing will—Action of ejectment by heir-at-law alleging intestacy—Court of Probate Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 77), ss. 61, 62, 63.

In an action for establishing a will in the Probate Division to which the heir-at-law of the deceased is a party as one of the next-of-kin, it is not necessary also to cite him in his character of heir-at-law in order that he should be bound as to the real estate of the deceased by the decision of the court.

Held, therefore, that an heir-at-law who had been a party to a probate suit as one of the next-of-kin only, was bound by the decision of the court establishing the will, and was estopped from afterwards bringing an action of ejectment founded upon the alleged intestacy of the deceased.

Point of law raised by the pleadings in an action and set down for hearing under R.S.C., ord. 25, r. 2.

The statement of claim alleged that on the 15th of February, 1897, Solomon Beardsley, who was seized in fee in possession of real property at Ilkeston, known as 65, North-street, died intestate as regards that property; and that the plaintiff as his eldest son and heir-at-law was entitled to the possession of the said premises; but that the defendant wrongfully took possession of the said premises, pretending to be entitled thereto under an alleged will and codicil of the said deceased, and wrongfully withheld possession of the said premises from the plaintiff. The claim was for possession of the premises with mesne profits from the death of the deceased.

The defendant Mary Elizabeth Beardsley, widow of the deceased Solomon Beardsley, in her defence, denied that the latter died intestate, and alleged that she was entitled to a life estate under a will made by the deceased dated the 30th of December, 1891. The defence then proceeded as follows: "(5) On the 2nd of June, 1897, an action was commenced in the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division (Probate) of the High Court of Justice, 1897, B No. 2,325, in which this defendant, Mary Elizabeth Beardsley, was the plaintiff and Solomon Beardsley (the above-named plaintiff) and others were respectively defendants, for the purpose of having the above-named will of the said Solomon Beardsley, deceased, established. (6) The above-named plaintiff, Solomon Beardsley, duly entered an appearance in the said action and delivered a defence therein, and was represented by counsel, and was himself present in person at the trial of the said action, in which judgment was given on the 13th of December, 1897, and a final decree pronounced for the force and validity of the will. (7) By reason of the matters stated in the above two paragraphs of this defence the above-named plaintiff, Solomon Beardsley, ought not now to be heard to impeach the force and validity of the said will of the said Solomon Beardsley, deceased, or the title of this defendant to (inter alia) the said premises under and by virtue thereof, and of the said gift and devise therein contained."

In reply the plaintiff admitted that he was a party to the action in the Probate Division, but pleaded that he was a party, "not as heir-at-law, but as one of the next-of-kin of Solomon Beardsley, deceased, and the said action concerned the goods of the said Solomon Beardsley, deceased, and in no way related to his real estate. The defendant, Mary Elizabeth Beardsley, wholly neglected and refused to cite the plaintiff as such heir-at-law to attend the proceedings in the said action or by summons or otherwise to make him a party thereto as heir-at-law of the deceased, and took no steps to give the Probate Division of this honourable court jurisdiction to determine the validity of the alleged will and devise by the said Solomon Beardsley, deceased, of his real estate, by reason whereof the said Probate Division had no jurisdiction to decide, and did not decide the validity of the alleged will and devise of the said Solomon Beardsley's real estate, and the plaintiff is in no wise estopped or prevented from contesting the force and validity of the alleged will and devise by the said Solomon Beardsley of his real estate."

It was admitted that the plaintiff was not cited in the probate proceedings as heir-at-law of the deceased: the question was whether, having been a party as one of the next-of-kin, he was estopped by the decision of the Probate Division in favour of the will from calling its validity in question in an action of ejectment relating to the real estate of the deceased.

The Court of Probate Act, 1857, s. 61, provides that "where proceedings are taken under this Act for proving a will in solemn form . . . or where in any other contentious cause or matter under this Act the validity of a will is disputed, unless in the several cases aforesaid the will affects only personal estate, the heir-at-law, devisees, and other persons having or pretending interest in the real estate affected by the will shall, subject to the provisions of this Act and to the rules and orders under this Act, be cited to see proceedings, or otherwise summoned in like manner as the next-of-kin . . . and may be permitted to become parties or intervene for their respective interests in such real estate."

Section 62 provides that where probate is granted "after such proof in solemn form" the probate "shall enure for the benefit of all persons interested in the real estate affected by such will . . . and the probate copy of such will . . . shall in all courts and in all suits and proceedings affecting real estate be received as conclusive evidence of the contents and validity of such will."

Section 63 provides that nothing in the Act shall make it necessary to cite the heir-at-law or others interested in the real estate unless it is shown that the deceased was entitled to real estate, "provided that the probate decree or order of the court shall not in any case affect the heir or any person in respect of his interest in real estate unless such heir or person has been cited or made party to the proceedings or derives title under or through a person so cited or made party."

W. H. Stevenson, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff not having been a party to the probate proceedings as heir-at-law is not estopped from disputing the will in an action of ejectment. The fact that he was a party as one of the next-of-kin is immaterial. To give the Probate Court jurisdiction as to the real estate and to bind the heir, it is necessary to cite the heir as such or otherwise to bring him before the court in his capacity of heir. That this is so is clear from the established practice of the Probate Court, which requires the heir to be cited as such in cases where he was already a party as one of the next-of-kin: Tristram and Coote's Probate Practice (12th ed.), p. 392; Lister v. Smith, 10 W. R. 429, 3 Sw. & Tr. 53; Young v. Ferrie, 4 Sw. & Tr. 210, 8 W. R. Prob. Dig. 7; Purdey v. Field, 12 W. R. 1088, 33 L. J. P. & M. 73; Moore v. Holgate, 14 W. R. 515; L. R. 1 P. & D. 101. These cases involve the proposition that the heir-at-law will not be bound by the decision of the Probate Court unless he has been cited as such. This view is supported by the Court of Probate Act, 1857, ss. 61, 62, 63; I rely in particular on section 63. There is no authority to the contrary except the dictum of Sir Cresswell Cresswell in Emberley v. Trevanion, 29 L. J. P. & M. 142.

He also referred to Gaunt v. Wainman, 3 Bing. N. C. 69; Barrs v. Jackson, 1 Yo. & Coll. Ch. C. 585; Reg. v. Hutchings, 29 W. R. 724, 6 Q. B. D. 300.

Hextall, for the defendant.—The plea of estoppel is good, otherwise the court would be called on to retry in the present action the question which has been already tried in the Probate Division between the same parties. [After referring to Smyth v. Wilson, 36 L. J. P. & M. 82, 15 W. R. Prob. Dig. 13, and Rayson v. Parton, 18 W. R. 232, L. R. 2 P. & D. 38, he was stopped.]

BRUCE, J., after reading the material paragraphs of the pleadings, said: The question is whether the plaintiff, who was a party to the action brought in the Probate Division for the purpose of establishing the will, is bound by the decision of that court establishing it. It is said that he is not bound, because although he was a party he was not before the court in his character of heir-at-law. It seems to me that it is immaterial in what character he was a party, provided he was duly made a party. The issue to be tried in the probate action was as to the validity of the will; that issue was the same and was governed by the same considerations whether the will related solely to personal property or related to realty also. The plaintiff was a party to that action and is bound by the decision of the court. In Emberley v. Trevanion, Sir Cresswell Cresswell is reported to have said: "I have always been of opinion that if parties are before the court in a suit in whatever capacity and take part in the litigation they are bound by the decision of that suit, and that the practice of issuing a separate citation to parties as heirs-at-law who have already appeared as next-of-kin is a work of supererogation." I entirely agree with that statement of the law. It is true that the practice has prevailed in the Probate Court of issuing citations to a person who has already appeared as one of the next-of-kin for the purpose of bringing him before the court in his character of heir-at-law; but it appears to me that this is done merely ex abundanti cautelâ. Moreover, I have consulted my brother Barnes as to this question, and I have his authority for saying that the practice is merely a survival of the practice of the ecclesiastical courts and that it is in no way necessary that the heir-at-law should be cited as such if he is already before the court as one of the next-of-kin; he entirely assents to the remarks of Sir Cresswell Cresswell which I have quoted. As to section 63 of the Court of Probate Act, 1857, which was relied on, the important words are those of the proviso: the heir-at-law is not to be affected unless he "has been cited or made party to the proceedings"; now, here the heir-at-law was a party to the proceedings, although not as heir-at-law; he is therefore bound by the decision and cannot have the whole matter tried over again; it would be scandalous if the law permitted that to be done.

RIDLEY, J.—I agree.

THE COURT being of opinion that the decision of the point of law disposed of the whole action, dismissed the action with costs.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div.
(Wright and Darling, JJ.) } Nov. 11, 14; Dec. 21.

In re HIGGINSON & DEAN.
Ex parte THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Proof—Application to expunge—Claim by the Crown to dividends on the proof of an extinct corporation—Bona vacantia—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), Schedule II., rr. 23, 25.

A corporation was admitted to proof in a bankruptcy, and subsequently became extinct, having been dissolved by order of the court. Some years after such dissolution a fund became available for the payment of further dividends in the bankruptcy.

Held, that the dividends due to such corporation in respect of its proof passed to the Crown as bona vacantia.

Appeal from a decision of the county court at Manchester.

In 1847 the firm of Higginson & Dean became bankrupt with liabilities amounting to over £900,000. A trustee was appointed, proofs of creditors were admitted, dividends were declared, the trustee was released, and the official receiver became, ex officio, trustee in the bankruptcy. Among the creditors admitted to prove was a corporation known as the Royal Bank of Liverpool, which was dissolved by an order of the court under the Companies Act upon the 29th of October, 1887, when its books were destroyed.

In 1897 the official receiver discovered that the bankrupts had been the owners of a large number of shares in an undertaking called the Leeds and Thirsk Railway, which had been subsequently taken over by the North-Eastern Railway. He obtained the allotment to himself of shares in the North-Eastern Railway equivalent to the bankrupt's holding in the Leeds and Thirsk Railway and sold them for the sum of £6,500, which was now available for the payment of a further dividend on the admitted claims.

Messrs. Littledale & Co., who were among the creditors admitted to prove, thereupon moved in the county court at Manchester to expunge the proof of the Royal Bank of Liverpool on the ground that that corporation was now extinct.

The Crown opposed the motion, claiming to be entitled to the dividends which would have been payable to the Royal Bank of Liverpool, as bona vacantia. The official receiver also opposed the motion, and suggested that the money in question ought to be paid into the Bankruptcy Estates (Unclaimed Dividend) Account.

The county court judge decided in favour of Messrs. Littledale & Co. and expunged the proof.

The Crown appealed.

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G., Ingle Joyce, and Horace Avory, for the Crown, the appellant.—The county court judge had no power to expunge the proof at all; the only ground for expunging a proof is that it has been improperly admitted, which is not contended in this case: the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, Schedule II., r. 23. The judgment was also wrong in deciding that the debt was gone, for the personal estate of extinct corporations vests in the Crown. Moreover, this is a case where there is a trust with no cestui que trust, and the benefits of the trust go to the Crown: Cunnack v. Edwards, 45 W. R. 99, [1896] 2 Ch. 679; Barclay v. Russell, 3 Vesey, 424; Taylor v. Haygarth, 14 Sim. 8.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Locke Scott, for Messrs. Littledale & Co., the respondents.—The Crown has no locus standi to claim here until the chose in action has been converted into a chattel, which will not take place in this case until a dividend has been declared: Ex parte Wackerbath, 2 Gl. & Jam. 151. The appellants are not entitled to appeal at all, for they are not "persons aggrieved" within section 104, sub-section 2, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. "Orders in bankruptcy matters shall, at the instance of any person aggrieved, be subject to appeal." They cannot claim this dividend as entitled to the benefits of a trust which has failed, for the only trust is to administer the estate in accordance with the law of bankruptcy—that is, to distribute dividends among the persons entitled to them at the time when the dividends are declared.

M. Muir Mackenzie, for the Board of Trade, suggested that the dividend should be paid into the Bankruptcy Estates (Unclaimed Dividend) Account.

Stewart Brown appeared for the official receiver.

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G., replied.

THE COURT reserved judgment.

Dec. 21.—WRIGHT, J., read the considered judgment of the court, which, after stating the facts, continued as follows: Subject to one difficulty I think that the grounds of the learned county court judge's decision cannot be maintained, and that the Crown is entitled to succeed. From the time of Lord Thurlow's decision in Middleton v. Spicer, in 1783, 1 Bro. C. C. 201, it has been an accepted proposition of law that chattels real or personal vested in a person as a mere trustee upon private trusts which have failed are, as a general rule held by him as a trustee for the Crown of bona vacantia; and during all the period which has elapsed since that decision no exception from the rule seems to have been established. It has been illustrated by many cases which show that the possession conferred on the trustee for the purposes of jurisdiction or administration gives no beneficial title, as by occupancy or otherwise, which he can conscientiously set up against the Crown. Such cases are (1797) Barclay v. Russell, 3 Ves., at p. 430, per Lord Loughborough; (1853) Powell v. Merrett, 1 W. R. 243, 1 Sm. & G. 381; (1854) Cradock v. Owen, 2 W. R. 319, 2 Sm. & G. 241; (1859) Read v. Stedman, 26 Beav. 495, 7 W. R. Ch. Dig. 106; Cunnack v. Edwards, 45 W. R. 99, [1896] 2 Ch. 679. And in Dyke v. Walford, 5 Moo. P. C. 434, the right of the Crown as against the ordinary to bona vacantia in cases of intestacy is traced back to very early times. Nor, I think, is there any authority for holding that the Crown is in any worse position in relation to chattels real in trust for a corporation which has become dissolved than in relation to chattels held in trust for a natural person deceased. The same principle seems applicable in both cases. The courts will not allow a person who has obtained title or possession as a mere trustee of chattels to set up unconscientiously any beneficial title by occupancy, possession, or otherwise. The text-books, such as those of Kyd, Grant, and Lewin, agree, though in some cases with an "it seems," that the Crown is entitled to the personal estate of a dissolved corporation aggregate. Nor is there any authority for holding that the creditors other than the dissolved bank have any jus accrescendi or benefit of survivorship entitling them to the share of the creditor who has become extinct without successor or representative. In Ashley v. Ashley, (1876) 25 W. R. 356, 4 Ch. D. 757, where, in a suit for administration, such a claim was made and failed, James, L.J., asked why the Crown might not take out representation to the missing petitioners. Primâ facie, therefore, as it seems to me, the Crown is entitled.

The difficulty is that, as it is argued, on the dissolution of the bank not only did its artificial personality come to an end, but the debt due to it from the bankrupts lapsed or was extinguished. The existence of a debt, it is said, imports the existence of two parties to the obligation, and the obligation of the debtors to the bank is not, upon the dissolution of the bank, converted into an obligation of the debtors to the Crown. The bank, therefore, has ceased to be a creditor, and the Crown has not become a creditor, and the ground of the proof has gone as completely as if it had never existed, and the proof ought to be expunged, with the consequence that the official receiver is now a trustee of the fund for the remaining creditors as if there never had been any others. Therefore, it is argued, there is no failure of cestui que trustent and no property which, for default of any cestui que trust to claim it, can be said to be held in trust for the Crown. The authorities for the proposition that on the dissolution of a corporation aggregate debts due to or from it are extinguished are by no means clear or satisfactory. In 1 Bl. Com., p. 484, and in 2 Kyd on Corporations, and in Grant on Corporations, p. 303, such a proposition is stated, but in terms which suggest that no more is meant than that, after the dissolution, the individuals who were members or officers of the corporation cannot sue or be sued in respect of its rights or obligations, and this is all that is established by the cases there cited. "The debts of a corporation," Blackstone says, "either to it or from it, are totally extinguished by its dissolution; so that the members thereof cannot recover or be charged with them, in their natural capacities; agreeable to that maxim of the civil law, si quid universitati debetur, singulis non debetur; nec, quod debet universitas, singuli debent," citing Co. Lit. 13, which, however, does not seem to illustrate the proposition. The American decision in the case of The State Bank v. The State, (1823) 1 Blackford's Indiana Rep. 267, relies on those authorities as supporting the general proposition, but it does not advert to this qualification, or add new references to authority, and the authorities cited do not in any way support the proposition except as so qualified. Grant on Corporations (published in 1850), p. 303, is explicit in the same sense as the American case last cited, but does not refer to any authority which, so far as I can see, has any bearing on the matter. Nor do the old authorities as to the effect of dissolution of municipal or other corporations add anything decisive of the question. In the 17th and 18th centuries corporations aggregate, constituted by charter or letters patent, were numerous, and questions frequently occurred as to the effect upon their rights and obligations of dissolution, revival, and re-incorporation with or without change of name or constitution. Many references to such cases will be found in Anderson's Reports and in Rex. v. Pasmore, 3 T. R. 199. I cannot find that in any case the rights or obligations of a corporation were held to be affected by a technical dissolution. Nor, on the other hand, can I find a case in which such a question has been decided where the corporation had not been revived or some provision made by statute or charter with reference to its obligations. In Mayor, &c., of Colchester v. Seaber, (1766) 3 Burr. 1866, the revived corporation sued in its own name on a bond given to the dissolved corporation, and succeeded. Sir F. Norton, for the plaintiff corporation, argued that the goods and chattels of the old corporation, including its choses in action, such as the bond, had on its dissolution passed to the Crown, and that the Crown in granting a charter of revival had regranted them to the revived corporation. Mr. Dunning, on the other side, neither admitted nor denied this, and the court is not reported to have expressed any opinion on this point, it being held that there was only a qualified dissolution, and no absolute break of continuity. Suppose the bank at the time of its dissolution had been in credit at another bank, or held notes of another bank, or had issued notes of its own, would the dissolution have destroyed the obligation in these cases? In the United States of America there have been two decisions of Story, J., which are against such a conclusion. In Wood v. Dummer, 3 Mason 308, the charter of a bank had expired. Before dissolution the bank had distributed its capital amongst its stockholders without providing for payment of outstanding notes. It was held that after the dissolution the noteholders were entitled to make the stockholders account for moneys impressed with a trust of which the stockholders had notice. In Mumma v. The Potomac Co., 8 Peters, 281, it was contended that the dissolution of an insolvent incorporated company under a statute of the Legislature of a State was inoperative as being contrary to the Constitution which prohibited the impairing of obligations by the Legislatures of particular States. Story, J., however, held that the obligations were not impaired by the dissolution—"the obligation of those contracts survives, and the creditors may enforce their claims against any property belonging to the corporation which has not passed into the hands of bonâ fide purchasers, but is still held in trust for the company or for the stockholders thereof at the time of its dissolution in any manner permitted by the local laws." This statement of the law may not perhaps be entirely applicable in this country, but it requires consideration. It might be reasonable to enact that in analogy the immemorial law of executors and administrators and the statute of 31 Edw. 3, st. 1, c. 11, on the dissolution of a corporation aggregate all its rights, including its rights of action on executed contracts, such as those evidenced by bank notes or bonds or on claims in debt devolve upon the Crown subject to payment of the corporation's own debts. It would, however, I think, in the present state of the authorities, be judicial legislation to declare the Crown entitled to maintain actions in such cases except where it can allege a trust. Such a declaration may have to be made or advisedly refused in the case of some of the rapidly-increasing number of companies which are being dissolved under the Companies Acts. But in the present case it is not necessary to decide this question. Even if it be the law that a debt due to a corporation aggregate is extinguished by the dissolution of the corporation, I do not think that it follows that the Crown's claim fails in this case. The original assignees in the bankruptcy and their successors in office have from the time of the bankruptcy been entitled to the old railway shares in trust for such creditors as had been or might be admitted to proof. The bank immediately before its dissolution was not a mere creditor. It was a creditor whose claim was in proof. Its claim was no longer a mere right of action for a debt. It could no longer have maintained an action as for a debt. The debt had been at any rate provisionally merged in an equitable execution (1 Atkyns, 67; Twiss v. Massey, per Lord Hardwicke; Cooke's Bankruptcy Law (4th ed.), ch. 1, p. 5), and the right to sue had been replaced, not, indeed, by any particular interest in any specific chattels, but by a right to have all the assets as and when realized applied pro rata for the bank's benefit with the other creditors. This right, as it seems to me, existed as an equitable interest or chattel at the time of the dissolution, and upon the dissolution of the bank that chattel or interest was not annihilated, but continued to be existing personal property which devolved upon the Crown as bona vacantia as completely as any other equitable interest. Alternatively, the case may be stated in a different way, but with the same result. From the time of the bankruptcy a title to the shares has been vested in the bankrupts' assignees and their successors in trust down to 1887 for the bank and the other creditors. In 1887 the bank disappeared. The assignees thereupon did not cease to hold the title to the shares, nor did they cease to hold it as trustees. Their title did not depend upon the continued existence of any particular debt or of any particular creditors, nor did it become extinct upon the extinction of particular creditors. It continued to be a title upon trust, and the Crown takes the place of the extinct cestui que trust. Suppose all the creditors had been corporations aggregate and all had become dissolved, it seems clear that the assignees could not have taken the property as their own as against the Crown. It does not seem necessary to examine minutely the provisions of the old Bankruptcy Acts in order to determine whether the money can be regarded as unclaimed dividends belonging to the statutory fund. If the proof is to stand good for the Crown's benefit, that is another way of saying that the moneys are not unclaimed dividends. If, on the other hand, the proof ought to be expunged on the ground that the creditor and the creditor's claim are absolutely extinguished, then the case must be the same as if the proof had never been admitted, and the money ought to be divided amongst the other creditors. Unclaimed dividend seems to me to mean dividend which has been declared upon admitted and existing proofs, but which the persons entitled to it neglect to claim; it supposes the existence of someone who could claim and who omits to claim. Here the dividend belongs either to the Crown or to the other creditors, and it is claimed, and therefore it is not unclaimed dividend. For these reasons I think that the appeal must be allowed. The costs of all parties will be allowed out of the fund.

Motion for a grant to the Crown of letters of administration to the personal estate of Elizabeth Bartley, who died at Wortley, near Leeds, on the 22nd of July, 1898, a widow without issue, a bastard, and intestate.

The deceased was entitled to personal estate and also to an estate in fee simple in six cottages.

Newson, for the Crown, in support of the motion.—The Crown is not bound by section 1 of the Land Transfer Act, 1897, and therefore the real estate passes by escheat direct to the Crown, and is not by that section vested in the nominee of the Crown as administrator. The law officers have given an opinion that the Crown is not bound by the Land Transfer Act, 1897, and that its rights remain as before. The grant should go as before the Act—simply as to the personalty, not mentioning the realty.

JEUNE, P.—I think that is so. There will be a grant of letters of administration of the deceased's personal estate to the Solicitor of the Treasury without any mention of real estate.

"THE BRUNEL." (a.)

Ship—Limitation of liability—Unregistered steam-tug under fifteen tons burden entitled to limit her liability—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 2, 3, 72, 503—Meaning of ship "not exceeding fifteen tons burden."

The 2nd section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, provides: "(1) Every British ship shall, unless exempted from registration, be registered under the Act. (2) If a ship required by this Act to be registered is not registered under this Act, she shall not be recognized as a British ship"; whilst amongst the ships exempted from registration under the Act are, by section 3 of the same Act, "ships not exceeding fifteen tons burden employed solely in navigation on the rivers or coasts of the United Kingdom." By section 503, the owners of a steamship shall not, where without their actual fault or privity any loss or damage is caused to any other vessel by reason of the improper navigation of their steamship, be liable to damages beyond £8 for each ton of the "gross tonnage" of the steamship without deduction on account of engine room, but deducting the space "certified" under the Act to be occupied by seamen.

Held, that the words "tons burthen" in section 3, meant the tonnage measured in accordance with the provisions of the Act and the tonnage regulations thereof.

Held, consequently that a ship, employed solely in navigation on the rivers or coasts of the United Kingdom and not exceeding fifteen tons burthen so ascertained, was properly exempted from registry; and that her owners were entitled to limit their liability under section 503 to £8 per ton of her "gross tonnage."

This was an action of limitation of liability instituted on behalf of the Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of the City of Bristol, the owners of the steamship Brunel, a steam-tug, used by the plaintiffs in the River Avon and the Bristol Docks for the purpose of limiting their liability in pursuance of the eighth part of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, in respect of a collision which occurred on the 27th of October, 1897, when The Brunel came into collision with the steam-tug Iris at a time when The Iris was towing the steamship Glanmere, which took the ground and sustained damage.

The plaintiffs, in their statement of claim, pleaded that The Brunel was exempted from registry under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, and that her gross tonnage ascertained in accordance with the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, without deduction on account of engine-room space was 35·99 tons, and deducting 6·73 tons occupied by seamen and appropriated to their use and certified pursuant to the said Act, was 28·26 tons.

The defendants, the owners of The Glanmere, denied that The Brunel was exempted from registry under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, and also denied the above-mentioned statements in the statement of claim as to the tonnage of The Brunel.

Nov. 14.—The action was heard before Barnes, J.

It appeared that The Brunel was not registered, and that her tonnage, if measured in accordance with the tonnage regulations contained in the second schedule of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, would not, after deducting the appropriate allowance for engine room and her certified allowance for crew space, exceed the tonnage of fifteen tons.

The statutes cited by counsel and the arguments advanced by them are fully stated in the judgment.

Dec. 7.—BARNES, J.—This is a suit of limitation of liability brought by the plaintiffs, the owners of a small steam-tug called The Brunel, used by them in the River Avon and the Bristol Docks, to limit their liability in respect of damage caused by the negligent navigation of The Brunel on the 27th of October last, whereby she came into collision with the steam-tug Iris, which was towing the defendants' steamship Glanmere. The defendants alleged that in consequence of the collision their vessel took the ground and sustained damage. In a suit of damage in this court by the defendants against the plaintiffs, the latter have admitted that the said collision occurred by reason of the negligent navigation of The Brunel by the plaintiffs' servants, but have denied that the damages sustained by the defendants were the result of such collision. The plaintiffs have, however, agreed to submit to judgment in respect of such damages as should hereafter be proved to have been caused by such collision. The collision happened without the actual fault or privity of the plaintiffs. They have settled with the owners of The Iris, and they now claim to be entitled to limit their liability in respect of the damages for which they may be liable to the defendants.

The question in the case is whether they are so entitled. The Brunel was not registered under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. Section 3 of that Act is as follows: "The following ships are exempted from registry under this Act—(1) Ships not exceeding fifteen tons burden employed solely in navigation upon the rivers or coast of the United Kingdom or on the rivers or coast of some British possession within which the managing owners of the ships are resident. . . ." As The Brunel was employed solely in navigation in the River Avon it was contended by the plaintiffs that if she did not exceed fifteen tons burden she would be exempted from registry by the 3rd section above cited and that owners would be entitled to the protection of limited liability conferred by the 503rd section of the same Act; but it was admitted by the plaintiffs that if she exceeded fifteen tons burden the effect of the 2nd, 72nd, and 503rd sections of the

(a.) Reported by C. F. JEMMETT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Act would be to prevent her from being recognized as a British ship, and her owners from obtaining the protection of the 503rd section. It was admitted by the plaintiffs that The Brunel could carry more than fifteen tons weight in her cargo spaces and have a proper freeboard, but it was proved before me that if she were measured in accordance with the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, her gross tonnage would be 35·99 tons and that her boiler and engine space would measure 17·80 tons and her crew space 6·73 tons; so that if those spaces were deducted from the gross tonnage her tonnage would be under fifteen tons. If the allowance for propelling power is made in accordance with the Act, the evidence shows that one and three-quarters the amount of the engine and boiler space and the amount of crew space would be deducted, according to the Act, from the gross tonnage, to arrive at the register tonnage, and the result would be a minus quantity. This is owing to the allowance for propelling power being fixed by the Act at one and three-quarters the actual boiler and engine-room space. The plaintiffs maintain that the words "fifteen tons burden" in the 3rd section of the Act mean fifteen tons measurement according to the Act of 1894; while the defendants contend that they mean a capacity to carry fifteen tons' weight of cargo. It was not disputed, as I understand the argument, that, ordinarily speaking, fifteen tons burden means a capacity to carry fifteen tons; but the point made by the plaintiffs was that the words "tons burden" in the Act of 1894 are used in a sense in which they have been used in prior Acts of Parliament relating to the registration of British vessels, and refer to tons of capacity as measured by the Act. The first Act to which I need refer is 7 & 8 Will. 3, c. 22 (1696). This Act required English ships to be registered in order to be qualified to trade to or from the plantations in America, and proof had to be made on oath in a form set out in the 17th section of the Act, which amongst other things described the ship as of "—— (burthen) tons," but there was no provision as to the mode of arriving at the tonnage. By the Act 6 Geo. 1, c. 21 (1719) it was provided (section 29) that no brandy should be imported on any ship "of the burthen of 50 tons or under," and that ships of the burthen of 50 tons or under, in part or fully laden with brandy at anchor or hovering within two leagues of the shore might be compelled to come into port. And the 33rd section is as follows: "And for the preventing disputes that may arise respecting the admeasurement of ships laden with brandy and other spirits or ships hovering on the coast, be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid that the following rule shall be observed therein—that is to say, take the length of the keel within board (so much as she treads on the ground) and the breadth within board by the midship-beam from plank to plank and half the breadth for the depth, then multiply the length by the breadth and that product by the depth, and divide the whole by ninety-four, the quotient will give the true contents of the tonnage according to which rule the whole of such ships or vessels shall be measured and ascertained any law, custom, or usage to the contrary notwithstanding. It is, I think, clear that the tonnage arrived at in the above manner was to be considered as fixing the burthen of the vessel. The reason for this appears to have been that at the time as ships were then constructed the measurement in the manner above stated gave approximately the burthen of the vessel. In an old work on Shipbuilding, by William Sutherland, published in 1729, which has been lent me by the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, it is stated (Part 2, p. 3) that it was a general rule to find the tonnage of a vessel by taking the length of the keel and the breadth from outside the ship on one side to the outside of the other and multiplying that breadth with the length, and again by half the said breadth and dividing the product by ninety-four. The author points out that there is no exact rule to find the tonnage, and two ships may be of equal length, breadth, and depth, and yet one shall carry two or three hundred tons more than the other, and he makes certain suggestions as to measurement. In the first part of the work (p. 1) it is stated that the rule made use of to find the tonnage is a medium rule, and there is little doubt that the provisions of the above-mentioned 33rd section were derived from the general rule. The Act of 15 Geo. 2, c. 31 (1742) contains further provisions for regulating the plantation trade, and gives a form of oath by the master in which he is to state the burthen of his vessel in tons. In 1773 the Act 13 Geo. 3, c. 74, entitled an Act for the better ascertaining the tonnage and burthen of ships and vessels importing and exporting goods into and from this kingdom or hovering on the coasts thereof . . . was passed. Section 1 of that Act enacted: "The tonnage and burthen of any ship or vessel importing or exporting brandy or other spirituous liquors or any other goods whatsoever into or from this kingdom or hovering upon the coasts thereof, or where the owner or proprietor or other person shall be entitled to any bounty or allowance according to the tonnage of any ship or vessel, and in any other case whatsoever, where the tonnage or burthen of any ship or vessel shall be necessary to be ascertained and known by any Act or Acts of Parliament made or hereafter to be made concerning the revenues of customs, excise, or salt duty, the rule for admeasuring such ships or vessels shall be as follows—that is to say, the length shall be taken in a straight line along the rabbet of the keel of the ship, from the back of the main stern-post to a perpendicular line from the fore part of the main stern under the bowsprit, from which subtracting three-fifths of the breadth the remainder shall be esteemed the just length of the keel to find the tonnage; and the breadth shall be taken from the outside of the outside plank in the broadest part of the ship be it either above or below the main whales exclusive of all manner of doubling planks that may be wrought upon the sides of the ship, then multiplying the length of the keel by the breadth so taken, and that product by half the breadth and dividing the whole by ninety-four, the quotient shall be deemed the true contents of the tonnage." By section 2 the Act was not to alter the method of measuring coal vessels and vessels employed in the white herring fishery. It will be noticed that the words "tonnage" and "burthen" are used in the Act as if they denoted the same thing. By section 3 of 26 Geo. 3, c. 60 (1760) the provisions of 7 & 8 Will 3, c. 22 were extended, and every vessel having a deck or being of the burthen of fifteen tons or upwards belonging to Her Majesty's subjects in Great Britain . . . and the colonies was required to be registered, and a certificate obtained in the form set out in the Act. This form shows what particulars of the vessel had to be given, and with regard to the tonnage uses these words: "——admeasured (burthen) tons." Section 14 prescribes the method to be adopted for ascertaining the tonnage of vessels when afloat, which is arrived at by multiplying the length, measured as directed by the Act by the breadth and the product by the half breadth and dividing by ninety-four. When steam vessels were introduced the rules prescribed for sailing vessels were not suitable for ascertaining the true tonnage of steamers. And in 1819 the Act 59 Geo. 3, c. 5 was passed, which determined how the tonnage of steam vessels was to be ascertained. The length of the engine-room was to be deducted from the length of the vessel and the calculation then proceeded in a similar way to that of sailing vessels. The effect of this was to give the tonnage of the cargo-carrying space in a steam vessel. The Act for the Encouragement of British Shipping and Navigation (6 Geo. 4, c. 109), and the Act for Registering British Vessels (6 Geo. 4, c. 110) (1825) preserved the exemption from registry of British vessels under fifteen tons burthen used in navigating in British rivers and upon British coasts, and prescribed similar rules to those then in force for measuring vessels and ascertaining their tonnage. The certificate of registry was to be in the form set out in the second of these Acts, which required the burthen of the ship to be set out in tons, and it appears to follow that the number of tons was that ascertained according to the provisions of the Act. Similar Acts with amendments were passed in 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 54 and c. 55), but the said exemption and the mode of measurement remained the same. As the mode of ascertaining the tonnage of vessels under the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 55 and previous Acts led to inaccurate conclusions, it was felt desirable that a change should be made, and a committee was appointed in 1834 to consider the subject, and as a result of their recommendations the Act 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 56 (1835) was passed. That Act recites the Act of 1833, and then recites as follows: "Whereas it is considered that the capacity of a ship is the fairest standard by which to regulate its tonnage, that internal measurement will afford the most accurate and convenient method of ascertaining that capacity, and that the adoption of such a mode of admeasurement will tend to the interests of the shipbuilder and the owner as well as to the proper collection of the dues which by law are payable on tonnage, and it is expedient to alter and amend the law in this respect"; and it then proceeds to lay down an elaborate mode of measurement in order to ascertain steam vessels, sailing vessels, and laden vessels. In steamers the cubical contents of the engine-room were to be deducted from the total tonnage in order to arrive at the true register tonnage. The 3rd section of the Act is as follows: "And be it further enacted that the tonnage or burthen of every ship belonging to the United Kingdom ascertained in the manner hereinbefore directed shall in respect of any such ship which shall be registered after the commencement of this Act (except as hereinafter mentioned) be inserted in the certificate of the register thereof, and be taken and deemed to be the tonnage and burthen thereof for the the purposes of the said recited Act." Tonnage and burthen are treated as having the same meaning. The recital shows that the object of the Act was partly to take away the temptation to build vessels of such a form that they might measure less than their burthen. In the Act for the General Regulation of the Customs (8 & 9 Vict. c. 86), passed in 1845, the 138th section provided that the tonnage and burthen of every British ship, within the meaning of the Act, should be the tonnage set forth in her certificate of registry, and the tonnage or burthen of every other ship should, for the purpose of the Act, be ascertained in the same manner as the tonnage of British ships was ascertained. Here, again, the words "tonnage and burthen" are used as if they had the same meaning. The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, which amended and consolidated the Acts relating to merchant shipping, introduced further improvements as to the mode of measuring the tonnage of vessels, though it is well known that the tonnage arrived at by this mode is generally much less than the quantity of tons' weight of cargo a ship can carry. The 19th section contained an exception from registry of vessels not exceeding fifteen tons or under, and similar words are contained in the 3rd section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, which Act consolidated the Merchant Shipping Acts up to that date. The limitation of liability which had been introduced by earlier Acts, in particular by 53 Geo. 3, c. 159, was in the cases mentioned in the Act of 1854 the value of the ship and freight, provided that in case of loss of life or personal injury to passengers the value of ship and freight was not to be taken at less than £15 per registered ton; but in the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act, 1862, the limit was to be £8 per ton for the loss of ship and goods, and £15 per ton for loss of life or personal injury either alone or jointly with damage to ship or goods.

This examination of the above-mentioned Acts prior to 1894 brings me to the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, and has led me to the conclusion that in the legislation from first to last prior to this Act the words "burthen" or "tons burthen" have been used with a meaning which was the same as that of the tonnage of a vessel ascertained in the manner directed by the Acts for the time being—that is to say, the registered tonnage.

The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, is an Act consolidating the enactments relating to merchant shipping, and in order to ascertain the meaning of the words "tons burden" as used therein, it is legitimate to ascertain whether these words have been used in any special sense in prior Acts of Parliament dealing with the same subject (see Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes, 3rd edition, p. 50). This I have shown to have been the case, and I am of opinion that these words in section 3 of the Act of 1894 are used in reference to the tonnage of a vessel measured in accordance with the provisions of the Act and the tonnage regulations thereof. The words "tons burden" are found in other places in the Act—namely, the 3rd, 90th, and 625th sections, but there is nothing in these sections inconsistent with the aforesaid meaning. The same words are also to be found in that part of the Act headed Engagement of Seamen, where the words "tons burden" and registered tonnage are clearly used in the same sense. Moreover, the meaning placed upon those words by the defendants would give rise to great difficulty in fixing the exact burthen of a vessel. The quantity a vessel can carry depends in part on the season of the year and other variable circumstances, whereas the measurement gives definite results. The Act 61 & 62 Vict. c. 44 and rule 8a thereof do not, in my judgment, affect this case.

I find, therefore, that The Brunel did not exceed fifteen tons burthen within the meaning of the 3rd section of the Act of 1894. Then the 503rd section of the same Act limits the liability of a ship, British or foreign, in the case of such claims as that of the defendants to £8 per ton of their ship's tonnage, which in the case of a steamship is to be her gross tonnage without deduction on account of engine-room, and in the case of a sailing ship is to be her registered tonnage, with a proviso that there shall not be included in such tonnage any space occupied by seamen or apprentices or appropriated to their use, which is certified under the regulations scheduled to the Act with regard thereto. It was not argued before me that as The Brunel was not in fact registered, although she did not exceed fifteen tons burthen, her owners were not entitled to limit their liability in the present case, no doubt because the effect of the 72nd, 77th, 503rd, and 508th sections of the Act appears to be to entitle the owners of a British vessel which is exempted from registry under section 3, and has not therefore been registered nor had her tonnage ascertained for the purpose of registry, to limit their liability by an amount calculated upon the vessel's tonnage ascertained by measuring her according to the Act and the tonnage regulations thereof. The tonnage of The Brunel for the purpose of the calculation is 35·99 tons, and as in the circumstances, there is no certificate as to crew space, the amount thereof cannot be deducted owing to the express provisions of section 503 and the 6th schedule to the Act. In the result there will be the usual decree of limitation of liability in an amount calculated at £8 per ton on 35·99 tons, and the costs of the suit must as usual be borne and paid by the plaintiffs. The affidavit verifying the claim is not quite complete; it does not exclude any claim for loss of life, and I think I intimated that there is no distinct statement that The Brunel belongs to the plaintiffs. Subject to an affidavit being filed dealing with these two points, the decree will be in the usual form.

To watch or beset a man's house with a view to compel him to do or not to do what it is lawful for him not to do or to do is wrongful and without lawful authority unless some reasonable justification for it is consistent with the evidence. Such conduct would support an action on the case for a nuisance at common law. Proof that the nuisance was "peaceably to persuade other people" would be no defence to such an action.

Appeal of the defendants from the judgment of Byrne, J. (reported 46 W. R. 461).

The plaintiffs were a firm of leather bag manufacturers. The defendants were members and officials of a registered trade union, called the Amalgamated Society of Leather Workers.

The action arose out of a strike of the plaintiffs' workpeople, instigated by the trade union. The workpeople refused to continue to work for the plaintiffs after the expiration of their current engagements, and the plaintiffs' premises were picketed by direction of the union.

A strike was also ordered against a bag maker named Adolph Schoenthal, who employed his own workpeople, and did work for the plaintiffs on his own premises. His premises were also picketed.

In February, 1896, an interim injunction had been granted by North, J., and this was affirmed by the Court of Appeal with a slight modification (see 45 W. R. 19, [1896] 1 Ch. 811).

(a.) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Byrne, J., on the trial of the action, granted a perpetual injunction restraining the defendants, Percy Cornwall Wilkins, Charles Clarke, Alexander Thompson, John Laverick, and Frederick Goodhall, from watching or besetting the plaintiffs' works or place of business and the approaches thereto for the purpose of persuading or otherwise preventing persons from working for the plaintiffs, or for any purpose except merely to obtain or communicate information, and from watching or besetting the premises of Adolph Schoenthal for the purpose of persuading or otherwise preventing him from working for the plaintiffs, or for any purpose except merely to obtain or communicate information.

By the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, s. 7: "Every person who, with a view to compel any other person to abstain from doing or to do any act which such other person has a legal right to do or abstain from doing, wrongfully and without legal authority" (inter alia) "(4) watches or besets the house or other place where such other person resides, or works, or carries on business, or happens to be, or the approach to such house or place, shall, on conviction thereof by a court of summary jurisdiction, or on indictment as hereinafter mentioned, be liable either to pay a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds, or to be imprisoned for a term not exceeding three months, with or without hard labour. Attending at or near the house or place where a person resides, or works, or carries on business, or happens to be, or the approach to such house or place, in order merely to obtain or communicate information, shall not be deemed a watching or besetting within the meaning of this section."

The defendants appealed.

The arguments sufficiently appear from the judgments.

Cur. adv. vult

Dec. 20.—The following written judgments were delivered:

LINDLEY, M.R.—The construction put by this court on 38 & 39 Vict. c. 86, ss. 3 and 7, when this case was heard in March, 1896, is adverse to the appellants, and was, in my judgment, correct. Having reconsidered my own judgment, I see nothing to recall or qualify. Upon the present appeal, however, one or two important questions were raised which do not appear to have been considered on the former occasion, and to them I will confine myself.

The great point made by the appellants' counsel turned on the word "wrongfully" in section 7 and on the effect of Allen v. Flood, 46 W. R. 258, [1898] A. C. 1, on the meaning of that word. He contended that to "watch and beset" another person's house was only illegal if done—(1) with a view to compel him to abstain from doing or to do some act which he has a right to do or not to do; (2) wrongfully and without legal authority. He further contended that nothing could be said to be wrongful which did not violate some right of the complainant; and that there was nothing wrongful in watching or besetting a house simply in order peacefully to persuade others to conduct themselves in some particular way which was not unlawful for them to follow. This argument is, in my opinion, based on a misconstruction of section 7. This section is a penal section, and the words "wrongfully and without legal authority" must be inserted in an indictment or information framed on the enactment, and the specific acts which the complainant was to be compelled to do or not to do ought also to be specified in a conviction by a magistrate: see The Queen v. McKenzie, 41 W. R. 144, [1892] 2 Q. B. 519. Moreover, if on the trial the evidence before the court is consistent with the legality of the acts complained of, this reasonably possible legality must be excluded by evidence, before the accused can be properly convicted. But it is not necessary to show by other evidence than that which proves the overt acts complained of, the legality of them if no justification or excuse for them is reasonably consistent with the facts proved. This is the principle always applied in criminal prosecutions in which the words "feloniously," "wrongfully," or "maliciously" are introduced into the charge and have to be proved before the person accused can be properly convicted: see Archbold's Criminal Pleading and Evidence (19th ed.), pp. 64-67. That this is the correct method of construing and dealing with the words "wrongfully and without lawful authority" in section 7 is, in my opinion, perfectly plain if attention is paid to subheads 1, 2, 3, and 5, to which those words are as applicable as they are to sub-head 4. If the overt acts mentioned in sub-head 1, for example, in using violence or intimidation are proved, and it is proved that they were done with a view to compel, &c., and there is no reasonable ground for justifying them, it is unnecessary to give further evidence to prove that they were committed "wrongfully and without legal authority": see The Queen v. McKenzie, at pp. 521-3. If this be true of all the sub-heads except 4 (watching and besetting) I can discover no justification for giving the words "wrongfully and without lawful authority" any different meaning or effect when applied to 4—viz., "watching or besetting." The truth is that to watch or beset a man's house with a view to compel him to do or not to do what it is lawful for him not to do or to do is wrongful and without lawful authority unless some reasonable justification for it is consistent with the evidence. Such conduct seriously interferes with the ordinary comfort of human existence and ordinary enjoyment of the house beset, and such conduct would support an action on the case for a nuisance at common law: see Bamford v. Turnley, 10 W. R. 803, 3 B. & S. 62; Broder v. Saillard, 24 W. R. 1011, 2 Ch. D. 692, at p. 701, per Jessel, M.R.; Walter v. Selfe, 4 De G. & Sm. 315; Crump v. Lambert, 15 W. R. 417, L. R. 3 Eq. 409. Proof that the nuisance was "peaceably to persuade other people" would afford no defence to such an action. Persons may be peaceably persuaded provided the method employed to persuade is not a nuisance to other people.

Another point made by the appellants' counsel was that what was done to Schoenthal gave the plaintiffs no cause of action. This point was raised and considered and decided by the court on the former appeal, and I might say no more. But as I do not remember whether the particular argument urged by Mr. Hardy was used on that occasion, I will add that, in my opinion, his contention cannot be supported. It is based on the expression "such other person." It is said that to beset one person's house with a view to compel someone else is not within the section. Such a construction would render the Act nugatory in a great number of cases clearly within the mischief intended to be remedied. But a more direct answer to the argument is that "such other" means "any other." This seems plain if attention is paid to the language of the first part of the section where these words first occur. Moreover, the word "person" in the singular must be read so as to include "persons" in the plural (see 52 & 53 Vict. c. 63, s. 1), and if this is borne in mind the argument is seen at once to be untenable.

I do not think it necessary to refer to the older Acts to which Mr. Hardy called our attention; nor to the authorities he cited. They are instructive, and the late Mr. Russell Gurney's charge to the grand jury in the Cabinetmakers' case (Reg. v. Hibbert, 13 Cox C. C. 82) is a masterly statement of the law as it stood in April, 1875. But there is nothing in those authorities or in that charge which shows that the interpretation put upon the present Act by this court in this case on the former appeal, and by Byrne, J., since, is wrong. Nor is Allen v. Flood of any real use in construing the statute with which we have to deal.

As regards the facts the evidence was amply sufficient to prove the plaintiffs' case. The whole object of what was done was to compel the plaintiffs to comply with Mr. Wilkins's terms, and although there was no violence or overt threat of violence, it is quite plain that the relays of men set to watch and beset the plaintiffs' house (and the house of Schoenthal, who worked for him) were sent to do, and that they did, a great deal more than "attend" where they were "in order merely to obtain or communicate information." It is all very well to talk about peaceable persuasion and to draw fine lines between persuading and giving information. In this case there is no difficulty whatever in coming to the conclusion that what was done was watching and besetting as distinguished from attending "in order merely to obtain or communicate information." That the provisions of the Act were infringed appears to me to be plain and beyond all reasonable doubt. The appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

CHITTY, L.J.—This appeal by the defendants is limited to the injunction granted by Byrne, J., against watching and besetting. The injunction is in the terms of the order pronounced by the Court of Appeal on the motion. He postponed giving judgment until after the decision of the House of Lords in Allen v. Flood, and after consideration he held that Allen v. Flood did not affect the decision of the Court of Appeal on the motion, but that it did preclude him from granting a further injunction which the plaintiffs asked for. From that decision there is no appeal by the plaintiffs.

The facts proved at the trial were to the same effect as those given in evidence on the motion, except that in two instances Byrne, J., held that the evidence of actual interference was not so strong. He found that it was clearly proved that the appellants watched and beset the plaintiffs' works or place of business and the approaches thereto for the purpose of persuading or otherwise preventing persons from working for the plaintiffs, and for purposes other than that of merely obtaining or communicating information. This finding of facts is accepted by counsel on both sides. It was admitted by the plaintiffs' counsel that the pickets (as they are called) used no violence or intimidation or threats. The picketing extended over some months, covered all the working hours of the day, and was conducted by relays of men in succession. The object in view was clearly shown by the white cards distributed by the pickets and the other documents referred to. The picketing and the acts done by the pickets were done with a view to compel the plaintiffs to abstain from doing or to do acts which the plaintiffs had a legal right to do or abstain from doing—viz., to compel them to change the mode of conducting their own business. To avoid any possible misapprehension, I state that the strike itself was lawful.

The question on the appeal in my opinion turns on the 7th section of the Conspiracy and Protection of Propery Act, 1875. The construction and effect of that section were dealt with by this court on the motion, and the decision then arrived at is binding on us, subject only to the point whether it can be shown to be erroneous as being in conflict with Allen v. Flood. I am unable to see that it is. The point decided in Allen v. Flood is that an act lawful in itself is not converted by a malicious or bad motive into an unlawful act so as to make the doer of the act liable to a civil action. No such general question of motive arises in the present case. The sole question is whether upon the facts the case is brought within the 7th section. To bring a case of watching or besetting within the section it must be shown that the watching or besetting was done with a view to compel a person to abstain from doing or to do any act which such person has a legal right to do or abstain from doing. That the watching and besetting were done with that view is found by the judge and not disputed. "View" does not import motive. It imports purpose. Speaking for myself, I prefer standing by the words which the Legislature has thought fit to employ. The acts complained of were done with the view stated in the section. Then it was urged that the watching and besetting mentioned in the 4th sub-section was not rendered unlawful by the section where it was done for the purpose of persuading workmen to abstain from taking work from the person sought to be compelled. I cannot accept that proposition. I think that where the view is established, the only case in which watching or besetting is allowed, or, in other words, is not unlawful, is that mentioned in the proviso at the end of the section—viz., where the attending at or near the house or place where a person resides, or works, or carries on business, or happens to be, or the approach to such house or place is "in order merely to obtain or communicate information." Attending in order to persuade is not within the proviso.

It is noticeable that the first section of the Act of 1871, which Act is repealed by the Act of 1875, contained no such proviso, and that the 7th section is more favourable to those who watched or beset. Mr. Cozens-Hardy, in his argument for the appellants, fastened on the words "wrongfully and without legal authority," and contended that they showed that the watching or besetting mentioned in the 4th sub-section were acts lawful in themselves unless it were shown in some way other than by proof of the facts of watching or besetting with the view mentioned at the beginning of the section, that the acts done were done wrongfully or without legal authority. But this argument cannot be sustained. "Wrongfully and without legal authority" applies equally to all the five sub-sections; and to take (by way of illustration) the 1st sub-section, the using of violence or intimidation or injury to property there specified are all of them unlawful acts in themselves. No just or sound construction of the section would permit words which in terms apply to all the sub-sections being confined to one sub-section only. But further, the acts of watching and besetting here proved in reference to the 4th sub-section and done with the view mentioned were acts in themselves unlawful at common law and are not made lawful by the Legislature. In my opinion they constitute a nuisance at common law. True it is that every annoyance is not a nuisance; the annoyance must be of a serious character and of such a degree as to interfere with the ordinary comforts of life. To watch or beset a man's house for the length of time and in the manner and with the view proved would undoubtedly constitute a nuisance of an aggravated character. It must be borne in mind that the 7th section, although it probably arose out of trade disputes, is not confined to trade disputes or to disputes between masters and men. It applies equally to all her Majesty's subjects of every class. It would embrace the case of besetting a man's house with a view to compel him not to receive guests or visitors. Further, I think that the whole argument on the words "wrongfully and without legal authority" is founded upon a misapprehension. The acts mentioned in the 4th sub-section being in themselves unlawful, the words "wrongfully and without legal authority" are inserted to provide for any unforeseen case in which the evidence of the overt acts may possibly show some lawful excuse or justification, or, to speak perhaps more correctly (as "authority" is said to cover "excuse," see The Queen v. Harvey, 19 W. R. 446, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 284), lawful authority or justification. The term "wrongfully" and its meaning in law were dealt with incidentally by many of the Lords who advised the House in Allen v. Flood. It will suffice to quote one passage to be found in Lord Herschell's speech, where he cites with approval the statement by Crompton, J., in his judgment in Lumley v. Gye, 1 W. R. 432, 2 Ell. & Bl. 216, that it must now be considered clear law that a person who "wrongfully and maliciously or, which is the same thing, with notice interrupts the relation subsisting between master and servant commits a wrongful act."

With regard to Schoenthal it was decided on the motion that the watching and besetting of his house or shop with a view to compel the plaintiffs were illegal acts on the part of the defendants for which the plaintiffs could sustain an action against them. On this appeal Mr. Cozens-Hardy raised what may have been a new point founded on the words "such other person," which run throughout the 7th section. It was urged that that besetting the house of one person with a view to compel another is not within the section. I think it is. Grammatically, "such other" refers to "any other person," the immediate antecedent. Besetting a workman to compel a master and besetting a master to compel a workman are both plaints within the mischief aimed at. Schöenthal was an outworker for the plaintiffs. The result is that the appellants have failed to show that the decision of the Court on the motion is in any way overruled by Allen v. Flood or by any principle laid down in that case.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I concur because I think this case is concluded by the judgment of this court on the interlocutory application. I agree that the case of Allen v. Flood in the House of Lords has no application to the case before us. I wish, however, to say a word or two on the construction of section 7 of the Act of 1875 upon which the judgment of this court turned. The section runs thus: [His lordship read the section, and continued:] Now, I think these words "wrongfully and without legal authority" mean unwarranted by law, which in an indictment for a nuisance is ordinarily expressed by the word "injuriously." The late Stephen, J., defines a common nuisance as "an act not warranted by law or an omission to discharge a legal duty which act or omission obstructs or causes inconvenience or damage to the public in the exercise of rights common to all her Majesty's subjects." This is a different thing from holding the words "wrongfully and without legal authority" to mean without lawful excuse, which would shift the onus from the prosecution to the defence. At common law, watching and besetting, apart from the law of conspiracy, might or might not be so conducted as to amount to a nuisance. Then comes the Act of 1875, which, in my opinion, is intended to define what watching and besetting shall in future be warranted by law, and the definition, in my opinion, means that watching and besetting shall in future be confined to "watching and besetting merely for the purpose of obtaining or communicating information." I think that the fact that a communication which invites the men to discontinue working for the master as soon as they lawfully may, does not thereby cause the communication to cease to be a communication within the meaning of the proviso. If the persuading takes any other shape than that of a communication within the meaning of the proviso of section 7, this would, in my opinion, make it unwarranted by this section, even though this persuasion might not otherwise be of such a character as to constitute a nuisance at common law; and even if the persuasion does take the shape of such a communication, yet it may be made in such a manner as to constitute a common law nuisance, and thus be wrongful. It is not, as I understand, suggested or found by Byrne, J., that there are any facts in the present case to constitute the present persuasion a common law nuisance.

I agree that "any other person" in sub-section 4 includes masters sought to be compelled, and not only the servant to whom the communication or persuasion is addressed. You must find the meaning of "such other person" by looking at the first part of section 7. These are my views, but I am, as I have already said, bound by the previous decision of the court.

GREY v. CURTICE. (a.)

Solicitor—Costs—Taxation—Purchase of land in register county—Scale fee—Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 44); General Order, r. 4; Schedule I., Part I.

The scale fee allowed to a purchaser's solicitor on a purchase of land, under the General Order to the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, for "completing the conveyance" covers the expense, in the case of a register county, of registering a memorial of the conveyance.

Appeal of the plaintiff from Kekewich, J.

An action having been brought by Mr. Grey, a solicitor, against a former client, an order was made in the action on the 14th of April, 1896, directing certain accounts to be taken between the plaintiff and defendant.

The plaintiff's bills of costs were brought in for taxation. One of these bills was for charges made by the plaintiff as solicitor in connection with the purchase by the defendant of certain land in Middlesex.

The taxing-master had allowed the plaintiff the scale fee on this purchase according to Schedule I., Part I., of the General Order under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, "for investigating title to freehold, copyhold, or leasehold property, and preparing and completing conveyance (including perusal and completion of contract, if any)." Upon that the question was raised whether the charges connected with the registration of the conveyance in the Middlesex Registry should not be allowed in addition to the scale fee, or whether such fee covered that business. The practice in the taxing-master's office had been to treat the scale fee as covering the registration.

The plaintiff carried in objections to the master's taxation, and the master answered and overruled them. The plaintiff then took out a summons asking that his objections might be allowed, and that it might be referred back to the master to vary his certificate accordingly.

Kekewich, J., dismissed the summons.

The plaintiff appealed.

Wheeler, Q.C., R. F. Norton, and Arthur May, for the appellant.—The registration is not part of the completion of the conveyance, even in a register county. The conveyance is valid without it. Nor does it come under "completion of contract." By Schedule I. an extra charge for obtaining the acknowledgment of a married woman to a deed is allowed, and that is a stronger case than this, because the acknowledgment by the married woman is necessary, but registration is not necessary for the validity of the conveyance. If it is not allowed solicitors who conduct purchases in register counties will have to do more work for their fees than solicitors conducting purchases in other counties: Drielsma v. Manifold, 42 W. R. 578, [1894] 3 Ch. 100. [CHITTY, L.J.—A solicitor need not work under the scale unless he wishes to do so.]

Church, for the respondent, was not called upon.

LINDLEY, M.R.—We have had an opportunity of consulting one of the taxing-masters and hearing his views. This appeal from the taxing-master involves a question of importance, which is, whether the scale fee allowed to a purchaser's solicitor for completing the conveyance does or does not cover the expense, in the case of a register county, of registering the conveyance. The expense of registering a conveyance in a register county is occasioned as follows: First, there is the preparation of the memorial which has to be registered. That is a matter which requires care and such professional skill as is to be expected from any solicitor who understands conveyancing. It cannot be done by the client himself. The memorial is a legal document; and we know perfectly well from experience that there are cases in the books where the effect of registration has been lost by reason of some defect in the memorial. Secondly, a clerk must be sent down to the office to register the memorial. Thirdly, there is the payment of a fee at the office for registering. That fee is, of course, a disbursement. Nobody supposes the scale covers that; but it is natural, with reference to this question, to observe that in rule 4 of the General Order under this Act the fee for registration is alluded to, and is excluded from the scale. The rule runs thus: "The remuneration prescribed by Schedule I. is not to include," among other things, "stamps, . . . fees paid on searches to public offices, on registrations, or to stewards of manors," and so on. The importance of that is that, when this scale was settled, the parties who settled it had their attention called to registration, among other things, and they say that the scale fee shall not include out-of-pocket expenses, and they leave the rest unexpressed. It was contended that in the expression "completing the conveyance" in the schedule is included the completion of it by registering a memorial of it when such step is necessary—that is to say, when the property is in Yorkshire or Middlesex. In answer to that it was said that, if so, solicitors in Yorkshire or Middlesex have more to do for their scale fee than solicitors in other counties. That may be so; but that result is unavoidable. Solicitors conducting purchases of property in Yorkshire or Middlesex must go and look at the register—that is quite obvious; and, on inquiry, I think the practical answer to Mr. Norton's contention is that experience shows the scale fee to be liberal enough to cover such a service as preparing and registering the memorial.

On these grounds, we are of opinion that this scale fee does cover the registration of deeds in register counties, and that registration does come, in a business sense, under the expression "completing the conveyance." That is the only point to which our attention has been called which deserves to be called a question of principle.

The appeal will be dismissed, with costs.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and will add a few words on the point as to registration. We have not to consider in the abstract the meaning of the phrase "completing the conveyance," but what it means in regard to this particular case. The second rule of the General Order provides that the remuneration of the solicitor "in respect of business connected with sales, purchases, . . . and other matters of conveyancing . . . is to be regulated as follows—namely, in respect of sales, purchases, and mortgages completed, the remuneration of the solicitor having the conduct of the business . . . is to be that prescribed in Part I. of Schedule I. to this order," that is, in other words, the remuneration is to be according to the prescribed scale. This rule, then, contemplates the application of the scale to the remuneration of the solicitor in respect of the business connected with sales and purchases completed. It is perfectly plain that if the property purchased is in a register county it is the duty of the purchaser's solicitor to advise his client that his conveyance should be registered, and if he did not give him such advice it would be a breach of duty for which he would be responsible to his client. Unless the client tells him positively not to do it—which would be most improbable—it would be his duty to propose and to do that which was necessary for the purpose of making the conveyance a complete deed of title: because if there was no registration of the deed, the title of the purchaser might be defeated under the statutes which require a registration, whether in Yorkshire or Middlesex.

That being so, I think there is good ground for saying that the language of the second rule should be regarded in construing the particular words used in Part I. of the schedule. Then, turning to the 4th rule, which deals in substance with costs out of pocket, which are not included in the scale for remuneration, I find that the fee for registration is particularly mentioned; and that shows that registrations, which plainly refer to registrations in register counties, were in the contemplation of the framers of the rule. Putting these things together, it appears to me that the reasonable intention of the framers of the rules, and the true meaning of the rules as they stand, are that the duty of preparing the memorial and of causing it to be registered in the proper office is included in the term "completing the conveyance." It is the doing of an act without which the conveyance might be avoided.

I concur in the observations of the Master of the Rolls with reference to the general liberality of the scale fees. Cases occur in which solicitors will not insist on the scale fee because it is considered more than ample to remunerate them for the services performed. But however this may be, I think that the scale fee is calculated on such a footing that the solicitors will not be mulcted in anything they are justly entitled to by way of remuneration by our holding, as we do, that this particular business is within the rule.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree; but I prefer to base my decision, so far as relates to this registration point, simply upon the practice. That is to say, we have got here a scale, and the words in Schedule I., Part I., undoubtedly are such as to render the construction which in practice has been put on those words a possible construction. Under those circumstances it seems to me that when in practice that construction has been acted upon for a series of years one ought not to put a different construction upon the words, even though the balance of one's opinion may be that, on the mere words themselves, the charges of the solicitor in respect of the registration are not included in the work that is covered by the fee. On that ground of the practice heretofore I concur in the judgment that has been pronounced.

But I wish to say that, in so far as an argument has been based upon rule 4, I cannot myself quite assent to that argument. Rule 4 deals entirely with out-of-pocket expenses, and it is as if the rule had said "The following out-of-pocket expenses shall not be covered by the fee." It does not seem to me that with regard to charges which are not for out-of-pocket expenses, as, for instance, for the professional skill and labour which are included in the preparation of the memorial, it can possibly be said that those charges are covered by the scale fee because of rule 4, which expresses the things that are to be omitted, and that therefore everything else must be included which is not expressed in rule 4. It seems to me that rule 4 is dealing entirely with out-of-pocket expenses and nothing else.

I have one other observation to make, and that is that I doubt whether one ought, in dealing with a matter of this sort, to take into consideration the quantum of remuneration allowed by the scale.

FIELDING v. MORLEY CORPORATION. (a.)

Costs — Solicitor and client costs—Public authority—Action for injunction—Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 61), s. 1 (b).

Section 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, gives a right to solicitor and client costs in actions for injunctions as well as in actions for damages; but it does not apply to interlocutory applications or to appeals.

The title of an Act of Parliament is now to be read as part of the Act.

Appeal from Byrne, J.

The defendant corporation were by statute the water authority of their district. The plaintiff brought an action against them, alleging that they were committing a breach of their statutory obligation to keep certain pipes, &c., on his land "water-tight." He claimed an injunction, and damages. Byrne, J., dismissed the action with costs. Holding himself bound by Harrop v. Mayor and Corporation of Ossett, 46 W. R. 391, [1898] 1 Ch. 525, his lordship directed that the costs should, in accordance with section 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, be taxed as between solicitor and client. The plaintiff appealed.

The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal with costs;

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 8.—LINDLEY, M.R., delivered the judgment of the court as follows: This case has been restored to the paper in order that we might dispose of the question of costs. The action was brought against the Mayor and Corporation of Morley in respect of an aqueduct and waterworks which they were empowered, by a special Act of Parliament, to erect on the plaintiff's land. Byrne, J., dismissed the action with costs, and, pursuant to a statutory authority which I will read presently, directed that the defendants' costs should be taxed as between solicitor and client. Mr. Clare contends that that direction is wrong. The question is raised upon the construction of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, s. 1. The title of the Act is important. I read the title advisedly, because for some time past the titles have formed part of Acts of Parliament. Formerly it was not so, but now the title forms part, and a very important part, of the Act. The title is "An Act to generalize and amend certain statutory provisions for the protection of persons acting in the execution of statutory and other public duties." [His lordship read section 1, and proceeded:] It appears to me and to all the other members of the court that the section which I have just read, occurring in an Act of Parliament passed in 1893, applies to all actions, including actions in the Chancery Division, and to actions for injunctions as well as to actions for damages. The dismissal of an action is equivalent to judgment for the defendants. The section does not apply to appeals, nor to interlocutory applications, but to judgment in the action. Although the language is wide, the key to the enactment is its design to protect public bodies from expense when unsuccessfully sued in respect of acts done or omitted in the execution of statutory or other public duties or authorities. The present case clearly falls within that enactment. It is not necessary to consider what cases do not fall within the Act. It is enough for us to say that this particular case is within it. The judgment of Byrne, J., on the question of costs will therefore stand, and the appeal will simply be dismissed with costs.

WHITELEY EXERCISER CO. v. GAMAGE. (a.)

Company — Winding up — Jurisdiction — Proceedings commenced before winding up—Companies Act, 1862, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 89, s. 143—Stay of proceedings—Defendant preparing affidavits.

Where proceedings have been commenced before the period after which, under section 143 of the Companies Act, 1862, a company ceases to exist, the court has jurisdiction over such proceedings after that period.

In re Crookhaven Mining Co., 15 W. R. 28, L. R. 3 Eq. 69, followed.

When a motion stands over to enable the defendant to file affidavits by a certain date, the defendant may prepare his evidence and file affidavits, although in the meantime the defendant has got an order ordering the plaintiffs to give security for costs and staying proceedings until such security has been given.

Summons to review taxation under the following circumstances.

The plaintiffs had commenced an action for infringement of patent against the defendants, and on the 18th of June, 1897, the case came before the court on motion for injunction, but stood over until the 2nd of July to enable the defendants to file affidavits, and an arrangement was made as to the time when they should be filed. On the day that the motion first came on in court a summons taken out by the defendants was heard by the master asking that the plaintiffs should give security for costs of the action and staying further proceedings until security given. The master made the order asked for. Subsequently, in the course of correspondence between plaintiffs' and defendants' solicitors, the plaintiffs' solicitors intimated that they intended giving the security, but ultimately, on the 12th of July, the plaintiffs' solicitors wrote to the defendants that the plaintiffs did not intend to give the security. On the 29th of July the defendants took out a summons asking that the action should be dismissed with costs for non-compliance with the order of the 18th of June. On the 5th of August the judge made an order dismissing the action with costs and giving the defendants the costs of the motion. When the defendants came to tax their costs the taxing-master disallowed the costs of preparing the affidavits in opposition to the motion as well as the fees to counsel and to the expert witnesses whose evidence it had been necessary to get. He did this on the ground, as he stated in the answer to the objections dated the 28th of January, 1898, that until the plaintiffs had given security the defendants ought not to have gone on preparing their case, and that the plaintiffs could not be made to pay for the excess of zeal of the defendants. On the 4th of February, 1898, the defendants took out the summons to vary which now came on. On the 8th of January, 1898, as the plaintiffs had resolved on voluntary winding up, a general meeting of the plaintiff company was held in pursuance of section 142 of the Companies Act, 1862. On the 14th of January the return made by the liquidators of the holding of the above meeting was registered; and under section 143, after three months from the registration of such return, the company shall be deemed to be dissolved, and as the three months had expired the company had now ceased to exist.

H. Terrell, Q.C., and Clayton, for the defendants.—The court has still jurisdiction to deal with this matter although the three months have gone by, as these proceedings were commenced before that period: In re Crookhaven Mining Co., 15 W. R. 28, L. R. 3 Eq. 69. This case is good law, and has not been impeached by In re Pinto Silver Mining Co., 26 W. R. 622, 8 Ch. D. 273, and In re London and Caledonian Marine Insurance Co., 27 W. R. 713, 11 Ch. D. 140. The defendants ought to have the costs of preparing their case. They had no reason to believe that the plaintiffs could not give the security, and they had to be prepared with their case when it should come on.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Kenyon Parker, for plaintiffs.—The late cases cited are inconsistent with In re Crookhaven Mining Co. The company has ceased to exist, and the proceedings cannot go on. As to the objections, the taxing-master was right, and the defendants were not entitled to go on preparing their case until the security was given.

NORTH, J., after stating the facts and stating that this summons had been taken out before the company had become dissolved by virtue of section 143 of the Companies Act, 1862, but had not come on for hearing before the company had ceased to exist under that section, continued: Is a suitor to lose his rights because the case has not come before me sooner? I do not think so. Lord Romilly said, in In re Crookhaven Mining Co., "At the time when this petition was presented the court unquestionably had jurisdiction under the Companies Act to order the call to be made, and I am of opinion that the delay in hearing the petition, caused by the intervention of the long vacation, cannot affect the rights of the petitioner, and that he is entitled to stand in the same position as if the petition had been heard before the expiration of three months from the 4th of June." Then it is said that in some way this view has been impeached by the later cases cited. But I am satisfied that there is jurisdiction in the court to hear this summons now, as if it had come on immediately after it was issued on the 4th of February. [On the merits, after referring to the facts, the learned judge continued:] The defendant prepared his affidavits, that being the purpose for which the motion stood over, but the plaintiffs now brought it on again. Suppose the defendant had not prepared and the plaintiffs had given security, and that when the motion came on the defendant had asked for further time, he would have been laughed at. The defendant was not bound to stay his hand because there was a stay of proceedings. The taxing-master has acted under a mistake, and the matter must go back to him to be dealt with on its merits.

OXFORD MUSIC HALL (LIMITED) v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL. (a.)

Metropolis—London County Council (Improvement) Act, 1897, s. 43, Part 3—Construction.

In considering what property is liable to an improvement charge under the London County Council (Improvement) Act, 1897, section 43, Part 3, it is sufficient if part of the property held as a whole abuts on the street to which the improvement applies.

Motion.

The London County Council (Improvement) Act, 1897, made the "lands all or any part of which front or abut upon the west side of Tottenham Court-road and Boxier's-court between Oxford-street and Hanway-street" liable "to have an improvement charge placed on such lands or some of them . . . in respect or in consideration of any substantial and permanent increase in value which it is clearly shown has been derived from the improvements by this Act authorized." "Lands" shall extend to messuages, lands, tenements, and hereditaments (Part 3, s. 42).

The plaintiffs were lessees of a house in Tottenham Court-road, the ground floor of the house being used by the plaintiffs as an entrance to the plaintiffs' music hall situate in Oxford-street. The music hall did not itself abut on Tottenham Court-road and had been divided from the back of the house in Tottenham Court-road by a party wall.

The upper part of the house did not communicate in any way with the hall and was used as a shop, and the plaintiffs were under covenant with the lessors to replace at the end of the term the party wall on the ground floor which had been removed to make the communication with the hall.

The plaintiffs had been served by the defendants under the provisions of the Act with a notice in which the plaintiffs were described as being interested as owners or lessees of property falling within the improvement area on which the defendants proposed to place an improvement charge. The property so proposed to be charged included the music hall.

The plaintiffs contended that they were only liable to have a charge placed on the house in Tottenham Court-road and not on the rest of their property.

The defendants had appointed a valuer to assess the value of the plaintiffs' premises, including the hall.

This was a motion to restrain the defendants from proceeding with a valuation of the premises of the plaintiffs other than the house in Tottenham Court-road.

E. C. Macnaghten, Q.C., and Lord Robert Cecil, for plaintiffs.—The question is does the Oxford Music Hall fall within the Act so as to be said to "front" or "abut" on Tottenham Court-road. We submit that it does not, the only property of the plaintiffs which does abut is the house.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Methold, for the defendants.—The words of the Act are "lands the whole or any part of which" front or abut on Tottenham Court-road. It does not matter that the main entrance is not in that road. Although it is only a subsidiary entrance, still it makes the hall to "abut" on the road. The defendants will have to show, of course, that what they have done has improved the value of the plaintiffs' premises.

Macnaghten, Q.C., in reply.

NORTH, J., after stating the facts, said: "I do not see how the plaintiffs can say that their premises do not include more than the house. The house is used as an entrance to the hall, and it does not matter that there is another entrance in Oxford-street. Then do not the plaintiffs fall within the definition of owners "of messuages, lands, tenements, or hereditaments abutting on the west side of Tottenham Court-road"? I think they do. The ground floor of the house and the buildings behind used as a hall are held by the plaintiffs as one holding. I cannot say that only a part of the lands held by the plaintiffs as a whole is included in the improvement area.

Motion refused.

SANTLEY v. WILDE. (a.)

Mortgage—Redemption—Collateral advantage—Covenant for payment of rents to mortgagee after time for payment of last instalment of principal—Notice to pay off—Tender after notice—Withdrawal of notice.

(a.) Reported by R. SILLEM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by J. F. WALEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

There is no rule that a mortgagee may not stipulate for a collateral advantage, so that such advantage be fair and reasonable, and so that it do not prevent redemption on payment of principal, interest, and costs.

A provision in a mortgage which has the effect of preventing redemption on payment of principal, interest, and costs, in accordance with the bargain for payment thereof, is invalid, and cannot enable the mortgagee to maintain any action, whether in equity or at law.

A covenant in a mortgage of leaseholds for years, that the mortgagor would, during the residue of the leasehold term, notwithstanding that all principal moneys and interest might have been paid, pay to the mortgagee one-third of the net profit rent, with provisions for continuing the relative positions of mortgagor and mortgagee, and for continuing the mortgage for the purpose of securing the one-third,

Held, to be void as operating to prevent redemption.

A mortgagee who had given the mortgagor notice to pay off the principal moneys and interest owing on the mortgage,

Held, not entitled to withdraw the notice without the consent of the mortgagor.

On the 23rd of October, 1895, the plaintiff, being then underlessee of the Royalty Theatre, with an option to purchase the head lease, entered into an agreement with the defendant, by which it was stipulated that he should provide £2,000, the amount payable for the exercise of the option, and that on completion of the purchase the plaintiff should execute a proper legal mortgage of the lease so purchased, as security for the advance, such mortgage to contain a provision for payment of the principal by quarterly instalments of £100 each; also provisions for payment of interest at 6 per cent. and for payment to the defendant of "one-third part of the clear net profits received by the said Kate Santley from the under-tenants or tenants for the time being (after payment of the said interest and any legal or other necessary expenses) for and during the residue of the term for which the said lease is granted." The lease was acquired by and was assigned to the plaintiff by deed dated the 12th of December, 1895, the purchase-money (£2,000) being advanced to her by the defendant for that purpose. The term thereby granted had until June, 1905, to run.

By deed dated the 13th of December, 1895, between the plaintiff of the one part and the defendant of the other part, in consideration of the loan and advance by the defendant to the plaintiff of £2,000, the plaintiff covenanted with the defendant for payment of the £2,000 by twenty equal quarterly payments of £100 each, the first of such payments to be made on the 25th of December, 1895 (so that the last payment would be made on the 25th of September, 1900), and for payment of interest on the £2,000, or on so much as should from time to time remain due upon that security, at the rate of £6 per cent. per annum. The deed then proceeded as follows: "And this indenture also witnesseth that, in further pursuance of the said recited agreement and for the consideration aforesaid, the mortgagor hereby covenants with the mortgagee that she, the mortgagor, will during the residue of the term created by the said indenture of lease, notwithstanding that all principal moneys and interest may have been paid under the covenant hereinbefore contained, pay to the mortgagee a sum equal to one-third part of the clear net profit rent or rents to be derived from all or any leases or lease, tenancy agreements or agreement, which may now or hereafter be subsisting between the mortgagor and any under-tenants or under-tenant of the said demised premises or any part thereof, such share of net profit rental to become payable from time to time when and as soon as the same shall have been received by the mortgagor, and for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of such net profit rental the mortgagor shall be entitled to deduct from the rents payable to her the interest which shall for the time being be payable and paid to the mortgagee . . . and also the amount of the rent reserved by the said indenture of lease . . . and the insurance premiums," and also certain legal and other expenses.

By the same deed the plaintiff demised the premises to the defendant for the residue of the term, except the last day, subject to subsisting tenancies. The deed contained a proviso for redemption upon payment by the plaintiff of the £2,000 and interest, and all the other moneys thereinbefore covenanted by her to be paid, and a provision that the defendant would not call in the loan, if the instalments were paid within thirty days of their falling due respectively, together with the interest for the time being payable, and if the covenants on the plaintiff's part were duly observed by the plaintiff. The mortgage also contained a purchaser's indemnity clause, a covenant by the mortgagor to perform the covenants of the lease, and as to insurance, and also to use her best endeavours to let the premises, a power to the mortgagee to sell, notwithstanding the £2,000 and interest had been paid off, and power to the mortgagee to enter into possession and let or manage on the expiration of three months' notice requiring the performance of the mortgagor's covenants.

On the 20th of August, 1897, the sum of £350 was owing in respect of instalments, and on that day the defendant served on the plaintiff a notice that he required her to pay off within three calendar months from her receipt of the notice the principal moneys and interest owing to him on the mortgage, and that, in default, he intended to sell the mortgaged premises, and that, pursuant to the mortgage, he required her to pay him the instalments of the £2,000 and interest then due to him pursuant to her covenants, and that in case of her default in paying the said sum and in remedying and observing the covenants as required by the said mortgage, he intended to enter into possession of and let and manage the mortgaged property and to employ agents or receivers to collect the rents.

On the same day, the 20th of August, 1897, the plaintiff paid the defendant the amount of arrears of instalments, and offered to pay the amount of arrears of interest, but did not pay them until later.

The plaintiff afterwards declined to allow the notice to be withdrawn, and gave notice to pay off the principal and interest, and made a tender of the amount. This being refused, she brought the present action for redemption on payment of the £2,000 and interest only. The defendant counterclaimed for a declaration that for the residue of the term, notwithstanding payment of the principal and interest, he was entitled to one-third of the profit rental.

Eve, Q.C., and à Beckett Terrell, for the plaintiff.—The defendant having given notice requiring payment off, the plaintiff was entitled to pay off, and the tender made by her was a good tender. She was not bound to pay interest in lieu of notice: Smith v. Smith, 40 W. R. 32, [1891] 3 Ch. 550, at p. 552; Bovill v. Endle, 44 W. R. 523, [1896] 1 Ch. 648; and the defendant's notice could not be withdrawn by him without her consent. As to the covenant to pay one-third of the profits of the property to the defendant during the residue of the term, it is a clog on the plaintiff's equity of redemption, and therefore void.

Hughes, Q.C., and R. J. Parker, for the defendant.—The defendant was entitled to withdraw his notice.

If the plaintiff had the right to insist upon it, such right was waived by her. The mortgage no doubt contains a collateral agreement in favour of the defendant, but there is nothing to prevent redemption by the plaintiff of the mortgage on payment of principal and interest and the other amounts due in accordance with the deed, and the agreement is not a fetter on her equity to redeem. That it may operate to postpone redemption is true, but that is no objection. The defendant might sue on the agreement at law, though it cannot be relied on to prevent redemption. There would be no answer to an action at law on the covenant, and equity only interferes where there is a clog on the right of redemption. Moreover, the transaction is not a mere mortgage, and the technical rule relied on for the plaintiff is not applicable.

Eve replied.

Besides the cases referred to above and the cases noticed in the judgment, the following cases were cited—namely, Broad v. Selfe, 11 W. R. 1036; James v. Kerr, 37 W. R. 279, 40 Ch. BYRNE, J.—"A mortgage is regarded as a security for money, and the mortgagor can always redeem on payment of principal, interest, and costs; and no bargain preventing such redemption is valid, nor will unconscionable bargains be enforced." The rule is so stated by the Master of the Rolls in the case of Biggs v. Hoddinott, ante, p. 84, [1898] 2 Ch. 307, at p. 321, after an expression of opinion that the proposition in Jennings v. Ward, 2 Vern. 520, is too wide, but that if properly guarded it is good law and good sense. There is no rule that a mortgagee may not stipulate for a collateral advantage, so that such advantage be fair and reasonable, and so that it do not prevent redemption on payment of principal, interest, and costs. It is lawful to stipulate that the loan shall be repayable by instalments, or that the loan shall remain for a certain time, and so to postpone the time for redemption; and there are other stipulations which may be introduced into a mortgage which will have the effect of regulating the time and manner of redemption. Nevertheless, if it be once established that the transaction is in form and substance one of mortgage or loan on security, and that the mortgage contains a provision which has the effect of preventing redemption of the mortgaged property on repayment of principal, interest, and costs, in accordance with the bargain for repayment of those amounts, such provision is invalid.

I do not think that the view put forward in the present case—viz., that the provision, though unenforceable in a foreclosure or redemption action, may yet be otherwise effectual—can be supported. I think that any such provision cannot enable the mortgagee to maintain any action for specific performance or account, or for damages. It is clearly invalid in equity, and I think that a court of equity would, before the Judicature Act, have restrained an action at law grounded on a provision invalid in equity, as fettering the equity of redemption, just as in the case of an action grounded on a provision invalid on the ground of its being an unconscientious bargain. I apprehend that now, and probably since the passing of the Common Law Procedure Act, the fact that the provision was invalid upon the ground of fettering the equity of redemption might be effectually pleaded in the action brought upon it. Although a mortgagee may sue on the covenant for payment at the same time as he pursues his other remedies, I do not think that he can maintain an action grounded on a covenant or stipulation invalid upon equitable grounds. The fact that upon redemption, or, indeed, upon valid tender, the mortgagee would be bound to deliver up his securities, and would no longer have the documents upon which to sue at law, seems to me to be inconsistent with the argument put forward. There are cases in which the transaction, although in form a mortgage, is, in substance, a transaction of a different kind, as being, for instance, a settlement or family provision; and that is why I have spoken of the transaction being, in substance, a mortgage. In the present case there is no suggestion of oppression or of an unconscionable bargain. The plaintiff grounds her claim for relief upon the existence of certain provisions in a deed which, she says, are invalid as imposing a fetter upon the right to redeem. [His lordship stated the facts, including the earlier parts of the mortgage deed, and continued:] From what I have read it is clear that the transaction was in form and substance a mortgage transaction or loan on security, unless the other provisions to which I will now refer have in some way deprived it of that character. [His lordship referred to other provisions of the mortgage deed, and continued as follows:] The document is not happily expressed in that it does not in terms provide that the whole principal sum shall become due in default of payment of the instalments; but, in my judgment, it is a mortgage with certain provisions in effect making the mortgaged property practically irredeemable, although affecting to contain a redemption clause. I am of opinion that the provisions providing for the payment of one-third of the net profits, extending as they do to a period after the whole of the principal, interest, and costs shall have been discharged, and for continuing the relative positions of mortgagor and mortgagee, and for continuing the mortgage after such discharge for the purpose of securing the one-third of rents and profits, do, in fact, operate to prevent redemption, and that such provisions are consequently invalid. I do not think that I can take into consideration the fact that the object of the parties might, perhaps, have been attained in some different way. The parties have elected to effectuate their object by way of loan or mortgage, and I must take the transaction as it stands. I have considered whether or not I might sever the provisions in question, and hold them good during the subsistence of the security for the payment of principal, interest, and costs, and until redemption; but I do not see how I can do this. I should then in effect be reforming the deed including the proviso for redemption, and be making a new bargain for the parties.

There is another point in the case which arises for decision—namely, whether or not the plaintiff is now entitled to redeem on payment of the balance of the unpaid instalments with interest payable up to the 20th of November, 1897, and the amount of the defendant's costs, charges, and expenses to that date, tender having been duly made of those amounts and refused. On the 20th of August, 1897, a sum of £350 was due to the defendant in respect of instalments in arrear, and on that date the defendant served the notice set out in paragraph 4 of the statement of claim. [The notice, which his lordship read, was to the effect above stated.] I think he was entitled to serve the notice. On the same 20th of August, 1897, the plaintiff paid the defendant the £350 arrears of instalments and offered to pay arrears of interest, although she did not, in fact, pay them until a later date. The result of the correspondence appears to be this: The plaintiff was at first desirous that the notice should be withdrawn, but the defendant declined and insisted upon what he conceived to be his strict legal rights. Ultimately the parties, having, as I think, taken advice, assumed different attitudes, and the defendant wrote withdrawing his notices. This withdrawal the plaintiff declined to accept, so far as related to the notice to pay off, and I think she was entitled to do so. When the defendant gave notice to pay off the mortgage he created a new position arising by virtue of the original agreement between the parties, and, in my opinion, the position so created could only be altered by the consent, express or implied, of both parties. The case of a notice to quit is in some respects analogous, and in Blyth v. Dennett, 13 C. B. 178, at p. 180, Maule, J., in distinguishing between the effect of a notice to quit and a forfeiture, points out that in the case of a notice to quit "the tenancy is put an end to by the agreement of the parties, which determination of the tenancy cannot be waived without the assent of both"; and Jervis, C.J., in the same case says: "The old tenancy was put an end to by the notice to quit; to make out a defence to the action the defendant was bound to show a new contract." In Tayleur v. Wildin, 16 W. R. 1018, L. R. 3 Ex. 303, Kelly, C.B., says: "It is clear that, whether the notice to quit is given by the landlord or the tenant, the party to whom it is given is entitled to insist upon it, and it cannot be withdrawn without the consent of both." If the law were otherwise a landlord or tenant might, by withdrawing a notice to quit the day before its expiry, inflict great damage upon the other party in rendering all the arrangements made in contemplation of the termination of the holding useless. In like manner a mortgagee might, by withdrawing his notice to pay off at the last moment, inflict serious injury upon a mortgagor who had made all his arrangements upon the footing of paying off the mortgage at the expiration of the notice. In this case I think an effectual tender was made and that the plaintiff is entitled to succeed. I think that the defendant is not entitled to the relief he asks for by his counter-claim, which therefore fails.

His lordship made no order as to costs.

SWAYNE (Appellant) v. THE COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE (Respondents). (a.)

Inland revenue—Stamp duty—Conveyance on sale—Consideration—Conveyance of property subject to the payment of money—Assignment of leaseholds—Rent—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), ss. 56, 57; Schedule I.

On a conveyance on sale of leasehold property subject the rent reserved by the original lease, or (in the case of such a conveyance of a part only of the demised property) subject to an apportioned part of the rent so reserved, such rent is not a part of the consideration in respect whereof the conveyance is chargeable with ad valorem duty under section 57 of the Stamp Act, 1891.

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue pursuant to section 13 of the Stamp Act, 1891, for the opinion of the court as to the amount of duty with which an indenture of assignment of leasehold property dated the 27th of December, 1897, was chargeable.

The following statement of the facts upon which the commissioners gave their decision is taken from the judgment of Bruce, J.:

By an indenture of lease bearing date the 16th of October, 1893, one Rowell demised to one Mills a parcel of ground and three dwelling-houses then in course of erection thereon for a term of ninety-nine years at the yearly rent of £3 16s. 6d., and by the said indenture Mills covenanted to complete the three houses, and expend on the building of each of such houses the sum of £100 at the least, and he also entered into numerous other stringent covenants such as are often inserted in what are known as building leases. The three houses were erected, and were numbered 6, 7, and 8, Bowden-hill-terrace.

Rowell, by another indenture of lease bearing date the 10th of March, 1894, demised to Mills a parcel of ground and two dwelling-houses then in course of erection thereon for a term of ninety-nine at the yearly rent of £2 11s. The covenants in this indenture were similar to the covenants in the indenture of the 16th of October, 1893. The two houses were erected, and were numbered 9 and 10, Bowden-hill-terrace.

By an indenture bearing date the 27th of December, 1897, made between Mills of the one part and Annie Penelope Swayne (the appellant) of the other part, Mills in consideration of the sum of £503 to him paid by the said Annie Penelope Swayne assigned and conveyed into the said A. P. Swayne—first, the two houses 7 and 8, Bowden-hill-terrace, being two of the three houses demised by the indenture of the 16th of October, 1893; and, secondly, the two houses 9 and 10, Bowden-hill-terrace, being the two houses demised by the indenture of the 10th of March, 1894, to hold the same unto the said A. P. Swayne for the residue then unexpired of the said several terms of ninety-nine years subject as to the hereditaments first thereinbefore described to the apportioned yearly rent of £2 11s., part of the yearly rent of £3 16s. 6d. reserved by the indenture of the 16th of October, 1893, and to the observance and performance of the covenants and conditions therein contained, and subject as to the hereditaments secondly thereinbefore described to the payment of the yearly rent of £2 11s. reserved by the indenture of the 10th of March, 1894, and to the observance and performance of the covenants and conditions therein contained. A. P. Swayne covenanted with Mills to pay the several sums of £2 11s. and to observe and perform the covenants and conditions in the said leases to Mills respectively contained and to keep Mills indemnified, and Mills covenanted with A. P. Swayne to pay the apportioned rent of £1 5s. 6d., the residue of the rent reserved by the indenture of the 16th of October, 1893.

The indenture of the 27th of December, 1897, was submitted to the commissioners under section 12 of the Stamp Act, 1891, for their opinion as to the amount of duty chargeable thereon.

The commissioners were of opinion that the instrument fell to be charged under the head "Conveyance on Sale" in the schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891. In accordance with their practice they did not assess duty upon the capitalized value of the yearly rent of £2 11s. payable in respect of the houses numbered 9 and 10, Bowden-hill-terrace. They were of opinion, however, that duty was chargeable upon the rent of the same amount payable in respect of the houses numbered 7 and 8, Bowden-hill-terrace above-mentioned, and they assessed duty upon the said sum multiplied by twenty under section 56, sub-section 2, of the Stamp Act, 1891. They also assessed duty upon the sum of £503, the premium payable under the instrument.

It was admitted in the case that the houses 6, 7, and 8, Bowden-hill-terrace were of equal value.

Section 56 (2) of the Stamp Act, 1891, enacts that "Where the consideration or any part of the consideration for a conveyance on sale consists of money payable periodically for a definite period exceeding twenty years or in perpetuity, or for any indefinite period not terminable with life, the conveyance is to be charged in respect of that consideration with ad valorem duty on the total amount which will or may, according to the terms of sale, be payable during the period of twenty years next after the day of the date of the instrument."

Section 57 enacts that "Where any property is conveyed to any person in consideration, wholly or in part, of any debt due to him, or subject either certainly or contingently to the payment or transfer of any money or stock, whether being or constituting a charge or incumbrance upon the property or not, the debt, money, or stock, is to be deemed the whole or part, as the case may be, of the consideration in respect whereof the conveyance is chargeable with ad valorem duty.

Vaughan Hawkins, for the appellant.—The apportioned rent was not part of the consideration for the sale. The property sold was the houses, subject to a rent, a rent being merely an incident of leasehold tenure; the consideration was the premium of £503, and ad valorem duty is payable upon that only. [He was stopped.]

Danckwerts (Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G., with him), for the respondents.—The property was assigned subject to the rent, that is, subject to the annual payment of money; that money is, therefore, by virtue of section 57 of the Stamp Act, 1891, to be deemed a part of the consideration, and ad valorem duty was properly assessed upon the capitalized value of the rent. There is no distinction between such a case and the case of a conveyance of land subject to a mortgage debt and interest in which duty is clearly payable upon the debt and interest. The commissioners have power, under section 57, to claim ad valorem duty on the value of the rent where the whole of the property demised by the original lease is assigned subject to the original rent; but in practice the power is not exercised except where a part only of the demised premises is assigned subject to an apportioned rent. [WILLS, J.—But the commissioners have no power to make a rule of not claiming duty in a class of cases in which duty is payable; such a practice is wholly different from making a remission in a particular case.]

Vaughan Hawkins.—Section 57 does not apply to a charge or liability to payment which is inherent in the nature of the property itself such as rent in the case of leasehold property; it applies to a mortgage debt, because that is something outside the property. Where a liability is inseparable from the property sold, ad valorem duty is not payable upon the amount of the liability: Christie v. The Commissioners, 15 W. R. 258, L. R. 2 Ex. 46.

He also traced the history of the legislation now represented by section 57 of the Stamp Act, 1891, and referred to The Commissioners v. The Liquidators of City of Glasgow Bank, 8 Ct. Sess. Cas., 4th series, 389; Marquis of Chandos v. The Commissioners, 6. Exch. 464; 15 & 17 Vict. c. 59, ss. 10, 11; Mortimore v. The Commissioners 2 H. & C. 838; Ulverston and Lancaster Railway Co. v. The Commissioners 2 H. & C. 855; Stamp Act, 1870, s. 73; Dart's Vendors and Purchasers (6th ed.), p. 788.

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G., in reply.—The amount of the premium paid is affected by the amount of the rent to which the property is subject, the rent is therefore part of the consideration, just as on the purchase of shares in a company on which there is a liability to pay calls the amount of the calls is part of the consideration.

Curr. adv. vult.

Dec. 21.—BRUCE, J., after stating the facts as above set out, said: The question raised by the case is what is the amount of stamp duty to which the indenture of the 27th of December, 1897, is subject. The indenture is taxable under the head "Conveyance or transfer on sale" contained in the schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891. The duty is an ad valorem duty on the amount or value of the consideration for the sale. It is quite clear that the ad valorem duty is payable in respect of the sum of £503, the consideration-money expressed in the indenture. But the commissioners contend that the ad valorem duty is also chargeable in respect of the yearly rent payable for the houses 7 and 8, Bowden-hill-terrace, because they say that rent is to be regarded as part of the consideration for the conveyance. This contention is founded upon the 57th section of the Stamp Act, 1891, which is in these terms: "Where any property is conveyed to any person in consideration, wholly or in part, of any debt due to him or subject, either certainly or contingently, to the payment or transfer of any money or stock whether being or constituting a charge or incumbrance upon the property or not, the debt, money, or stock is to be deemed the whole or part, as the case may be, of the consideration in respect whereof the conveyance is chargeable with ad valorem duty." The particular words relied upon are these: "Where property is conveyed to any person subject to the payment of any money, the money is to be deemed part of the consideration in respect whereof the conveyance is chargeable with ad valorem duty."

It is said that the assignment to A. P. Swayne of the houses 7 and 8, Bowden-hill-terrace, was subject to the payment by her of the rent of £2 11s., and that therefore by the terms of the section above referred to the £2 11s. is to be deemed part of the consideration. The commissioners did not insist upon treating the payment of the rent of £2 11s. payable in respect of the houses 9 and 10, Bowden-hill-terrace in the same way, because we are told that in cases where there has been no apportionment of the rent reserved by the original lease, and the lease of the whole of the demised premises has been assigned subject to the payment of the rent reserved by the original lease, it has never been the practice of the commissioners to treat the rent reserved as forming any part of the consideration for the assignment. With the practice which the commissioners think right to pursue it seems to me we have nothing to do—they may have good reasons for enforcing the duty in one case and not in another—but I am satisfied that, as far as the construction of the statute is concerned, no distinction whatever can be drawn between a case in which the rent reserved on an assignment of a lease is the rent reserved by the original lease or is a part only of that rent.

If the commissioners have the right to require the sum of £2 11s. to be treated as part of the consideration as regards the assignment of the lease of houses 7 and 8, Bowden-hill-terrace, they have the same right with regard to the £2 11s. payable in respect of houses 9 and 10. But in my opinion they have no such right in either case. The question turns upon the meaning of the words "subject to the payment of any money." Of course where leasehold property is assigned it is commonly assigned subject to the payment of rent, because the payment of rent is an obligation ordinarily incident to leasehold property. But when we come to look at the preceding words in the section—"conveyed to any person in consideration wholly or in part of any debt due to him"—which govern the words "or subject to the payment of any money," it seems to me that it is reasonable to construe the section as pointing to a liability to pay money arising in some way other than as incident to and inseparably connected with the property conveyed. Where a lease for years subject to the payment of an annual rent is conveyed or assigned the very property conveyed is in its nature a qualified property, and the liability to pay rent arises out of the nature of the estate conveyed. The liability to pay is not in the nature of a charge or incumbrance on the property, it does not even arise out of any independent stipulation that the money shall be paid, it is inherent in the nature of the property, and can never be extinguished so long as the character of the property remains. The history of the legislation on the subject, I think, confirms the view that I have expressed. It is related in the judgments delivered by the Lord President and the other judges of the Court of Session in the case of the Glasgow Bank, 8 Ct. Sess. Cas., 4th series, p. 389 Where property is incumbered and is sold subject to the incumbrance, or even subject to a bond or condition that certain money shall be paid in future, then upon payment off of the incumbrance or upon payment of the money stipulated to be paid in future the purchaser obtains an estate discharged from the incumbrance or bond or condition, and the money so paid in discharge of the incumbrance or bond or condition is paid indirectly as part of the purchase-money of the estate, and therefore it is right that the sums of money, upon the payment of which the purchaser is able to obtain an unincumbered estate should be taken into consideration as forming part of the purchase-money, and be added to the amount paid by the purchaser as the price of the incumbered estate or as the price of the estate sold burthened with the condition of the payment of money in future. It was to meet cases of this kind that various provisions have been made by the Legislature, the last of which is contained in the section now under consideration. No doubt the words in the section are very wide, but I think they cannot properly be applied to mean more than this, to use the language of Martin, B., in the case of Mortimore v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 2 H. & C. 838, "The ad valorem duty shall be paid on the entire consideration which, either directly or indirectly, represents the value of the free and unincumbered corpus of the subject-matter of the sale." Where as in this case the liability to pay is an incident of the corpus of the subject of the sale, and inseparable from it, and from which the corpus never can be freed, it seems to me that it would be giving too comprehensive a meaning to the words of the Legislature to hold that the rent to which the corpus is subject should be treated as if it were an incumbrance, or were in any sense to be regarded directly or indirectly as purchase-money. In the present case the lease of the 16th of October, 1893, contains various covenants by Mills—among others, covenants to repair, to keep the premises insured, and to execute all works that may be necessary in order to procure certain footways or roadways being taken over by the local authority of the district, and the indenture of assignment of the 27th of December, 1897, makes over the lease to A. P. Swayne, subject to the observance and performance on her part of the above covenants. In a sense, therefore, the property is conveyed to A. P. Swayne, subject to the payment of all the moneys that may require to be expended by virtue of these covenants, and yet I think it would be obviously unreasonable to hold that such sums should be treated as forming part of the consideration for the purchase. It was said in argument by counsel for the Crown that cases might arise in which an assignment or transfer of a lease might be made on terms imposing a higher yearly rent than the rent reserved by the original lease, and in consideration of such higher rent the purchase-money payable on the assignment or transfer might be reduced, and in such a case if the ad valorem duty were charged on the purchase-money alone without reference to the increased rent, part of what really formed the consideration for the transfer would escape the duty. On that I may make two observations. First, the circumstances suggested do not arise in the present case. It is an admitted fact in the case that the three houses 6, 7, and 8 comprised in the original lease of the 16th of October, 1893, are of equal value, and the rent reserved by the indenture of assignment of the 27th of December, 1897, for the two houses 7 and 8 is exactly two-thirds of the rent reserved in respect of the three houses comprised in the original lease. There is, therefore, in this case no room for the suggestion that the rent reserved by the indenture of assignment has been in any way manipulated so as to reduce or in any way affect the purchase-money of £503 upon which the ad valorem duty is payable. Secondly, the words of the 57th section are not directed to meet such a case as is suggested. The words of the section, if they apply at all, apply to all cases where property is conveyed subject to the payment of money whether the payment bears any relation to the consideration for the purchase or not, and for the reasons I have given I think it is unreasonable to ascribe to the words so wide a meaning as to include such a case as that now under consideration. If a case were established where it was clear that on an assignment of a lease the rent reserved by the assignment had been increased above the rent reserved by the original lease in order that the purchase-money payable on the assignment might be reduced, whether it might not be possible in some way to take into consideration the whole circumstances in order to ascertain the real amount or value of the actual consideration, paid directly or indirectly, on the simple words contained in the schedule to the Act, without reference in any way to the words of section 57, I give no opinion, because in the present case the question does not arise. All that we decide here is that the words of the 57th section do not meet the present case.

WILLS, J.—I entirely agree with the judgment of my brother Bruce, and I will not repeat the arguments used by him. The real question is—what is the meaning of the word "property" in section 57 of the Stamp Act, 1891? In the case of land subject to a mortgage, the word has been held to mean the physical property considered as unincumbered. I do not propose to deal with the subject historically so as to show how that decision came to be given; I do not in any way dissent from the reasonableness of that view; but the case of leaseholds is totally different. I would observe that the construction of these taxing Acts is not an exact science; it is rather a practical art; and the questions which arise under these sections of the Stamp Act, 1891, cannot be settled as if they were simple questions to be determined logically by reference to the principles of common law. Leasehold property is a class of property well known to the law. In nine cases out of ten—or, I might say, in ninety-nine out of a hundred—it is burdened with a liability to pay rent; in the ordinary case of a lease of house property it is burdened with a rack-rent, and it has never occurred to anyone dealing with the subject to suppose that upon an assignment of such a lease the burden of the rack-rent is assumed by the purchaser as part of the consideration for the purchase. The commissioners have not hitherto acted on such a view. As I pointed out in the course of the argument, if the contention of the Crown is correct the commissioners have always been wrong in their method of assessing the stamp duty payable on an assignment of leaseholds; they ought, in all cases, to have treated the capitalized value of the rent as part of the purchase-money. It was said by Mr. Danckwerts that the commissioners could so treat it or not, as they pleased. I utterly dissent from that view. If the contention were right I think it would be their duty in all cases to consider the capitalized rent in assessing the duty. The commissioners cannot exercise a dispensing power and say what part of a taxing Act is reasonable, and enforce that part and reject the other parts. But in this case a mere statement of the result of the contention of the Crown is almost sufficient to warrant its rejection. What was the subject of the assessment in this case? What was sold was leasehold property—that is to say, property not unburdened, but subject to a liability to be distrained upon for an annual sum of £3 16s. 6d. The vendor could not convey any part of the property otherwise than subject to this burden, and it could make no difference whether it was expressed to be conveyed so subject or not. The vendor affected to convey it subject to an annual payment of £2 11s. only; but the only effect of that, coupled with his express covenant, was to give the purchaser an indemnity as to the balance of £1 5s. 6d. per annum, and that indemnity was a part of what was being sold, so that the purchase-money of £503 paid for the property was not made less on account of that indemnity, but more.

(Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J.) } Aug. 8, 1898.

JONES & CO. v. SCULLARD. (a.)

Master and servant—Servant hired from another person—Liability for the negligence of hired servant.

The defendant kept his carriage and horses at a livery stable, and hired a man from the keeper of the livery stable to drive them; the driver being selected by the keeper of the livery stable. One day, when the defendant was out driving, owing to the negligence of the driver the horse bolted, and ran into and did damage to the plaintiff's shop. The driver was one who had driven the defendant continuously for some time, and he wore the defendant's livery, but he had only driven the horse in the shafts at the time of the accident some two or three times.

Held, that there was evidence on which a jury could find that the driver was the servant of the defendant, so that the defendant was liable for his negligence.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Action.

On the 22nd of June, 1897, the defendant's brougham and horse, driven by a man named Loveday, ran into the shop of the plaintiff, who was a jeweller carrying on business as Jones & Co., and injured the shop and the stock-in-trade. The plaintiff thereupon brought this action for damages, upon the ground of the negligence of the defendant or his driver. At the trial the defence was set up that the defendant was not liable inasmuch as the driver was not his servant, having been hired by him from a livery stable keeper. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for £350, and the question of liability was reserved.

The facts appear in the judgment.

Hammond Chambers, Q.C. (Woodin with him), for the plaintiff.—The test is the ownership, or, rather, the legal possession of the horse. If the defendant is in legal possession of the horse the authorities show that the driver is his servant: Laugher v. Pointer, 5 B. & C. 547; Brady v. Giles, 1 Moo. & Rob. 494; Randleson v. Murray, 8 A. & E. 109; and Quarman v. Burnett, 6 M. & W. 499. The rule of law is that where a man is in possession of property he has to take care that it is so managed as not to cause injury to other persons. The defendant was in possession of the horse, and was consequently liable to see that it was so managed by the person who drove it as not to cause damage to other persons. If a servant is lent by one person to another for a particular employment he is for the time being the servant of the person to whom he is lent: Rourke v. White Moss Colliery Co., 25 W. R. 263, 2 C. P. D. 205; Donovan v. Laing, 41 W. R. 455, [1893] 1 Q. B. 629. The facts show that in the present case the driver was under the direction and control of the defendant.

Witt, Q.C. (J. Watson Moyses and E. E. Humphreys with him), for the defendant.—The defendant not having selected the driver is not responsible for his negligence. The driver was selected by the proprietor of the livery stables, who is therefore the person liable. [Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—Cannot a selection and approval be implied from his continuing to employ the same man?] There was an absence of disapproval.

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—Although this is only a running-down case the decision in it has caused me considerable trouble and anxiety, and I think it is desirable that it should ultimately go to receive the opinion of the Court of Appeal. The facts are these. The plaintiff is a jeweller, and carries on business at 368, Holloway-road. On Jubilee day a brougham, in which was being driven a horse, ran into his shop and caused damage to the window and its contents. The plaintiff thereupon cast about to discover whether he had any remedy, and against whom. He himself was certainly blameless. He discovers this. Inside the brougham at the time of the accident was the defendant and a lady friend. The brougham belonged to the defendant. The horse belonged to the defendant, and the harness belonged to the defendant. The man on the box had on boots, breeches, waistcoat, coat, and hat—all of them supplied to him by the defendant. But the person enveloped in these garments had been supplied to the defendant by a man with whom the defendant placed his horses at livery.

An action is brought against the defendant, and he says in answer to it: "I am not responsible for the damage done by this man's negligence because he did not represent me. He was not my servant, but the servant of another. In his action the plaintiff alleges generally that the occurrence was caused by the negligence of those who were responsible for the brougham, horse, &c.

He gave particulars of the negligence which he alleged, and it is necessary to see what these particulars are.

They are as follows: That the horse being a hard-mouthed horse, and a puller, as the defendant and his servant ought to have known by inspection of his mouth, which showed unmistakeable signs of hardness caused by pulling; that the curb chain was not sufficiently tightened; that there was no brake on the carriage; and that the horse had recently been brought from the country, was unused to London streets, and ought not to have been driven in London on such a day as Jubilee day.

The only question left to the jury was the question of negligence, and they found a verdict for the plaintiff. The other question, as to who was responsible for Loveday's negligence, was left to me, and it was agreed that I should draw such inferences of fact as a jury could draw, so far as it was necessary to do so.

I have already said that the defendant owned carriages and horses, but, not having a stable of his own, liveried them with a tenant of his named Walker. The defendant is a publican, and Walker's stables adjoin one of the defendant's public-houses. The arrangement with regard to the defendant's carriages and horses began on the 3rd of January, 1897. On the 10th of May, Loveday began to drive for the defendant, and he continued to drive for him until the day of the accident. Loveday was not selected by the defendant, but the proper inference for me to draw from the facts is that the defendant told Walker that he required a man to drive and that Walker accordingly sent Loveday. It must be taken that originally there was no choice by the defendant of Loveday. Still, it is not unimportant to observe that there is evidence that the defendant showed satisfaction with, and approval of, Loveday; and though there was no power in the defendant to dismiss Loveday, he had power, nevertheless, to say to Walker, "You must not send me this man any more," and he could say to Loveday, "I dismiss you from the occupation of driving my carriage." He did not, however, do so.

Between the 24th of May and the 31st of May the defendant ordered that Loveday should be supplied, at his own cost, with a suit of clothes. One other date is material. The horse was brought to London from the country on the 14th of June, and was driven by Loveday for the first time on the 16th of June. Between then and the 22nd of June the horse was driven some two or three times only by Loveday. So far as I know these are all the material facts.

The question is whether there was evidence upon which the jury could find that Loveday was the servant of the defendant. It is impossible for me to say that there was not evidence to leave to the jury. The question for me to decide now is whether, in the circumstances of the case, I ought to say that the defendant is to be relieved from responsibility for the negligence of Loveday while driving him. It is clear from the authorities that, notwithstanding the Scriptures, a man may be in the position of serving two masters at a time. While in the general employment of Walker it was still possible for Loveday to be in the particular employment of the defendant, and to be the servant of the defendant in relation to the particular matter of driving the defendant's carriage.

I think it is desirable that I should draw attention to the leading authorities upon the subject, because, if it were not for those authorities, I should not have felt the perplexity that I have felt. No one of these cases is precisely on all-fours with this one. In no one of them does there exist the conjunction of facts presented by it—namely, the ownership by the defendant of the carriage, horse, and the harness, the fact that the livery was supplied by the defendant, and the fact that the horse that was being driven was one to which the driver was not accustomed. Nor does there come into the consideration the fact that among the acts of negligence alleged was the mode in which the horse was bitted taking into account the hardness of its mouth, &c.

The first of the cases I have referred to is Laugher v. Pointer, which was the subject of consideration by the whole body of common law judges. I have tried to find out how the judges were in fact divided, but I have been unable to do so. The case was only reported in the King's Bench, and the judges of that court were equally divided. The headnote of the report in Barnwell & Cresswell is as follows: "Where the owner of a carriage hired of a stable keeper a pair of horses to draw it for a day, and the owner of the horses provided a driver, through whose negligent driving an injury was done to a horse belonging to a third person: Held, by Abbott, C.J., and Littledale, J., that the owner of the carriage was not liable to be sued for such injury, Bayley and Holroyd, JJ., diss." In that case all the defendant owned was the passive inert carriage. Abbott, C.J., in the course of his judgment says (p. 577): "I must own that I cannot perceive any substantial difference between hiring a pair of horses to draw my carriage about London for a day, and hiring them to draw it for a stage on the road I am travelling, the driver being in both cases furnished by the owner in the usual way; nor can I feel any substantial difference between hiring the horses to draw my own carriage on these occasions and hiring a carriage with them of their owner." With that observation I am inclined to agree. At p. 580 he says: "I have acknowledged the difficulty of drawing a line with reference to time or distance; and I think we must look to other circumstances in order to ascertain the obligation of the hirer. Length of time may in itself be a circumstance deserving of attention, because it may be evidence of the subsequent approbation and continuance, if not of the original choice, of the coachman." That is an observation pregnant with good sense. But it does not, in my opinion, govern the present case.

Brady v. Giles, 1 Moo. & Rob. 494, is the next case to which I refer. It was decided by a judge of remarkable good sense—Lord Abinger. To our eyes that case is the clearest in the world. There seems to be no reason for any liability in Mr. M'Kinlay at all. That gentleman hired from the defendant, who was a carriage jobber, a fully-equipped carriage and four horses for a trip to Windsor and back. On the way back, the carriage, owing, as it was alleged, to the negligence of the postillions, collided with the plaintiff's gig. In the action brought against the carriage jobber it was contended that the postillions were at the time the servants of Mr. M'Kinlay. Lord Abinger refused to nonsuit the plaintiff, saying that "It had always appeared to him that it was quite impossible to lay down any rule of law on such a point. No satisfactory line could be drawn at which, as a matter of law, the general owner of a carriage, or rather, the general employer of the driver, ceased to be responsible and the temporary hirer became so. Each case of this class must depend upon its own circumstances." There appears to me to be great good sense in those observations, and it was in view of them that I asked for power to draw inferences.

Now comes a case which presents to my mind great difficulty, Quarman v. Burnett. The defendants, two old ladies, kept a comfortable carriage of their own and had, for a period of three years, been in the habit of hiring horses and a coachman from a jobmaster. The same coachman came every day to drive them, and they paid him a small gratuity for each drive. The ladies wished him to present a respectable appearance, so they supplied him with a coat and a hat. Desiring to guard against his using these garments elsewhere, they instructed him to change, on the occasion of each drive, in the hall of their house. On one of these occasions while the man was in the hall changing his coat and hat, the horses bolted and came into collision with the plaintiff's chaise. One would have thought that on that particular occasion the ladies might have been held to be responsible, but a verdict having been found for the plaintiff, the Court of Exchequer set it aside on the ground that there was not even evidence to go to the jury that the coachman was acting as the servant of the defendants. That is a strong authority in favour of the defendant. Yet it differs from the present case in two respects. Firstly, the horse that was being driven in the present case was the horse of the defendant; and, secondly, the horse was one which had only recently been acquired by him and with which, consequently, the driver supplied by the livery stable keeper had but a slight acquaintance. Neither of these matters are, in my opinion, immaterial. Why do I say that the fact of the horse belonging to the defendant is material? For this reason, so long as the hirer contracts for the supply to him of a complete equipage for an hour, a day, or a week, as the case may be, and the livery stable keeper, in pursuance of that contract, supplies him with a fully-equipped carriage, including horses and a man to drive them, the hirer has no kind of control over the driver, except in one particular, he can indicate to him to what point he wishes to go. He could not order him to increase his speed, for the driver could say, "I am not your servant. I know my master's wishes with regard to the horses, and I will drive them accordingly." But the case is different where the horses belong to the hirer of the driver. The hirer could then say, "I am late; drive fast, up hill and down hill," and if the driver refused to obey, he could say to the livery stable keeper, "I will not have that man again."

Again, it must be taken into consideration that this horse was only recently brought from Yorkshire, and had not been driven by Loveday a sufficient number of times to enable him to know the peculiarities of its temper and the proper manner of harnessing it and of adjusting the reins and bit.

All these are elements to be considered in determining the relation of the driver to the defendant.

Two cases remain to be considered, and I confess that I cannot altogether reconcile them with some of those already cited. The first is Rourke v. The White Moss Colliery Co. That case makes it clear that a man may be the general servant of one person and yet at the same time be the servant of another person for some particular purpose. The defendants having begun sinking a shaft in a colliery, for which purpose they had fixed an engine near the mouth of the shaft, agreed with W. to do the sinking and excavating at a certain price per yard, W. to find all labour, the defendants to provide and place at the disposal of W. the necessary engine-power with an engineer to work the engine (who was employed and paid by the defendants), the engine to be under the control of W. The plaintiff, a man employed and paid by W., while working at the bottom of the shaft, was injured by the negligence of the engineer. It was held that, though the engineer remained the general servant of the defendants, yet, being under the control and orders of W. at the time of the accident, he was acting as the servant of W. and not of the defendants, who were therefore not liable for his negligence. The case is unquestionably at variance with Quarman v. Burnett. It also brings out this, that the important element in determining whether a man is the servant of the one person or of the other in relation to a particular employment, is not whether he is paid by the person whose servant he is said to be, but whether he was under his control in the conduct of the business. If my coachman falls ill and I borrow a coachman from somebody else, and he drives my brougham so negligently that someone is injured, who is responsible? The coachman is not my servant. He has only been lent to me for the one or two occasions. The question rests on the principle of representation, qui facit per alium facit per se. It cannot be said that my friend who lends me the coachman is responsible. No. The man is responsible who borrows the coachman, under whose control he is for the time being, and who gets the advantage of his services.

In Donovan v. Laing the defendants contracted to lend to a firm, who were engaged in loading a ship at their wharf, a crane with a man in charge of it. The man in charge of the crane received directions from the firm or their servants as to the working of the crane, and the defendants had no control in the matter. The plaintiff, who was the servant of the wharfingers and was employed by them to direct the working of the crane, sustained an injury through being struck by it by reason of the negligence of the man in charge, and sued the defendants on the ground that the negligence was the act of their servant. It was held that though the man in charge of the crane remained the general servant of the defendants, yet, as they had parted with the power of controlling him with regard to the matter on which he was engaged, they were not liable for his negligence while so employed. That case is on all-fours with Rourke v. The White Moss Colliery Co. Apply the principle of those two cases to the facts of the present case. What control had the livery stable keeper over Loveday while driving the defendant's horse. None. The whole control was in the defendant, who could have ordered him to go fast or slow as he pleased, or to keep the horse without food or otherwise manage the horse as he indicated.

It is time that a comprehensive principle should be laid down in these cases. I think the principle to be derived from the cases is that if the hirer simply applies to the livery stable keeper to drive him between two points or for a fixed period, and the latter supplies all other necessaries for the purpose, the hirer is in no sense responsible for any negligence on the part of the driver. But where the brougham, the horse, the harness, and the livery are the property of the person who hires the driver, especially where the peculiarities of the horse are not known to the driver, who has not driven him previously, and where, as occurs in this case, the driver has driven the hirer for a considerable time in such a manner as to lead one to infer an approval by the former—looking at the congregation of all these circumstances, it seems to me that if the question were put to a jury whose servant was this man, they would say that this man was not the servant of the livery stable keeper but of the person who hired him. In my judgment, therefore, the defendant is liable.

Ex parte MERSEY DOCKS AND HARBOUR BOARD. (a.)

Practice — Interpleader — Stakeholder—Bailee estopped from setting up jus tertii—R. S. C., order 57.

A bailee who is estopped from setting up the jus tertii may nevertheless be entitled to relief by way of interpleader.

Appeal from an order of Ridley, J., directing the trial of an interpleader issue.

Certain tobacco, which had been imported into Liverpool, was warehoused with the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board. The importer executed a transfer of the tobacco to the Union Credit Bank to secure the repayment of an advance, and subsequently, as the Union Credit Bank alleged, in fraud of them, he executed a transfer of the same tobacco to the North and South Wales Bank to secure repayment of an advance.

The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board having received notice from the North and South Wales Bank of the transfer to them, wrote to them a letter, called in the case the letter of attornment, in which it was stated that the tobacco in question, stored in the dock warehouses, was now held to the order of the North and South Wales Bank. On the faith of this letter the North and South Wales Bank made an advance to the importer.

An action for the wrongful detention of the tobacco having been brought by the North and South Wales Bank against the harbour board, and a claim to the tobacco having also been made by the Union Credit Bank, the harbour board interpleaded, and Ridley, J., made an order directing the trial of an interpleader issue between the two banks. The order further ordered that the Union Credit Bank and the North and South Wales Bank should be restrained from commencing or prosecuting any proceedings against the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board in respect of the subject-matter of the interpleader application, except in respect of special damage, if any, which the North and South Wales Bank might have sustained and be entitled to recover against the harbour board through having acted on the letter of attornment.

From this order the North and South Wales Bank appealed.

Pickford, Q.C., and Maurice Hill, for the North and South Wales Bank. — The harbour board have estopped themselves by the letter of attornment from denying the title of the North and South Wales Bank, and in refusing to deliver up the goods they are guilty of an act of conversion: Henderson & Co. v. Williams, 43 W. R. 274, [1895] 1 Q. B. 521. The action, therefore, ought to be allowed to proceed. Relief by way of interpleader ought not to be granted to a person who is estopped from setting up the jus tertii. The question of estoppel cannot be tried in an issue between the two banks, and on that ground also the interpleader order ought to be set aside: Baker v. The Bank of Australasia, 5 W. R. 253, 1 C. B. N. S. 515.

Carver, Q.C., and Leslie Scott, for the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board.—The harbour board are mere stakeholders, and are entitled to the protection of interpleader. Even if they are estopped from setting up the jus tertii, they are not thereby debarred from the remedy of interpleader: Attenborough v. St. Katharine's Dock Co., 26 W. R. 583, 3 C. P. D. 450; Robinson v. Jenkins, 38 W. R. 360, 24 Q. B. D. 275.

Pickford, Q.C., in reply.—The mere existence of a contract of bailment is not sufficient to exclude interpleader. The principle on which a bailee may be allowed to set up the jus tertii is explained in Biddle v. Bond, 13 W. R. 561, 6 B. & S. 225. But where there is a real estoppel, as in this case, the bailee cannot interplead. In Attenborough v. St. Katharine's Dock Co. and in Robinson v. Jenkins there was no real estoppel.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I agree with Ridley, J., in thinking this is a proper case for interpleader. The practice with regard to interpleader is now governed by order 57 of the Rules of the Supreme Court. Rule 1 of that order says that "relief by way of interpleader may be granted where the person seeking relief (in this order called the applicant) is under liability for any debt, money, goods or chattels, for or in respect of which he is, or expects to be, sued by two or more parties (in this order called the claimants) making adverse claims thereto." This case clearly comes within those words. The only fetters on the jurisdiction to make an interpleader order in such a case are those mentioned in rule 2; the applicant must satisfy the court that he claims no interest in the subject-matter in dispute, that he is not colluding with either of the claimants, and that he is willing to dispose of the subject-matter as the court may direct. Beyond this there is no limitation on the power to make an order, if the court thinks fit. It is said that the harbour board are estopped by their letter of attornment to the North and South Wales Bank from setting up the jus tertii. That does not touch the jurisdiction. But it is said that, even if there is jurisdiction to make an interpleader order, the court ought not to make it by reason of this estoppel point. Assuming that there is an estoppel in this case, which it is not necessary to decide, I think that the dicta of the judges in Attenborough v. St. Katharine's Dock Co., though there was in fact no estoppel in that case, show that the mere existence of an estoppel is no reason why an interpleader order should not be granted.

In my opinion the question as to the title to the goods in dispute should be fought out between the two banks. But the North and South Wales Bank ought not to be shut out from the chance of fighting the question of estoppel between themselves and the harbour board. And I think we ought to enlarge the order so as to leave it open to them, if necessary, to bring an action against the harbour board to recover the value of the goods and damages. The exception will, therefore, be varied so as to run thus—except any claim which the North and South Wales Bank may have by reason of the letter of attornment.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that order 57 gives an unfettered jurisdiction, and that it is competent to the court to grant the relief of interpleader in such a case as this. Is there, then, any reason why we should not exercise our jurisdiction in this particular case? If it were not for recent authorities I should be disposed to yield to the argument of the appellants that, where a person is debarred from setting up the jus tertii, he is not entitled to interplead. That would seem to me to be a reasonable ground on which the court might decline to allow an interpleader order. But, looking at the history of the practice in interpleader, I think that the Legislature has shown an intention to remove certain fetters which formerly existed, and it seems to me that in Attenborough v. St. Katharine's Dock Co. the judges faced the contention which is now put forward, and expressed the opinion that, even where a person is estopped from setting up the jus tertii, relief by way of interpleader may nevertheless be granted.

Order varied.

In re HARRISON AND BOTTOMLEY. (a.)

Receiver—Equitable execution—Charge on land—Reversion, sale of—"Actual delivery in execution"—Judgments Act, 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 112), s. 1.

The defendants in a probate action having been condemned in costs, the plaintiff obtained an order from the Probate Division for the appointment of a receiver of the rents and profits of real estate vested in remainder in the defendants. On an application in the Chancery Division by the plaintiff for a charge on and sale of such remainder,

Held, that no such charge or sale could be enforced, as the appointment of a receiver did not constitute an "actual delivery in execution" of the remainder within the meaning of section 1 of the Judgments Act, 1864.

Appeal from North, J.

Henry Gresham, by his will dated the 1st of July, 1895, devised and bequeathed all the residue of his estate to his wife for life and after her death to Sarah Harrison and Barbara Bottomley in equal shares, and appointed John Woods his executor. The testator died on the 2nd of July, 1895.

The executor brought an action against the legatees to have the will established, and on the 10th of July, 1896, a declaration was made that the will had been duly proved in solemn form. Judgment was entered for the plaintiff with costs.

On the 14th of January, 1897, an order was made on the defendants to pay to the plaintiff within seven days the taxed costs of the action, amounting to £122 3s. 7d. Mrs. Harrison was a widow with no property whatever. Mrs. Bottomley was a married woman having no separate estate, her husband being a gardener in the receipt of £1 a week as wages. The only property available for the payment of the costs was the reversionary interest of the two ladies in the real estate devised by the testator (worth about £640) subject to the life interest of Mrs. Gresham.

On the application of Woods on the 12th of April, 1897, an order was made by the Probate Division appointing a receiver to receive the rents and profits of the testator's real estate without prejudice to the rights of any prior incumbrancers. Then Woods presented a petition in the Chancery Division, intituled in the matter of the Act 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, the Act 27 & 28 Vict. c. 112, the Act 44 & 45 Vict. c. 41, and in the matter of Sarah Harrison and Barbara Bottomley, asking that the reversionary interests of Mrs. Harrison and Mrs. Bottomley, which had been delivered in equitable execution, might be sold, and the proceeds paid to the petitioner on account of what was due to him under his judgment of the 10th of July, 1896.

North, J., dismissed the petition, with costs, to be set off against those due to the petitioner by the respondents under the order of the 14th of January, 1897.

John Woods appealed.

LINDLEY, M.R.—It is obvious to us all that, however desirous we may be to do what the appellant asks us to do, we have no power to help him. I am rather sorry that that should be the case, for if we could do this, we would. The difficulty arises in this way: The defendants are married women who are entitled to legal remainders in real estate devised to them by the testator, and Mr. Woods, the appellant, has obtained a judgment against them, and he cannot get his money. The question is whether he can, whilst the defendants' interests are reversionary, obtain a sale of their estates. He has obtained from the Probate Court an order appointing a receiver, and I am not now going to question that order. I assume for the moment that it is unobjectionable. I take it that if these ladies were to sell or attempt to sell their reversions, and Mr. Woods were to know of that, he could stop it, for that order would operate surely as an injunction against them obtaining the money; so that it appears that the order is by no means worthless, but it is not a charge. What we are asked to say is, first, that under the order for payment of costs there is a charge; and, secondly, that in consequence of the appointment of a receiver the land of these ladies has been actually delivered in execution.

The question whether it is a charge depends on 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, and from that I should have said, if it had not been qualified by a subsequent statute, that Mr. Woods clearly had a charge; but then there comes the Judgments Act, 1864, s. 1, which very materially modifies the operation of the former Act and says this: "No judgment, statute, or recognizance to be entered up after the passing of this Act shall affect any land (of whatever tenure) until such land shall have been actually delivered in execution by virtue of a writ of elegit or other lawful authority, in pursuance of such judgment, statute, or recognizance." This is inconsistent with the judgment being a charge, for a judgment is "not to affect any land . . . until such land shall have been actually delivered in execution by virtue of a writ of elegit or other lawful authority." I agree that the words "writ of elegit or other lawful authority" would include an order such as this one, appointing a receiver; but the question is whether we can say that this land, which these ladies have no present right to possess, can be regarded as having been actually delivered in execution. My answer is, No; we cannot stretch the words in order to do what we think is justice. That is the difficulty—and North, J., has felt it, and we have also felt it before now, in both of the cases that have been cited here to-day, viz., In re Hamilton, 34 W. R. 203, 31 Ch. D. 291, and Cadman v. Cadman, 35 W. R. 1, 33 Ch. D. 397—which prevents us from doing what we are now asked to do. Having regard to these cases, it appears to me we are asked to make an order which we have no jurisdiction to make.

There is nothing in any of the cases cited by counsel for the appellant which conflicts with this view. In none of them was this point before the court, and though perhaps there are two cases to which he has referred (In re Cooper, 37 W. R. 330, and In re Jones, [1895] W. N. 123) which might be favourable to his contention, I doubt whether they were decisions upon reversionary interests at all. They are so reported that I cannot tell whether at the time the application was made the interests in question were reversionary or not. But passing this over, there is no authority to justify us in upsetting the order of North, J., and this appeal must therefore be dismissed with costs.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and for the same reasons. I have looked at the order in In re Cooper which has been mentioned, and it appears to me that there is nothing in the order to justify the suggestion that a reversionary interest was being dealt with; on the contrary, the order is absolutely inconsistent with that view, and therefore it must only be considered as a suggestion. Another suggestion was made—viz.: that in In re South, 22 W. R. 460, James, L.J., had departed from what had been said in earlier cases and laid down a rule which is absolutely unintelligible, and held that for this purpose there was a difference between a reversion and a remainder. What he did say was perfectly sound and intelligible, as we should expect from that great judge. What he said is this, that if a man is seised of land there is a difference; that if he is owner of the reversion he may also have seisin of the property and that that can only be the case when the reversion is expectant on a tenancy for a term, i.e., a chattel interest. If there were a remainder on a lease it would not be a remainder in the strict sense in the eye of the old law; the possession of the estate subject to the lease would be seisin; the owner would be seised of the estate subject to the lease and that would be a present seisin. That is all that James, L.J., said. A man may have a remainder on a freehold, but in that case he is not seised of the property.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree entirely. The explanation of the cases to which counsel for the appellant called our attention as to the effect of an order appointing a receiver for the purpose of execution amounting to delivery of possession within the meaning of the statute of 1864 is that these cases, so far as they were cited to us, one and all were cases in which the judgment debtor had a present seisin or present interest in the land. I quite agree that the cases do show that the mere intervention of some slight legal impediment which does not affect ownership, but which certainly does affect the right to present possession, like a lien or incumbrance of some sort, will not prevent there being, by means of an order appointing a receiver, a delivery of possession within the meaning of the statute of 1864.

The only other thing that I should like to add is that there is one case which was not cited—Macnicoll v. Parnell, 35 W. R. 773—in which a judgment debt being unsatisfied for want of goods of defendant, but the defendant having, expectant on the death of the tenant for life, a legacy for a larger amount than the judgment debt, it was held that a receiver should be appointed to receive a sufficient portion of the said legacy when it should become receivable. I have not looked at that case very carefully and our attention was not called to it, but whatever may be the effect of it, it was not a case which was dealing with interests in land at all, or which would constitute a sufficient present interest in land so as to justify an order appointing a receiver for the purpose of taking reversions in execution.

Appeal dismissed.

This was an appeal from the decision of Kekewich, J. The case is reported in 46 W. R., p. 362, where the facts are fully stated. The following is an epitome of the material facts:

Under the will of Walter Williams the elder, who died on the 5th of March, 1892, his trustees held the residue of his estate upon trust for conversion and to pay the income thereof to the defendant Walter Williams during his life. By an indenture of mortgage dated the 24th of December, 1895, the defendant Walter Williams assigned to the plaintiff F. W. West all his interest under the said will by way of mortgage to secure £600 and interest as therein mentioned, and it was thereby agreed that until the 24th of December, 1896, or until breach of the covenants on the part of the defendant Walter Williams, the plaintiff F. W. West should not give notice of that mortgage to the trustees of the said will.

By a memorandum of charge also dated the 24th of December, 1895, the defendant Walter Williams charged his interest under the said will with the payment to the defendant F. Temple of the sum of £150 and interest, but subject to the said mortgage.

By an indenture of mortgage dated the 2nd of April, 1896, made between the defendant Walter Williams of the one part, and the defendants P. A. Williams and J. W. Williams (thereinafter called the mortgagees) of the other part, reciting (amongst other things) that the defendant Walter Williams had applied to the mortgagees to advance to him the sum of £2,297 and also an annual sum of £200 during a period of five years from the 15th of February, 1896, which the mortgagees had (subject to the conditions or limitations expressed in the indenture of settlement thereinafter recited) agreed to do upon having repayment thereof with interest secured in manner therein appearing, and on condition of the defendant Walter Williams executing the said indenture of settlement, and also reciting the said indenture of settlement, and that it was already prepared and was intended to bear even date with but to be executed immediately after the indenture now in statement, the defendant Walter Williams thereby assigned to the mortgagees all his interest under the said will, subject to redemption on payment to the mortgagees of the sum of £2,297 and interest and such further sum or (if any) as might be advanced by the mortgagees under their covenant in the said indenture of settlement or the indenture now in statement, with interest.

By the said indenture of settlement of even date with the mortgage of the 2nd of April, 1896, which was made between the defendant Walter Williams of the first part, the said defendants P. A. Williams and J. W. Williams of the second part, and the defendants Taylor and Miére of the third part, after reciting the said mortgage of the 2nd of April, 1896, in consideration of the covenant on the part of the defendants P. A. Williams and G. W. Williams thereinafter contained, the defendant Walter Williams as settlor thereby assigned his interest under the said will to the defendants Taylor and Miére in trust for the defendant Walter Williams during his life, or until he should assign, charge, or incumber the same or affect so to do, and after the determination of that trust during his life upon the trusts therein mentioned. And the defendants P. A. Williams and J. W. Williams thereby covenanted with the defendant Walter Williams subject to the conditions therein mentioned to pay to him for the said period of five years the annual sum of £200 in manner therein mentioned. Notice of the said indentures of mortgage and settlement was on the 2nd of April, 1896, duly given to the trustees of the said will.

On the 8th of January, 1897, the plaintiff F. W. West first gave notice to the trustees of the said will of his said mortgage of the 24th of December, 1895. The defendant Temple gave no notice of his charge to the trustees of the said will.

On the 15th of February, 1897, the plaintiff F. W. West offered to redeem the mortgage of the 2nd of April, 1896, but that offer was refused. This was the first notice that the defendants P. A. Williams and J. W. Williams had of the plaintiff's mortgage. The plaintiff claimed by this action (1) to enforce his mortgage; (3) a declaration of the priorities as between the plaintiff and defendants; (4) a declaration that the interest of the defendant Walter Williams under the said indenture of settlement was subject to the plaintiff's mortgage; (5) redemption of the defendants' mortgages, so far as they had priority over the plaintiff's mortgage.

The plaintiff admitted at the trial that the defendants P. A. Williams and J. W. Williams were entitled to priority as regarded the sum of £2,297, and also as to all such other sums as were advanced by them to the defendant Walter Williams, under their covenant prior to the 15th of February, 1897, but claimed priority over all sums advanced by them after that date.

Kekewich, J., in effect, held that the further advances having been made in pursuance of the covenant, the defendants P. A. Williams and J. W. Williams were entitled to priority in respect of all such advances, notwithstanding notice of the mortgage of the plaintiff, and also that the indenture of settlement itself had priority over the plaintiff's mortgage, and his lordship dismissed the action with costs as against the defendants P. A. Williams and J. W. Williams and the defendants Taylor and Miére.

The plaintiff J. W. West and the defendant Temple appealed.

Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and Wright Taylor, for the plaintiff.—We submit that notwithstanding the covenant to make further advances, Hopkinson v. Rolt, 9 W. R. 900, 9 H. L. Cas. 514, applies, and therefore the defendants P. A. Williams and J. W. Williams are not entitled to priority over the plaintiff in respect of advances made after notice of his mortgage. Moreover, the mortgage to the plaintiff cannot be held to be a breach of the condition in the settlement. "Until he shall assign" has never been held to refer to a past assignment. The cases of Manning v. Chambers, 1 De G. & Sm. 282, and Seymour v. Lucas, 8 W. R. 599, 1 Dr. & Sm. 177, depend on the intention which the court held to be expressed. There is no such expressed intention here. [LINDLEY, M.R., referred to Metcalfe v. Metcalfe, [1891] 3 Ch. 1, 40 W. R. Dig. 280.] Further, the settlement was voluntary, and cannot defeat the plaintiff's mortgage.

Warrington, Q.C., and Sargant, for the defendants P. A. Williams and J. W. Williams.—Hopkinson v. Rolt does not apply; the further advances here were not voluntary, the uncles were bound to make them. As to the priority of the settlement we submit that Dearle v. Hall, 3 Russ. 1, and Loveridge v. Cooper, 3 Russ. 30, show that the principle is that a mortgagee having neglected to give notice cannot complain if the mortgagor deals with his equity in favour of bonâ fide purchasers.

Butcher, Q.C., and A. R. G. Jennings, for the trustees of the settlement.

Bramwell Davis, Q.C., was only asked to reply as to the effect of Hopkinson v. Rolt, as explained in Bradford Banking Co. v. Briggs, 35 W. R. 521, 12 App. Cas. 29.

Union Bank of Scotland v. National Bank of Scotland, 12 App. Cas. 53, was also referred to.

LINDLEY, M.R.—I agree in the judgment which Chitty, L.J., is about to read, but I wish to add a few words with regard to Hopkinson v. Rolt. A first mortgagee whose mortgage is taken to cover what is then due to him and also further advances cannot claim the benefit of his security for further advances in priority to a second mortgagee of whose mortgage he had notice before the further advances were made. This rule was ultimately established in the well-known case of Hopkinson v. Rolt. In that case the first mortgagee had not agreed to make further advances. We have to consider whether the same rule applies when he has agreed to do so. Kekewich, J., has held it does not. This point is of great general importance, and I have carefully considered it and have come to a conclusion different from that of the learned judge. Hopkinson v. Rolt was commented upon and explained by the House of Lords in Bradford Banking Co. v. Briggs and in Union Bank of Scotland v. National Bank of Scotland. The three cases show very clearly that the principle which underlies the rule established in Hopkinson v. Rolt is simply this, that an owner of property dealing honestly with it cannot confer upon another a greater interest in that property than he himself has. The rule rests on no technicality of English law, it is based on the plainest good sense, and it is as much the law of Scotland as the law of England. When a man mortgages his property he is still free to deal with his equity of redemption in it, or, in other words, with the property itself subject to the mortgage. If he creates a second mortgage he cannot afterwards honestly suppress it and create another mortgage subject only to the first. Nor can anyone who knows of the second mortgage obtain from the mortgagor a greater right to override it than the mortgagor himself has. On the other hand, the first mortgagee has no right to restrain the mortgagor from borrowing money from someone else and from giving him a second mortgage subject to the first. Even if the first mortgagee has agreed to make further advances on the property mortgaged to him the mortgagor is under no obligation to take further advances from him and from no one else, and if the mortgagor chooses to borrow money from someone else and to give him a second mortgage the mortgagor thereby releases the first mortgagee from his obligation to make further advances. Whatever prevents the mortgagor from giving to the first mortgagee the agreed security for his further advances releases the first mortgagor from his obligation to make them. A plea of exoneration and discharge before breach would be a good defence at law to an action by the mortgagor against the first mortgagee for not making further advances. If, notwithstanding his release, the first mortgagee makes further advances with notice of a second mortgage he is in no better position than anyone else who does the like.

For these reasons I have come to the conclusion that the rule laid down in Hopkinson v. Rolt does apply to the advances made by the uncles to their nephew after they had notice of the plaintiff's mortgage.

As regards the rest of the case I cannot usefully add anything to the judgment of my brother Chitty, L.J., which I have read and in which I concur.

CHITTY, L.J.—This appeal is by the plaintiff and the defendant Temple against parts of the judgment of Kekewich, J. It raises two principal points—first, whether the defendants P. A. Williams and J. W. Williams (whom I will call the uncles) are entitled to tack to their security the advances made by them to the defendant Walter Williams, their nephew, after the 15th of February, 1897, the date when the uncles first had notice of the plaintiff's security. The plaintiff by his pleading claimed priority over the mortgage to the uncles. But at the trial it was admitted that the uncles must have priority for all advances made by them up to the 15th of February, 1897, and this is also admitted by the notice of appeal. The second point relates to the question whether the plaintiff is entitled to redeem the uncles' mortgage, and, if he redeems, to a judgment over for foreclosure against the trustees of the settlement made contemporaneously with the mortgage to the uncles.

There is no dispute between the parties on the facts. [His lordship gave a short summary of the facts, and continued:] The judgment under appeal is to the following effect: First, it declares that the uncles' mortgage, including all sums advanced and to be advanced under the covenant in the settlement, and also the settlement itself, have priority over the plaintiff's mortgage, and dismissed the action with costs as against the uncles and the trustees of the settlement. It includes, therefore, in the uncles' priority, not merely (a) the sums which the uncles had advanced up to the 15th of February, 1897, but (b) also sums advanced subsequently to that date down to the judgment, and (c) all sums which they might thereafter advance under the covenant. Further, it excludes the plaintiff from any right of redemption. Secondly, it goes on to declare that by virtue of the plaintiff's mortgage made before the date of the settlement the life interest of the nephew under the settlement had determined and the discretionary trust had come into operation. And thirdly, it makes a foreclosure decree against the remaining defendants only—namely, the nephew and the defendant Temple, intended apparently to be confined to the policy of assurance although not so confined in express terms.

Now, on the first point there arises a question of considerable general importance. It is this. When a mortgagee is seeking to tack advances made by him after notice of a subsequent incumbrance, is the principle of Hopkinson v. Rolt excluded by the circumstance that the mortgagee has entered into a covenant to make the advances. In Hopkinson v. Rolt there was no such covenant, and the subsequent advances which the mortgagee was not allowed to tack were merely voluntary. In this respect the case before us differs. Hopkinson v. Rolt was considered by the House of Lords in Bradford Banking Co. v. Briggs and in Union Bank of Scotland v. National Bank of Scotland. In Bradford, &c., Co. v. Briggs, a limited company had stipulated for a "first and permanent lien" on its shares for any money which might become due to it from a shareholder. The banking company, with notice of this agreement for a lien, made advances on shares. The shareholder subsequently became indebted to the company, and the company claimed priority for these subsequent debts incurred after notice given by the bank of their security, and they contended that the bank, knowing the terms on which the shares were issued, and taking with notice, could not set up their charge as against the company. This contention was negatived by the House of Lords. The principle on which these decisions are founded appears to me to be that a mortgagee cannot obtain a charge on property which is no longer the mortgagor's to charge, and which the mortgagee knows at the time when he makes his further advance is no longer the property of the mortgagor. No charge arises for a further advance until it is actually made. This principle is plain and simple, and is based on natural justice and fair dealing. If this be the principle (which I think it is), the covenant to make further advances creates no difficulty, and for this reason: the covenant is to make the further advance on the security of the property, and inasmuch as the mortgagor has by his own act deprived himself of the power to give the stipulated security, no action for damages would lie on the covenant. It is hardly necessary to add that no action lies for specific performance of any agreement to make a loan. The result, then, thus far is that the uncles are not entitled as against the plaintiff to tack any advance which they made to the nephew after the 15th of February, 1897.

On the second point the question is whether the plaintiff is entitled to redeem the uncles' security. I cannot entertain any doubt on this question. I think he is, not merely because he is a person deriving title from the nephew under the express words of the proviso for redemption in the uncles' mortgage deed, but because he is plainly the second incumbrancer on the nephew's interest under the will. Then there arises the question whether, if he redeems the uncles' mortgage, he is entitled to a foreclosure decree against the trustees of the settlement, who represent in this action all the persons claiming beneficially under the trusts of the settlement other than the nephew himself, who, although he was properly served and put in a defence, did not appear at the trial. The uncles are not beneficiaries under the settlement. The trustees contend that the true effect of the settlement and the mortgage to the uncles is that the uncles purchased the nephew's life interest under the will for value without notice of the plaintiff's security and then settled the interest thus purchased. But the answer to this contention is to be found in the deeds themselves. The contention is inconsistent with the form and substance of the deeds. They contain no trace or suggestion of any such purchase; the settlement is not made by the uncles, nor by their discretion as beneficial owners; the settlor is the nephew and the nephew alone. This is clearly expressed on the face of the settlement. The consideration for the settlement is another matter. The consideration was the then present advance and the conditional covenant by the uncles to make further advances for the nephew's maintenance. It was for this consideration that the nephew agreed that he should make the settlement. All that he could effectually settle, as against the plaintiff and the defendant Temple, was his own interest, which was, as he knew, subject to the securities which he had created in their favour. It is noticeable that, although in the mortgage to the uncles he assigns "as beneficial owner," which, under the Conveyancing Act, imports all the usual mortgagor's covenants, including that against incumbrances, he assigns in the settlement "as settlor," which imports merely a covenant for further assurance. He therefore does not covenant in the settlement that his interest which he settles is free from incumbrances. This fortifies the conclusion (which I think is otherwise plain) that he settled merely his interest, whatever it was. The settlement, therefore, is of no validity against the plaintiff. The plaintiff, if he redeems the uncles' mortgage, is consequently entitled to the usual decree for foreclosure against the trustees and the defendant Temple and the nephew for what the plaintiff pays to the uncles on redeeming and for what is due to the plaintiff under and by virtue of his own security.

In these circumstances the question whether the nephew has forfeited his life interest under the settlement becomes comparatively immaterial. It was a question of importance according to the view which the learned judge took. Now, it is material only on the question whether the nephew should be let in to redeem under that part of the judgment which relates to foreclosure by the plaintiff. It is an important question between the nephew and the other beneficiaries under the settlement. The language of the trusts and of the covenant for future advances which is contained in the settlement itself is identical. It points to the future only, it is "until he shall assign or incumber" and so forth. These words must have the same meaning in the trusts and in the covenant. This was admitted at the bar, and was rightly admitted. If the covenant had stood alone there could be no question that the words of futurity could not be construed as relating to the past. Words which grammatically refer only to the future have been construed in a settlement of this kind made by will or otherwise as including the past in order to give effect to the intention manifested. It is sufficient to refer to Metcalfe v. Metcalfe. There is no authority applying any such doctrine to the case of a condition in a covenant. In the present case there is a recital in the settlement that the nephew had created "certain charges" (without specifying what they were) on his interest under his father's will. In the face of this recital it seems to me that it cannot be held that there was an intention to make past charges a ground of forfeiture. Any such supposed intention is directly negatived. There is no obligation laid upon the nephew to apply the money which he obtained from his uncles in paying off the prior charges. If those charges formed a ground of forfeiture then the life interest of the nephew ceased the moment it arose and the covenant never became operative.

With regard to the costs I think that the incumbrancers should add their costs of the action, including the costs of appeal, to their securities. This is the general rule when a case of disputed priorities arises out of the acts or conduct of the mortgagor. The plaintiff offered to redeem before suit, but he confined his offer to the original advance by the uncles. He withdrew his offer by claiming priority in his statement of claim. Still he asked to have the priorities ascertained and offered to redeem if he had not the first security.

As to the claim of the defendant Temple who joins in the appeal, the facts are not sufficiently before us to enable us to decide anything specifically as to his rights. By his defence he submitted to act as the court should direct. The question (if it arises) between him and the uncles as to their right to tack as against him their subsequent advances will depend on the time when he first gave notice of his security. But any such question is one between co-defendants, and therefore one which the court does not decide at the trial unless it involves any right of the plaintiff, which is not the case here, or unless the defendants concur in asking for a decision. Any question between the uncles and the trustees of the settlement as to the uncles' right to tack their advances made after the 15th of February, 1897, as against the trustees is also a question between co-defendants, but it may not be improper to state my opinion that those advances clearly have priority over the settlement.

The order will be to the following effect: The judgment of Kekewich, J., should be discharged. There must be a declaration of the priority of the uncles' security in accordance with what I have above stated. Then there must be the usual redemption decree ascertaining what is due to the uncles under and by virtue of their security for their original advance and their subsequent advances down to the 15th of February, 1897, including their costs as mortgagees and their costs of the action and the appeal. If the plaintiff does not redeem he will stand foreclosed, and his action will be dismissed in the usual manner. In the event of the plaintiff redeeming, he will have a foreclosure decree over against the trustees of the settlement, the defendant Temple, and the defendant the nephew for what the plaintiff pays to the uncles, and for what is due to him on his own security. Only one time should be limited for redemption, unless there is special reason. If there is any special reason it should be mentioned now. It does not seem necessary to work out the rights of the parties beyond what I have stated. Liberty to apply must be reserved, under which a further order can be made should it become necessary. There will, I apprehend, be no difficulty in drawing the order substantially in conformity with the above sketch. If any difficulty should arise it may be mentioned to the court before the order is passed.

Proposition in Lewin on Trusts (10*th ed.*), p. 335, controverted.

This was a summons taken out by Mrs. Charlotte Elizabeth Laing, widow, asking that the defendants A. N. Radcliffe and H. F. A. Hood, as trustees of an indenture of settlement dated the 25th of March, 1898, might be at liberty to advance upon loan to the plaintiff, upon her personal credit and without security, the whole or any part or parts from time to time of the funds subject to the trusts of the settlement.

The summons was heard in chambers.

The facts appear in the judgment below.

F. G. Champernowne, for the plaintiff.

W. S. Eastwood, for infant defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

KEKEWICH, J.—For a reason which will presently appear, I have thought it right to give judgment in court in this case which came before me in chambers. It is a summons by the plaintiff Mrs. Laing, and asks for an order that the defendants, the trustees of a settlement of the 25th of March, 1898, may be at liberty to pay her, upon loan and upon her personal credit without security, the whole or any part or parts of the funds subject to the trusts of the settlements, and the question is whether the trusts of the settlement justify such an order. The settlement was made by Mrs. Laing when she was, as she still is, a widow. It was a voluntary settlement, and appears to have been made for the purpose of protecting the settlor against the importunities of her son. The subject-matter of the settlement was £750, which the trustees are directed to invest in their names in one of the modes there mentioned or upon such personal credit without security as the trustees or trustee shall in their or his absolute and uncontrolled discretion think fit. Then follows a power to vary the investments from time to time with the consent of the settlor during her life, and after her death at the discretion of the trustees who are directed to hold the trust fund upon trust for the settlor for life, then upon such trusts as she shall by will appoint, and in default of appointment upon trust for all or any of the children or child of Aaron William Laing, the only son of the settlor, who being sons attain the age of twenty-one years, or being daughters attain that age or marry. There is a power to purchase freehold, copyhold, or leasehold hereditaments, and to manage the same, and also a power to purchase furniture or other household effects for the use of the settlor, or to pay to her for the purposes aforesaid the trust fund or any part thereof, but so that the purchased furniture and effects shall be held upon the trusts declared of the trust fund. These powers are expressed to be exercisable only during the life of the settlor, and upon her request in writing. It is provided that the settlor may revoke the settlement at any time after the death of Aaron William Laing. I understood it to be stated to me in chambers that the £750 had been invested in one of the modes authorized by the settlement, but I cannot find this in the papers before me, and my judgment proceeds on the footing that this is immaterial, which I think it is. Mrs. Laing asks the trustees to advance her the whole £750 without security, and the question is whether such an advance is authorized by the settlement or not. A distinction was endeavoured to be drawn between an original investment and a change of investment, on the ground that the latter required the consent of the settlor, and that she could not properly consent to a change resulting in an advance to herself, and reference was made to Harrison v. Thexton, 4 Jur. N. S. 550, 6 W. R. Ch. Dig. 77. I fail to see what bearing that case has on the present, or to find any reason why the trustees should not realize an existing investment and advance the money to the settlor with her consent, if in truth they could have advanced it before investment. The distinction, as already stated, is to my mind immaterial. The question whether an advance to the lady is within the powers of the settlement or not, is one of a different character. If no authority had been referred to, I should have had no hesitation in saying that it was authorized, but reference was made to a passage in Lewin on Trusts (10th ed.) p. 335, which is adverse to this view, and it was for this reason that I determined to give judgment in open court. The statement in Lewin is this: "And trustees having a power with the consent of the tenant for life to lend on personal security, cannot lend on personal security to the tenant for life himself." In support of this proposition a note refers to Keays v. Lane, 3 Ir. Rep. Eq., 17 W. R. Ch. Dig. 168, p. 1. The note also mentions that a tenant for life whose consent is necessary to the exercise of a power for sale by trustees may purchase from the trustees. This, no doubt, is correct, as will be seen from the case of Dicconson v. Talbot, 19 W. R. 138, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 32, but the suggestion is that the advance on personal security is not governed by the same considerations. My opinion apart from authority being what I have already mentioned, I must examine the authority cited to see whether it supports the proposition in the text. Keays v. Lane was a suit against a trustee charging him with breach of trust by lending part of the trust funds to the tenant for life. The breach of trust and the liability of the trustee for it was admitted, and the question of substance was whether the trustee was entitled to impound for his benefit the interest of the tenant for life at whose instance and for whose benefit the breach of trust had been committed. The Lord Chancellor held that the trustee was so entitled, and in truth for the present purpose there is nothing more in the case. It was argued by the counsel for the petitioners that the trustees committed a breach of trust in lending part of the trust fund to the tenant for life, and that such a loan was not authorized under the power to invest on personal security. The Lord Chancellor does not expressly notice this argument. I do not think he can be taken to be referring to it when he says, on p. 6, that the breach of trust consisted in the calling in of the trust fund of £5,000 in the year 1845, and putting it out not on proper security, but as a loan to Samuel Keays, who had the life interest in it, and on whose insolvency in 1849 it became lost and irrecoverable; nor can I see that the authorities cited by counsel in support of that argument (to which I have referred) do really support it. The truth is that the real breach of trust was, and was admitted to be, the advance to a man—namely, Samuel Keays, the tenant for life, who, if not in embarrassed circumstances at the time of the advance, was at any rate a man of no means, or one to whom such an advance could not prudently be made. The advance on personal security there authorized was, like the advance on personal security here, treated by the settlement as a mode of investment, and it was not intended that the trustees should pay the trust money away to the tenant for life or anyone else without a reasonable expectation of recovering it when wanted, and in that case the trustees took a bond from Samuel Keays with a policy of assurance on his life as collateral security. It would be going too far to say that Samuel Keays' tenancy for life or its determinable character had nothing to do with the decision in that case, for it certainly had; but on the other hand I do not think that it is a sufficient or indeed any authority for the proposition in Lewin on Trusts.

Being uncontrolled by authority, and seeing no objection on principle, I hold that the trustees are at liberty to advance the whole or any part of the trust propetry, whether in their hands invested or with the consent of the settlor obtained by realizing investments, to her on her personal security. This answers the question asked by the summons in one sense; that is, expresses the opinion by the court that the trustees are at liberty to advance the trust fund, realizing investments, if necessary, for that purpose, to the tenant for life on her personal security, that is, a bond or note of hand, if they think fit. This, however, I understand, will not content the trustees, who wish to know not only whether they may, if they think fit, but whether they ought under the circumstances of the case to make the advance. In this case I am not prepared on the present materials to answer the question. There is evidence directed to show that it is to the advantage of the family, including in that term all that can in any event derive benefit from the settlement, that the advance should be made, but I am by no means sure that such evidence can properly be regarded, and, at any rate, I am not disposed to give much weight to it. An advance on personal security differs, of course, materially from an investment in any other of the modes authorized by the settlement and strictly it is not an advance on security at all. Nevertheless, I think that what is contemplated is an advance by way of loan with the prospect of the money being repaid and being hereafter available for the beneficiaries under the settlement. It was neglect in this respect which constituted a breach of trust in Keays v. Lane, and the trustees of this settlement would, I think, be guilty of a breach of trust if they advanced the money to the tenant for life without being satisfied that sooner or later it would be recouped to the settlement, or at least there was a reasonable prospect of this being done. For this purpose it would, of course, be necessary to consider, not merely the present position of the tenant for life, but also whether, by means of the proposed advance, she would probably improve that position and make it more likely that she would be responsible for such a sum. The evidence does not go to this. If the trustees are willing to make the investigations themselves, and forming their own conclusion to act on their own responsibility, there is no occasion for me to do more than say that they are at liberty to make the advance out of the trust fund if they think fit, but if they desire my sanction they must produce further evidence on the lines above indicated, and the summons must be adjourned for further hearing in chambers on that point. The costs of the tenant for life and the trustees, to be taxed between solicitor and client, must in any event come out of the trust fund.

In re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN DAVID AND MATTHEWS. (a.)

Partnership—Sale of business to surviving partner—"Effects and securities"—Goodwill.

Co-partners carried on business under the style of L. & D. until 1876, when L. died. D. then entered into a partnership with M., under articles which, inter alia, provided that the business should be carried on under the old style of L. & D., and that in the event of the decease of either partner the survivor might purchase the whole business, and for such purpose a general account of the firm's property should be made, including all the "effects and securities," and the value thereof should be calculated as at the date of such decease.

Upon the death of D., the parties interested appointed the same person to be arbitrator and appraiser, and this person stated a special case to the court under section 19 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, for a decision as to whether he ought to include the goodwill of the firm in his valuation, and, if so, what was the proper footing on which to value it.

Held, that the goodwill ought to be included in the valuation, and that it ought to be valued on the footing that, if it were sold, the surviving partner would be at liberty to carry on a rival business, but would not have the right to solicit customers of the old firm, or carry on business under the style of the old firm.

The law with regard to the disposal of goodwill on the dissolution of a partnership, and as to surviving or continuing partner's right to set up a rival business, discussed and explained.

Special case under section 19 of the Arbitration Act, 1889.

M. Letricheux and Edmond David carried on business in Swansea as coal merchants and commission agents under the style of Letricheux & David up to the death of Letricheux in December, 1876.

Edmond David then took into partnership R. J. Matthews under articles dated the 23rd of March, 1877. The old style of Letricheux & David was continued. Article 8 provided "that in case of the death of one of the partners a general account of the position shall be made, including all effects and securities of whatsoever nature that they possess, and the value of such effects and securities be estimated as at the date of such decease. Two appraisers shall be appointed to fix the value of the effects and securities, one by the surviving partner the other by the lawful heirs of the deceased, and if these two do not agree they must appoint a third person, whose decision shall be final."

The partnership created by the articles of the 23rd of March, 1877, was continued and renewed as provided for in those articles and expired on the death intestate of Edmond David in March, 1896.

Soon after this it was agreed between his widow and administratrix, Louise David, and Richard John Matthews that one R. G. Cauker should act as sole appraiser under article 8, and subsequently it was also agreed that he should also act as sole arbitrator in accordance with article 10.

Before him, on behalf of the deceased partner's administratrix, it was contended that the business had a goodwill and that it ought to be included in the valuation, and evidence was tendered as to whether or not it was the custom of the trade to value goodwill as between the representatives of a deceased partner and a surviving partner; but this, with certain other evidence, the arbitrator refused to receive.

On behalf of the continuing partner, R. J. Matthews, it was contended that there was no goodwill, and, even if there was, it ought not to be valued.

The questions for the opinion of the court were:

(1) Whether under article 8 the arbitrator ought to consider the question of goodwill, and, if any, value it as attached to the business at the date of the death of David.

(2) Whether or not in considering the question of goodwill he should appraise the value, if any, thereof on the footing that if it were sold, R. J. Matthews would be at liberty to carry on a rival business but without any right to solicit any person who was a customer of the old firm prior to the death of Edmond David to continue to deal with the said R. J. Matthews or not to deal with the purchaser; and whether or not he should appraise such value, if any, on the footing that if it were sold, the said R. J. Matthews would not be entitled to carry on business under the name of Letricheux & David or on what other footing he should appraise such value, if any.

(3) Whether the evidence tendered was rightly refused.

Farwell, Q.C., and Napier, for Madame Louise David.

Christopher James, for R. J. Matthews.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 24.—ROMER, J.—With regard to the first question submitted for my opinion I do not think there is any real difficulty. Article 8 of the partnership agreement constituted in substance a contract for sale of the partnership assets to the surviving partner. This being so, then on principle, and on the authorities cited, I am of opinion that as the goodwill formed part of the effects of the partnership at the death of Edmond David it ought to be valued. The authorities were so fully cited and discussed in the recent case of Jennings v. Jennings, 46 W. R. 344, [1898] 1 Ch. 378, before Stirling, J., that I need not again review them. And, indeed, I do not suppose that the surviving partner in the case before me would admit that the share or interest of the deceased partner in the goodwill had not passed to him, bearing in mind what the effect of such an admission might be. I ought, perhaps, to add, with reference to an argument adduced to me based on the special provisions of article 9 of the partnership agreement, that I cannot gather from that article that the share of profits payable to the representatives of the deceased partner was given in lieu or payment of that partner's share of goodwill. The more natural inference is that the share of profits was given in lieu of interest on the deceased partner's portion allowed to remain in the business.

With regard to the second question I feel more difficulty. I think that the goodwill ought to be valued on the footing of the consideration of what its value would have been to the partnership if there had been no contract between the partners that the surviving partner should purchase the share of the deceased partner in the partnership effects and securities, and, therefore, on the footing that if it were sold the surviving partner would be at liberty to carry on a rival business; but also, I think, on the footing that he could not use the name of the partnership firm of Letricheux & David, and would not have the right to solicit the old customers of the firm. I will take the case of a partnership of the ordinary kind determined by the death of one partner, and will consider what the rights of the deceased partner would be. The goodwill of the business would be an asset, and might well be the most valuable asset of the partnership. The executors, therefore, in the absence of special provisions in the partnership contract, would be entitled to require that the goodwill should be sold together with the other assets for the purposes of division between the executors and the surviving partner; if the surviving partner refused to carry out this implied contract, then the executors could by an action in the Chancery Division obtain an order for the sale of the goodwill under the direction of the court. This is now well settled, though at one time it was considered and had been decided (see Hammond v. Douglas, 5 Ves. 539) that the goodwill survived for the benefit of the living partner. And in the meantime pending the sale I think the surviving partner would not be allowed to appropriate to himself the goodwill which belonged to the partnership (see for example the case of Turner v. Major, 10 W. R. 243, 3 Giff. 442). In that case, which was one of dissolution by agreement between living partners, there was a special agreement that the goodwill should be sold. But I can see no difference in principle, as far as concerns the point I am now dealing with, between a special contract that the goodwill should be sold and the contract implied by the court in ordinary cases of partnership: see also Taylor v. Neate, 37 W. R. 190, 39 Ch. D. 538. In the case of Lewis v. Langdon, 7 Sim. 421, there are some observations by Shadwell, V.C., which would seem to imply that he regarded a surviving partner as being under an obligation to the legal personal representatives of a deceased partner to preserve the goodwill, but those observations must, I think, be regarded as based on the above-mentioned case of Hammond v. Douglas, which at that time was probably regarded as representing the law on the subject of goodwill. If, then, it is not permissible for a surviving partner to appropriate to himself the goodwill of the partnership business, it follows that he ought not to do—and in case of necessity would be restrained by the court, pending a sale of the goodwill for the benefit of the partnership, from doing—any act in excess of his rights which, if not stopped, would enable him to obtain the goodwill or any part of it. For example, though a surviving partner is within his rights in carrying on a similar or rival business, he could, in my opinion, be restrained from carrying on that rival business in the name of the partnership firm so as to lead to the belief that he was carrying on the partnership business, or so as otherwise to appropriate to himself the goodwill of that business. In saying this I am not considering special cases of difficulty which might arise if the name of the surviving partner was exactly the same as that of the partnership firm and he was doing nothing else which might injure the goodwill beyond carrying on a similar business in his own name, but I am dealing only with ordinary cases. With reference to certain cases which at first sight might appear to conflict with the view I have expressed, it will be found on examination that those cases, so far as not overruled, do not really conflict. I need not again refer to the cases of Hammond v. Douglas and Lewis v. Langdon, or refer in detail to cases or observations in cases (as in Robertson v. Quiddington, 28 Beav. 529) based on the erroneous supposition that Hammond v. Douglas was a binding authority. As to the case of Webster v. Webster, 3 Swans. 490 n., that was not one where the executors of the deceased partner were seeking to protect the goodwill, but was an application by them to restrain the surviving partner from using the name of the firm based merely on the ground (obviously untenable) that thereby the estate of the deceased partner might be made liable. With regard to the case of Banks v. Gibson, 13 W. R. 1012, 34

Beav. 566, it was one, according to the view of the judge who decided it, where co-partners had agreed on dissolution to divide the assets, including the goodwill, so as to allow either partner to use the name of the partnership firm. I know of no other case bearing on the point which calls for special comment. It is true that I cannot find any case directly establishing the right of the executors of a deceased partner, in order to protect the goodwill, to an injunction to restrain the surviving partner from carrying on business in the name of the partnership firm. But that is not extraordinary when it is considered that up to comparatively recent times it was considered that the right to the goodwill belonged to the surviving partner, and that it is only recently that the importance of goodwill and the necessity of preventing its improper appropriation has been fully recognized, and I may refer, as illustrating this, to the very recent important decision of the House of Lords in the case of Trego v. Hunt, 44 W. R. 225, [1895] A. C. 7. And bearing in mind that in ordinary cases of dissolution of partnership by death of one partner there is implied a right to have the goodwill sold, which would have to be carried out by an assignment of the goodwill to the purchaser; it is pertinent to refer to what James, L.J., said in Levy v. Walker, 27 W. R. 370, 10 Ch. D. 436, that without any doubt on his part the assignment of the goodwill of a business conveyed the right to use the name of the business sold, and the exclusive right to use that name as between the vendor and purchaser of that business.

It further appears to me to follow, that in considering the value of the goodwill it should be appraised on the footing that the surviving partner would not be at liberty to solicit the customers of the old firm; for if the goodwill had been sold in the ordinary way on the death, and had been assured to the purchaser, it is clear since the case of Trego v. Hunt that the surviving partner, who would have been one of the vendors, could not injure the goodwill sold by soliciting the customers of the old firm. And see the case of Jennings v. Jennings, above referred to, and while referring to that case I desire to add a few observations on the point mentioned by Stirling, J., at pp. 389 and 390 of the report of that case which occasioned him some doubt. In cases of sale of a business by the court for the purpose of winding up a partnership, it has been the practice to provide by the particulars of sale that the sale would not prevent the persons previously interested in the business or their representatives from carrying on a like business. But that provision is inserted whether the dissolution of partnership occurs by the death of a partner or in the lifetime of all the partners. And the reason of its insertion is to prevent a purchaser being misled into supposing that he is buying, or that the vendors are going to sell to him, anything beyond what would be implied by the law by an assignment of the goodwill of the business: see the observations of Turner and Knight-Bruce, L.JJ., in Johnson v. Helleley, 13 W. R. 38, 2 De G. J. & S. 446. The provision is not intended to give any right to the partners or their representatives to appropriate to themselves the benefit of the goodwill which has to be sold. It merely points out, so as to prevent any mistake or misunderstanding, that the sale of the goodwill of a business does not in itself prevent vendors from carrying on a like business; but the provision does not provide, and is not intended to provide, that the like business may be carried on by the vendors in a manner incompatible with their position as vendors. For example, in case of a sale on dissolution between two living partners, whose names differ from the name under which the partnership business had been carried on, the provision in question would not entitle either partner to carry on a like business in the partnership name so as to lead to the belief that the business was the same as or a continuation of the partnership business. And in the same way, in my opinion, the provision would not entitle one of the partner vendors to injure the goodwill sold by soliciting the customers of the partnership firm.

With regard to the case of Pearson v. Pearson, 32 W. R. 1006, 27 Ch. D. 145, also referred to by Stirling, J., in Jennings v. Jennings, if the whole of the agreement in question in that action be looked at, and the circumstances under which it was entered into be considered, I think it is clear that the parties must have intended that the defendant should be authorized to carry on business in the same way as any stranger might do, and certainly that was the view that was taken by the Court of Appeal, and upon which its decision was based.

Before parting with the case which I have now to decide, it appears to me that there is another and a shorter way of dealing with it which leads to the same conclusions as those above pointed out. By the partnership agreement Edmond David and R. J. Matthews contracted that the partnership assets, which would include the goodwill, should on the death of one be sold to the survivor. For the purpose of valuing the goodwill, no difference can properly be drawn between a contract to sell to one of the partners and a contract to sell to a stranger. If the partners had contracted that on the death of one the goodwill should be sold to a stranger, the stranger buying and taking an assignment of the goodwill would have been entitled to prevent the survivor of the partners from carrying on a like business in the name of the firm "Letricheux & David," and from soliciting the customers of the firm.

With regard to the third question submitted for the opinion of the court, it is clear that the arbitrator was right in not receiving the evidence mentioned by him.

REG v. JUSTICES OF BUCKINGHAMSHIRE. (a.)

Vaccination—Justices—Certificate of conscientious objection—Evidence—Certificate of the birth of the child—Vaccination Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 49), s. 2.

Justices have power to make a rule that they will not entertain an application for a certificate of conscientious objection under section 2 of the Vaccination Act, 1898, unless and until, where it is possible, a certificate of the birth of the child in respect of whom the application is made is produced to them.

Rule nisi calling on the justices for the county of Buckingham to show cause why they should not hear and determine an application for a certificate under section 2 of the Vaccination Act, 1898.

On the 16th of November, 1898, Arthur Bedford applied to the justices for a certificate of conscientious objection under section 2 of the Vaccination Act, 1898, in respect of his two children. He was asked if he produced the certificates of the birth of the children. He did not produce such certificates, but tendered himself and his wife to give evidence as to the births of the children. He also produced the children themselves. He was thereupon told that the application would not be granted unless and until the birth certificates were produced.

Two similar applications had been made by the applicant upon two previous occasions in respect of the same children, both of which applications had been refused by the justices, and for the same reason.

Both the children were born before the 12th of August, 1898, the date of the passing of the Vaccination Act, 1898.

The justices in an affidavit filed by them stated that at a meeting of the justices they had made a rule that no application for a certificate under section 2 of the Vaccination Act would be entertained by them unless and until a certificate of the birth of the child in respect of whom the application was made were produced to them.

Section 2 of the Vaccination Act, 1898, provides as follows: "(1) No parent or other person shall be liable to any penalty under section 29 or section 31 of the Vaccination Act, 1867, if within four months from the birth of the child he satisfies two justices, or a stipendiary police magistrate, in petty sessions, that he conscientiously believes that vaccination would be prejudicial to the health of the child, and within seven days thereafter delivers to the vaccination officer for the district a certificate by such justices or magistrates of such conscientious objection. (2) This section shall come into operation on the passing of this Act, but in its application to a child born before the passing of this Act there shall be substituted for the period of four months from the birth of the child the period of four months from the passing of this Act."

Schultess Young, in support of the rule.—The evidence tendered by the applicant was the best evidence of the facts of the births of the children. The justices had no power, under the Act of 1898 or otherwise, to make a rule requiring the production of a birth certificate. The children having been born before the 10th of October, 1898, and the application having been made within four months from that date, it became immaterial to prove the precise date of the birth of the children. The effect of the rule made by the justices is to impose upon all applicants for a certificate the cost of obtaining a birth certificate.

LAWRANCE, J.—This rule must be discharged. The justices have adopted by far the most convenient manner of dealing with these applications in requiring the production of a certificate of the birth of the child. The birth certificate so produced would refer to the birth of the child in respect of whom the application was made, and then there could be no doubt in respect of what child the application was made and the certificate under section 2 of the Act granted. It is of great importance that the child should be identified both for the purpose of preparing the certificate and for the purposes of any future proceedings taken in respect of the child to whom it refers.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. The justices are entitled to require a certificate of the birth of the child, and to make a rule to that effect, unless some reason is shown why such certificate should not or could not be given. They require such certificate for the purpose of drawing up a proper order. If an application were made in respect of a child which was never registered or in respect of a child born out of the country, it is not suggested that the production of a birth certificate would be required.

Rule discharged.

REG. v. JUSTICES OF LONDON. (a.)

Poor rate—Non-payment—Issue of distress warrant—Right of appeal.

No appeal lies from the order of a magistrate directing a distress warrant to issue for non-payment of poor rates.

Rule nisi to the justices of London in quarter sessions to hear an appeal by the Palmerston Publishing Co. (Limited) against an order of the justices of the Strand Division issuing a warrant to levy by distress and sale of the goods of the company for non-payment of certain parochial rates.

The justices had refused to hear the appeal on the ground that there was no right of appeal from an order of justices issuing a distress warrant for non-payment of rates.

43 Eliz. c. 2, s. 6: "Provided always that if any person or persons shall find themselves grieved with any sess or tax, or other act done by the said churchwardens, and other persons, or by the said justices of the peace, that then it shall be lawful for the justices of peace, at their general quarter sessions, or the greater number of them, to make such order therein as to them should be thought convenient; and the same to conclude and bind all parties."

17 Geo. 2, c. 38, s. 4: "In case any person or persons shall find him, her, or themselves aggrieved by any rate or assessment made for the relief of the poor . . . or . . . by any neglect, act, or thing done or omitted by the churchwardens and overseers of the poor, or by any of his Majesty's justices of the peace; it shall and may be lawful for such person or persons . . . to appeal to the next general or quarter sessions of the peace."

Section 7: "And for the more effectual levying money assessed for the relief of the poor, be it enacted by the authority aforesaid, that the goods of any person assessed, and refusing to pay, may be levied by warrant of distress, not only in the place for which such assessment was made, but in any other place within the same county or precinct; and if sufficient distress cannot be found within the said county or precinct . . . such goods may be levied in such other county or precinct by virtue of such warrant and certificate; and if any person shall find him or herself aggrieved by such distress as aforesaid, it shall and may be lawful for such person to appeal to the next general or quarter sessions of the peace for the county or precinct where such assessment was made, and the justices there are hereby required to hear and finally determine the same."

J. P. Grain showed cause against the rule.

J. B. Matthews in support of the rule.

The following cases were referred to in the course of the arguments: Reg. v. Justices of Kent, 16 L. T. Rep. 672, 15 W. R. C. L. Dig. 67; Reg. v. Forrest, 3 T. R. 38; Reg. v. Justices of Yorkshire, 3 T. R. 776; Reg. v. Justices of Devon, 1 M. & S. 411; Ricardo v. Maidenhead Local Board of Health, 5 W. R. 691, 27 L. J. M. C. 73.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 10.—The judgment of the court was read by

CHANNELL, J.—In this case Mr. J. B. Matthews obtained a rule nisi for a mandamus to the justices of the County of London sitting at the North London Quarter Sessions to hear and determine an appeal which they had refused to hear on the ground that in their opinion there was no right of appeal in the case. Cause was shown against the rule being made absolute before us, and we have now to say whether the rule should be discharged or made absolute. The appeal was against an order of justices directing a distress warrant to issue for recovery of poor rates and other rates. The appellants alleged that they had not been rated, and that their name, so far as it appeared on the rate books at all, had been placed there subsequently to the allowance of the rates. No distress had actually been levied, and that being so section 7 of 17 Geo. 2, c. 38, could not be relied on as giving a right to bring the present appeal, as that gave a right of appeal only to persons aggrieved by a distress. Mr. Matthews, in his argument in support of his rule, admitted that he could not rely on that 7th section (which, he contended, only gave a right of appeal where the distress was levied outside the county), and he admitted that the only statute he could rely on was the 43 Eliz. c. 6, s. 6. He further admitted that he was unable to find any reported case in which there had been an appeal, successful or unsuccessful, under 43 Eliz. against the issuing of a distress warrant. In none of the books of practice of quarter sessions (most of which contain lists, purporting to be exhaustive, of all appeals which do lie to quarter sessions) is there any mention of an appeal against a warrant of distress. It seems to us that it would be a very strange thing, if there really is under the statute 43 Eliz. such a right of appeal, that there should be no trace of such a right in the books during the period of nearly 300 years which has elapsed since the statute passed. Mr. Matthews' answer to this was that until the Act of 17 Geo. 2 there was no limit of time for the appeal against a rate, and that in all probability appeals were not presented until an effort was made to levy the money, and then the appeal would be against the warrant, the rule, and all the proceedings together. Further, as to the period since 17 Geo. 2 he pointed out that an action could generally be maintained in the cases in which according to his contention an appeal lay against the warrant, and that most people would prefer an action in which they got damages to a mere appeal. There is a good deal of force in this, but we think it hardly accounts for the complete absence of any trace of such an appeal. We think that the explanation is this. The statute of Elizabeth in general terms gives an appeal against any act done by justices. It does not, however, provide any machinery for the making of a rate, or for the time or manner of any appeal. Many years seem to have elapsed before any definite course of procedure was made obligatory by the Legislature. Ultimately, when no doubt great diversity in practice had arisen, the statutes of 17 Geo. 2, c. 3, and c. 38 were passed, which do provide some machinery both for the making of rates and for the appeals. From that time other Acts of Parliament have from time to time been passed as to the mode of making rates and other similar matters. The result is that, although the statute of Elizabeth remains unrepealed, and is the foundation of the law of rating, its general provisions have been superseded by the particular provisions of subsequent legislation. Just as the manner of making a rate, which was left entirely undefined in the statute of Elizabeth, has been defined by subsequent legislation, so the mode, time, and manner of making the appeals, which in general terms were authorized by the statute of Elizabeth, have been defined, and at the present time the right of appeal given by the statute of Elizabeth exists only in the way defined by subsequent legislation. The mode of appealing against a rate is well defined, and need not now be considered. The mode of appealing against the act of justices in authorizing the money to be levied by distress is by appealing under section 7 of 17 Geo. 2, c. 38, against the distress. It has been suggested that that section does not cover the whole ground, as it only gives a right of appeal where the distress is outside the place of assessment, and that it presupposes the existence of a right of appeal when the distress is within the place of assessment, and that that appeal must be under 43 Eliz. We do not think that is so. Section 7 refers to distress first in the place of assessment; secondly, outside that place but within the same county or precinct; thirdly, outside the county. It goes on to say that any person aggrieved by "such distress as aforesaid" may appeal. We think that means aggrieved "by any such distress as aforesaid," and is not confined to "such distress as last aforesaid." There is, therefore, an appeal under this section whenever a distress is levied, either in the place of assessment or elsewhere, but of course there is no appeal under it against the mere act of issuing the warrant unless it is followed up by distress. This enactment appears to us to define the mode of appealing against the distress warrant and to prevent an appeal unless there had been a distress. We were referred to a case, Reg. v. Justices of Devon, 1 M. & S. 411, as showing that when an appeal was given against the act of justices (as in the Highway Act, 13 Geo. 3, c. 78, which was the matter to be considered in that case) the appeal might lie against the warrant for the distress. The case itself does not even show that. Lord Ellenborough's judgment seems to treat it as possible, but what he held was that there was no real grievance until the distress, consequently that an appeal within four days after the distress though more than four days after the warrant was within four days of the cause of complaint, and Lord Ellenborough pointed out that although a warrant issues there may never be a levy, and therefore no real grievance. That case does not really help the appellant in this case.

The case of Reg. v. Justices of Kent, 16 L. T. Rep. 672, 15 W. R. C. L. Dig. 67, was also quoted. That was an appeal under 17 Geo. 2, c. 38, s. 7, and it only decided that there could be no appeal under that section on grounds applicable to an appeal against the rate. The decision is not that no appeal lay under that section when the distress was in the place of assessment, and it does not seem to us that either judge thought that was so. We think that we cannot hold there is now an appeal under 43 Eliz., from a justice issuing his warrant to levy a rate, except under the conditions and in the manner provided for by subsequent statutes, that is, after his distress has been levied. This seems entirely in accordance with all recorded practice. In the present case the warrant was issued to levy general district rate and sewers rate as well as poor rate, but no argument was addressed to us showing any special right of appeal as to these rates, and it seems that they are rates leviable by statute under one warrant, which if necessary is to be treated as if there were separate warrants, and which also are subject by statutes 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 161, amongst other things, to the same right of appeal as in the case of poor rate. The inclusion of these rates, therefore, does not alter the matter. Mr. Matthews, in arguing in support of the rule, suggested that the facts of the present case showed how desirable it was that there should be an appeal. That may be so, but as an appeal to quarter sessions is entirely statutory, it has little if any bearing on the question we have to decide. What we hold simply is that the appeal is premature before levy, and having regard to the facts stated in the affidavits in this case, it is unlikely that if those facts cannot be altered there ever will be any levy on this warrant. If those facts are true there was no jurisdiction whatever to issue the warrant, and all concerned in the levy (except perhaps the subordinate officers) would be liable to an action if they act on it. In the result we come to the conclusion that the quarter sessions were right in refusing to hear this appeal, and the rule for a mandamus must be discharged.

Q. B. Div.
(Day and Lawrance, JJ.) Jan. 13.

YABBICOM (Appellant) v. KING (Respondent). (a.)

Local government—Bye-laws—No power to set aside—Buildings.

A local authority empowered to make bye-laws is bound by those bye-laws, and has no power to sanction building plans not in accordance with them. They have no dispensing power, and any purported approval of plans contravening such bye-laws is inoperative and invalid. The approval must be a lawful, and not a mere actual, approval.

Case stated.

At a petty sessions at Bristol, an information was preferred on the 30th of March, 1898, by Thomas Henry Yabbicom, the appellant, against Edward King, the respondent, under section 35 of the Bristol Improvement Act, 1847, charging that the respondent unlawfully did erect a certain house contrary to the provisions of the said Act inasmuch as he omitted to build a parapet to the said house.

The facts proved at the hearing were as follows:

The house mentioned in the said information was erected by the respondent at Bell-hill, in the parish of St. George in the city and county of Bristol, at a date subsequent to the 31st of October, 1897, being the date of the commencement of the Bristol Corporation Act, 1897.

Prior to the commencement of the Bristol Corporation Act, 1897, the parish of St. George was situate in the urban district of St. George in the county of Gloucester, but by the provisions of that Act the said parish became part of the city and county of Bristol.

The said house was one of a continuous row of houses, and the walls separating the said houses from the adjoining houses on either side were party walls.

The respondent had not erected parapet walls on the said party walls, and had not carried up the said party walls above the roofs of the said adjoining houses.

The said house was erected in accordance with a plan deposited by the respondent with the Urban District Council of St. George before the 12th of June, 1896. The said plan did not comply with the 26th of the bye-laws made under section 157 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and then in force in the urban district of St. George, in that it showed that the party walls of the said house were not intended to be carried up above the roofs of the said adjoining houses as required by the said bye-law; but notwithstanding such non-compliance the said urban district council purported to approve the said plan on the 12th of June, 1896, which approval was endorsed on the said plan as follows:

"Saint George Urban District Council,
"Plan approved June 12th, 1896.
"(Signed) A. G. VERRIER,
"Presiding Chairman."

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Bristol Improvement Act, 1847, enacts as follows:

Section 35.—And be it enacted that all separate side walls or party walls shall be well and closely lined up to the under side of the slates upon the roof of the building, and the parapets of the height and thickness as specified for party walls shall be built on such side walls or party walls.

Section 37.—And be it enacted that every parapet wall and every party wall hereafter to be erected within the city and county shall be carried up at least two feet above the slates or other covering of the roofs of the premises adjoining.

The aforesaid bye-laws of the urban district of St. George, dated the 4th of November, 1885, which were admitted in evidence, although objected to by the respondent, provide:

Section 26.—Every person who shall erect a new building shall cause every party wall of such building to be carried up nine inches at the least in thickness: (1) Above the roof flat or gutter of the highest building adjoining thereto to such height as will give in the case of a building of the warehouse class or of a public building a distance of at least three feet, and in the case of any other building a distance of at least fifteen inches measured at right angles to the slope of the roof or above the highest part of any flat or gutter, as the case may be.

The Bristol Corporation Act, 1897, enacts as follows:

Section 15.—All bye-laws, rules, and regulations and all orders (other than precepts) made by the urban district councils or the local authorities respectively (so far as they relate to the added area) under any Act of Parliament and in force at the commencement of this Act are hereby annulled, but all penalties incurred thereunder, and all forfeitures which have ensued by reason thereof, may be enforced and recovered by the corporation in like manner and in all respects as the same respectively might have been enforced and recovered by the respective councils and local authorities as the case may be, in case this Act had not been passed, and shall be carried by the corporation to the credit of the district fund. Provided that all plans of new streets and of new buildings within the added area approved by the urban district councils or the local authorities respectively before the commencement of this Act shall be valid for the period of two years after that date, but at the expiration of that period fresh plans of such new streets and new buildings as shall not at that date have been commenced shall be deposited for the approval of the corporation, which plans shall be in conformity with the bye-laws, rules, and regulations in force within the city.

Section 30.—(1) Except as by this Act otherwise expressly provided all the jurisdiction, powers, rights, privileges, authorities, immunities, and duties of the corporation as a municipal body, and of the council of the existing city, and any committee thereof acting in the execution of such enactments as are at the commencement of this Act in force within the existing city, and of the corporation as the urban sanitary authority for the district or any committee thereof, shall extend to and throughout the city, and all charters and enactments and all bye-laws, orders and regulations, lists of tolls, tables of fees and payments, and scales of charges at the commencement of this Act in force within and applicable to the existing city, or to the burgesses or inhabitants thereof, shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, extend and apply to the city and the inhabitants and burgesses thereof, until or except in so far as any of such bye-laws, orders, regulations, tolls, fees, payments, or charges may be repealed or altered.

The appellant contended that on the authority of McIntosh v. The Pontypridd Improvement Committee, 8 Times L. R. 128, 203, 40 W. R. Dig. 128, the approval by the Urban District Council of St. George of a plan contravening the bye-laws of the urban district of St. George was a nullity; that the proviso to section 15 of the Bristol Corporation Act, 1897, applied to cases where the bye-laws of the urban district of St. George differed from the bye-laws, rules, and regulations in force within the city and preserved for two years the right to build in accordance with approved plans complying with the bye-laws of St. George, but that it did not make valid a plan which had been illegally approved; that the case must be regarded as though no plan had been approved by the district council; that the respondent's house must therefore comply with the Bristol Improvement Act, 1847; and that by sections 35 and 37 of that Act the respondent was obliged to erect parapets on the party walls of his house and to carry up the said party walls at least two feet above the slates or other covering of the roofs of the adjoining premises.

The respondent contended that as the district council of St. George had in fact approved of the plan of his house, he was entitled under the proviso to section 15 of the Bristol Corporation Act, 1897, to build the house in accordance with the plan, and that the justices had no authority to inquire whether the plan did or did not comply with the bye-laws of the urban district of St. George, nor whether the approval of the plan was or was not valid.

The justices dismissed the information, as they were of opinion that the respondent's construction of section 15 of the Bristol Corporation Act, 1897, was correct.

They were also of opinion that sections 35 and 37 of the Bristol Improvement Act, 1847, did not make it obligatory to build parapets on party walls of buildings erected in the city, but merely required that, if any parapets were built, they should be of the height and thickness therein specified.

The question of law arising on the above statement of facts was whether the above construction of section 15 of the Bristol Corporation Act, 1897, and sections 35 and 37 of the Bristol Improvement Act, 1847, was correct.

Clavell Salter appeared for the appellant.

Eldon Bankes, for the respondent.

DAY, J.—I am clearly of opinion that the case of McIntosh v. The Pontypridd Improvement Committee, which is referred to in the special case, is not affected and controlled by these Acts. That case is quite rightly decided upon every point, both on principle and upon the authorities which are referred to in the judgment of Wright, J. It is clearly a binding authority upon us, and should have controlled the magistrates. I quite agree with Mr. Bankes that the Bristol Corporation are in no better and no different position from that in which the St. George's people were as to exercising the authority. They are in no better and no different position whatever. I am clearly of opinion that the St. George's Urban District Council would have been entitled at any time to take advantage of the law. As decided in McIntosh's case, the bye-laws have the effect of law, which it is not within the competence of any private body or any body which exercises quasi-public authority for the time being to dispense with. They are no more entitled to dispense with the law of England than private people have power to dispense with it. There is no dispensing power whatever. They are bound by the law like everybody else, and they are bound by their own bye-laws, and they have no power at all to dispense with these bye-laws. The Corporation of Bristol are not seeking to enforce any power other than the St. George's authority had power to enforce. I am clearly of opinion that the dispensation from the bye-laws was not operative, and that the Bristol Corporation were entitled to take up the position they did and to examine the question and say whether the building was in accordance with the bye-laws or not. They have gone into the question, and have come to the conclusion that it is not within the bye-laws, which had in effect been dispensed with by the local authority. The question of their dispensation being brought up for investigation by the court, the court ought to have come to the conclusion that the dispensation was invalid and not operative in any sense at all. It is said that by reason of section 15 of the Bristol Corporation Act, 1897, the plans having been approved they are effective. That is begging the whole question. It says: "Provided that all plans of new streets and of new buildings within the added area approved by the urban district councils or the local authorities respectively before the commencement of this Act shall be valid for the period of two years after that date." That means not actually approved, but legally and lawfully approved. It does not mean to give effect to invalid dispensations, to invalid plans, or to plans which violate the bye-laws. All the acts done under the bye-laws are maintained by that section, but no acts disapproved of by the bye-laws are rendered effective against the bye-laws or against the statute. To my mind the magistrates came to a wrong conclusion in holding that section 15 had any other and different effect. Therefore the question raised in this case for our opinion must be answered in the negative.

LAWRANCE, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I think that the approval mentioned in section 15 of the Bristol Corporation Act means a legal approval by the St. George's Urban District Council. The corporation had a perfect right to see whether the urban district council were acting under the legal powers conferred upon them by their bye-laws when they gave their approval to these plans. I think the case is entirely decided by the authority of McIntosh v. The Pontypridd Improvements Committee. It is absolutely in point, and the judgment of Wright, J., is clear upon the point. He mentions two cases to which I have already called attention, one, Kerr v. Corporation of Preston, 25 W. R. 265, 6 Ch. D. 463, which is strong to show that a public body which had a right to interfere could not acquiesce even if they stood by and knew that what was being done was being done illegally; but it is very much stronger in regard to acquiescence, especially when that acquiescence is sought to be used as an estoppel against them. The other case is the case of Baxter v. The Bedford Corporation, 1 Times L. R. 424, in which the learned judge, Cave, J., several times during the course of the case says in effect "I do not care what the corporation did, I do not care what their officers did, they had no power to do it, therefore if they did waive their powers they had no right to do so." If so, it seems to me the first duty of the Bristol Corporation was to see that the approval by the urban district council was a legal one. There can be no doubt under the circumstances it was illegal, that is to say, it was contrary to their bye-laws, and therefore the Bristol Corporation was right in the view they took, and the appeal will be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

CHESTERFIELD BREWERY CO. (Appellants) v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE (Respondents). (a.)

Inland revenue — Stamp duty—Conveyance on sale—Contract for sale of equitable interest—Reconstruction of company in course of winding up—Agreement for transfer to new company of shares in old company—Declaration of trust of shares in old company—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), ss. 54, 59 (1).

By an agreement under seal, made between all the shareholders in an unlimited company (which was in course of being voluntarily wound up) and a new limited company, it was agreed that the shareholders in the old company should "exchange" their shares in that company for certain numbers and amounts of stock and shares in the new company, and that the new company should also pay certain sums of cash to the shareholders. The agreement also provided that, upon the allotment to the shareholders of the old company of the shares and stock in the new company, the shareholders should "hold their respective shares in the old company in trust for the new company."

Held, that the agreement was a "conveyance on sale" of the shares in the old company within the meaning of section 54 of the Stamp Act, 1891, or a "contract for the sale of an equitable interest" in those shares within section 59 (1) of that Act, and was chargeable with ad valorem duty on the cash paid and the shares and stock allotted.

Case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under section 13 of the Stamp Act, 1891.

An instrument was presented to the commissioners under section 12 of the Stamp Act, 1891, for their opinion as to the stamp duty with which it was chargeable.

The instrument was dated the 4th of December, 1897, and was expressed to be an agreement made between seven persons (of whom two were parties in their individual capacity and also as executors under a will) described as "of the Chesterfield Brewery Co., registered in 1884 as an unlimited company (thereinafter called the 'old company'), of the one or first part," and the appellant company, incorporated in 1897 and thereinafter called the 'new company,' of the other part, and was under the hands of the parties of the first part and under the seal of the appellant company. It proceeded as follows:

"Whereas the old company was constituted by a deed of settlement dated the 25th day of March, 1884, and afterwards in the same year registered as an unlimited company under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1883, with a nominal capital of £100,000 divided into 1,000 shares of £100 each. And, whereas 800 only of the said shares have been issued and the same are all fully-paid up and are held by the parties hereto of the first part. And, whereas the old company is in course of being voluntarily wound up and the said Robert Fenwick Mills" (one of the parties of the first part) "is the liquidator for such purpose. And, whereas the new company has been incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1893, with a nominal capital of £200,000 divided into 1,000 preference shares of £100 each and 1,000 ordinary shares of £100 each. And, whereas, it is desirable that the shareholders in the old company shall acquire shares in the new company in manner hereinafter provided. Now it is hereby agreed as follows:

"1. The parties hereto of the first part shall respectively exchange their shares in the old company for such number or amount of fully-paid up ordinary shares and fully-paid up preference shares in and debenture stock of the new company as are respectively set opposite their respective names in the schedule hereto. The new company shall also pay to each of the seven persons parties hereto (but as to the said Richard Fenwick Mills and William Forster Mills in their own right only and not in the capacity of executors under the before-mentioned will) the sum of £100 each in cash.

"2. The said debenture stock shall be part of a total issue of £100,000 debenture stock carrying interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum and be constituted and secured in accordance with the draft of a trust deed already prepared and approved of by the parties hereto.

"3. When this agreement has been filed, as below mentioned, the new company shall allot to each of the parties hereto of the first part the shares and debenture stock to which they respectively are to be entitled as aforesaid and thenceforth such respective holders shall hold their respective shares in the old company in trust for the new company.

"4. Before issuing any of the paid-up shares aforesaid the new company shall cause this agreement to be duly filed pursuant to section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867."

The instrument had been filed with the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies as therein provided and the shares in the appellant company had been allotted as fully paid to the members of the old company. There had not been any transfer of the shares in the old company by the members of that company to the appellant company. The commissioners were of opinion that the transaction effected by the instrument was a sale of the equitable interest in the shares of the old company, the consideration being a sum of £700 in cash and the shares and stock of the appellant company to be allotted as fully paid to the members of the old company, and that it was accordingly chargeable with ad valorem conveyance duty by reference to section 59 of the Stamp Act, 1891, upon the cash paid and the shares and stock allotted. They accordingly assessed the stamp duty at £1,200 on the instrument, being the ad valorem duty payable under the head "Conveyance or transfer on sale" in the First Schedule to the said Act at the rate of 5s. for every £50 of the sum of £240,000, being the aggregate of the sum of £700 paid in cash and of the value of the shares and stock to be allotted as fully paid.

The question for the court was whether the instrument was chargeable with the duty of £1,200, in accordance with the assessment.

The following sections of the Stamp Act, 1891, were referred to during the argument:

Section 54. "For the purposes of this Act the expression 'conveyance on sale' includes every instrument and every decree or order of any court or of any commissioners whereby any property or any estate or interest in any property upon the sale thereof is transferred to or vested in a purchaser or any other person on his behalf or by his direction."

Section 59 (1). "Any contract or agreement made in England or Ireland under seal, or under hand only . . . for the sale of any equitable estate or interest in any property whatsoever . . . shall be charged with the same ad valorem duty, to be paid by the purchaser as if it were an actual conveyance on sale of the estate, interest, or property contracted or agreed to be sold."

Theobald (Upjohn, Q.C., with him), for the appellants.—The instrument is not chargeable with ad valorem duty. It is an agreement for the sale or exchange of the shares in the old company for shares and stock in the new company; it is not an agreement for the sale of an equitable estate in the shares, and therefore does not fall within section 59 of the Act. The new company as purchasers, on payment of the cash and allotment of the shares and stock according to the terms of the agreement, would be entitled to have a legal transfer to them of the shares of the old company. The provision in clause 3 that after such allotment the parties of the first part will hold their shares in the old company in trust for the new company does not affect the right of the new company to have a transfer; it is a superfluous provision, and merely expresses the legal position—viz., that on payment of the purchase-money the vendor becomes a trustee of the property sold for the purchaser. In West London Syndicate v. The Commissioners, [1898] 1 Q. B. 226, 46 W. R. Dig. 74; the instrument bound the vendors in a certain event to execute a declaration of trust of leasehold property, but the Divisional Court held that this did not constitute an agreement for the sale of an equitable interest, and on this point their judgment was upheld by the Court of Appeal, ante, p. 125, [1898], 2 Q. B. 507. Nor is the instrument a conveyance on sale within the meaning of section 54. It does not itself transfer the shares in the old company to or vest them in the new company; this is left to be done subsequently by a legal transfer: The Commissioners v. Angus & Co., 38 W. R. 3, 23 Q. B. D. 579. Every agreement for sale gives to the purchaser an equitable interest in the property, but it is not on that account a conveyance on sale.

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G. (Danckwerts with him), for the respondents.—The instrument falls within either section 54 or section 59. The old company was in voluntary liquidation and therefore (by section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862) the shares could not be transferred without the consent of the liquidator, which was not given; R. F. Mills, the liquidator, was a party to the instrument not as liquidator but in his capacity of shareholder. By clause 3 the shareholders make themselves trustees of their shares for the new company; this dispenses with any necessity for a subsequent transfer, and from the circumstances disclosed by the instrument it is obvious that no such transfer could have been intended; and the case states that no such transfer has in fact been executed. The instrument operates as a declaration of trust which took effect upon the allotment of the shares in the new company, and it ought therefore to be stamped as a conveyance on sale: West London Syndicate v. The Commissioners, [1898] 1 Q. B. 226, per Channell, J., at p. 240. The decision of the Court of Appeal in that case also supports the view that this either effected a sale and transfer of the legal interest in the shares or was an agreement for the sale of an equitable interest in them.

Theobald, in reply.—The statement in the case that there has been no transfer in fact is irrelevant and unjustifiable. [WILLS, J.—No doubt what has happened afterwards is immaterial: the instrument was chargeable or not upon its execution. But how could it have been intended to transfer shares in a company which was being extinguished?] The instrument must be interpreted according to its terms; the fact (if it was so) that the consent of the liquidator was necessary and was not given does not alter the legal position; it cannot be assumed that his consent would not be given.

WILLS, J.—I am of opinion that the contention of the Crown in this case is right. I think that clause 3 of the instrument in question undoubtedly contains a declaration of trust creating an equitable interest in the shares in the old company. I entirely agree with the view expressed by my brother Channell in West London Syndicate v. The Commissioners (although his remarks on this point were not necessary for the decision of that case), that where an instrument contains a declaration of trust which effects a transfer of property to the person in whose favour it is made the instrument must be treated as a conveyance on sale within section 54 of the Stamp Act, 1891. It was argued that that view of the effect of the third clause conflicts with the proper construction of the rest of the instrument; but even if that were so I cannot agree that clause 3 is any the less a declaration of trust. But I go a great deal further and base my judgment on a broader ground: the whole instrument—nothing outside it—must be considered to see what the intention really is. Now, it appears from the instrument that the old company was in voluntary liquidation, and the clear intention seems to me to have been that this should be the one instrument by which the shares in the old company should become vested in the new company; the declaration of trust in the third clause is in favour of the new company, not in favour of the shareholders of the new company; it vests in the new company an equitable interest which apart from that clause they would not, qua company, have had, for the agreement in clause 1 is that the shareholders in the old company should exchange their shares for shares and stock of the new company. If that exchange were carried out the whole body of shareholders in the new company would become the owners of the shares in the old company; that, of course, could not have been intended, because the shareholders in the two companies were the same persons. It is clear, therefore, that the agreement for an exchange contained in clause 1 was never intended to be acted upon; it is there merely to give an appearance of an exchange to a totally different transaction. The court cannot be tied down by the mere words and refuse to draw the obvious inferences from the facts disclosed by the instrument. The old company was being wound up, and as soon as the winding up was complete it and all its shares would be extinguished. It is impossible to think that it could have been intended to effect a transfer to the new company—that is, to the same persons as those who held the shares in the old company—of the shares in the old company which existed merely for the purpose of being extinguished. By the transaction effected by this instrument the new company acquired the equitable interest in all the shares held by the members of the old company in consideration of certain cash payments and the allotment of certain shares and stock of the new company; if that is not a transfer upon a sale of an equitable interest I do not know what such a transfer is. I entertain no doubt that this instrument is not only a "conveyance on sale" within the meaning of section 54, but is also a contract for the sale of an equitable interest within section 59.

BRUCE, J.—I agree. I entertain no doubt that clause 3 of this instrument operated as a declaration of trust by the shareholders in the old company in favour of the new company of all the shares in the old company, and that it was, therefore, a conveyance on sale within the meaning of section 54.

HALL v. SNOWDON, HUBBARD, & CO. (a.)

Practice—Appeal—Security for costs—Appeal under Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37)—Ord. 58, r. 15.

The ordinary rule of the court that the poverty of the appellant is a reason for ordering security to be given for the costs of the appeal, extends to appeals under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

Original motion.

Application by the respondents that the appellant should be ordered to give security for the costs of an appeal from the decision of the judge of the Bloomsbury County Court under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The appellant was the infant son of a workman who was killed by an accident while in the employment of the respondents, and took proceedings by his next friend to recover compensation under the Act of 1897. The county court judge gave judgment for the respondents. The application for security for costs was founded upon poverty.

C. Herbert Smith, for the respondents.—Poverty being admitted, the court will order the appellant to give security for the costs of the appeal. The ordinary rule of the court applies to cases under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

Bailhache, for the appellants.—If poverty is a ground for ordering security for the costs of an appeal in cases under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, then nearly every appeal by a claimant under the Act will be stopped, except where the claimant is backed by a trade union. If these appeals went to the Divisional Court, like appeals under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, security for the costs of the appeal would not be ordered. The fact that these appeals come to the Court of Appeal ought to make no difference, and if the rule as to security for costs applies, a claimant will be deprived of the benefit of having the decision of the court upon what may be a very important point of law. The court in its discretion will not hold that mere poverty is a "special circumstance" within ord. 58, r. 15, in appeals under the Act of 1897. [A. L. SMITH, L.J.—Why cannot the appellant proceed in formâ pauperis?] That would not be any protection to the respondents, and an appellant may be disinclined to proceed in formâ pauperis.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—In my opinion security for the costs of the appeal must be given. The reasons for that conclusion are these: The Legislature has specified the county court judge, failing the appointment of an arbitrator, as the person to decide questions of compensation under the Act of 1897, and has given an appeal from the county court judge direct to this court. While doing that the Legislature has not enacted that the ordinary rule of practice by this court as to ordering security for the costs of an appeal is to be abrogated. The ordinary rule is that, except in applications for the new trial of an action, when the respondent shows that the appellant will be unable through poverty to pay the costs of the appeal, if unsuccessful, the court will order the appellant to give security for the costs of the appeal. I am therefore of opinion that security for costs should be ordered. If the appellant is in a position to get leave to proceed in formâ pauperis, he need not give security for costs; but before he can get such leave he must submit a case to counsel and obtain his opinion that there are reasonable grounds for an appeal, and this is some protection to the respondents. The appellant must give security for costs to the amount of £15.

In re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN THE GUARDIANS OF THE ROCHDALE UNION AND THE GUARDIANS OF THE HASLINGDEN UNION. (a).

Local government—Boundaries—Alteration of union boundaries—Transfer of part of a parish—Adjustment of property, debts, and liabilities—Local Government Act, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73), ss. 36, 68.

Where an alteration is made in the boundaries of two poor law unions by the transfer, by an order of the county council, under section 36, sub-section 6, of the Local Government Act, 1894, of part of a parish from one union to another, an adjustment of the property, debts, and liabilities can be claimed under section 68, as between the two unions, and not as between the union from which the transfer is made and the part of the parish so transferred.

Appeal from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Ridley and Channell, JJ.), on a case stated by an arbitrator, reported [1898] 2 Q. B. 206, 46 W. R. Dig. 108.

Prior to 1894 the township of Spotland was one of the townships comprised in the Rochdale Union, and the township of Newchurch was one of the townships comprised in the Haslingden Union. By an order of the county council of the county of Lancaster, dated the 28th of June, 1894, a certain portion of the township of Spotland, being the portion included in the borough of Bacup, was, in pursuance of the Local Government Acts, 1888 and 1894, as from the 28th of December, 1894, amalgamated with a certain portion of the township of Newchurch, which formed the remainder of the borough of Bacup, so as to form one township or parish for Poor Law purposes coincident in area with such borough by the name of the township of Bacup. By an order of the same date made by the joint committee duly appointed by the said county council and the councils of the county boroughs of Bury, Manchester, Oldham, and Rochdale, the portion of the new township of Bacup which formerly formed part of the township of Spotland, was in pursuance of the said Acts, as from the 28th of December, 1894, detached from the Rochdale Union, and the whole of the township of Bacup was included in and became part of the Haslingden Union, and it was provided that section 68 of the Local Government Act, 1894, should apply for the purposes of any adjustment which might be required in consequence of the provisions of such order, subject to the proviso that the arbitrator is any adjustment between the Haslingden and Rochdale Unions should have regard to the large amount of workhouse accommodation then provided by the Rochdale Union and to all other special circumstances of such last-mentioned union. These two orders were duly confirmed by the Local Government Board and came into operation on the 28th of December, 1894. The guardians of the Rochdale Union gave notice to the guardians of the Haslingden Union that, by reason of the detachment of the above-mentioned part of the township of Spotland from the Rochdale Union, the property, debts, and liabilities of their union had been affected, and a serious loss had been occasioned to the union, and that they were prepared to treat with the guardians of the Haslingden Union for the adjustment of the said property, debts, and liabilities, and as to the payment to be made by the last-mentioned guardians in respect thereof, and that, unless the last-mentioned guardians were prepared to treat in respect of the said adjustment, the guardians of the Rochdale Union desired that the adjustment should be referred to arbitration. The question of adjustment was accordingly referred to arbitration.

At the hearing before the arbitrator the Rochdale guardians contended that the following matters ought to be taken into consideration in making the adjustment: (a) The amount of the outstanding loans charged upon the common fund of the Rochdale Union; (b) the exceptional number of paupers requiring relief in the Rochdale Union by reason of the density of population and the situation of the town of Rochdale; (c) the comparative absence of pauperism from the transferred portion of the township of Spotland; (d) the large amount of workhouse accommodation provided by the Rochdale Union; (e) the unsuitability and unfitness of a great part of the Rochdale workhouse for the purposes for which it was provided; (f) the loss of all contribution from the transferred portion of the township of Spotland towards the expenses of the guardians of the Rochdale Union; (g) the increase in the rates leviable in the remainder of the Rochdale Union by reason of such transfer.

On behalf of the Rochdale Union evidence was tendered that the guardians had raised loans for erecting and furnishing the workhouse in their union, and that large sums were, on the 28th of December, 1894, outstanding in respect of these loans, and were charged upon the common fund of the whole union; that the town of Rochdale was comprised in the Rochdale Union, and had a dense population; and that the rateable value of the Rochdale Union was, on the 28th of December, 1894, £512,399, and of the portion of the township of Spotland transferred to the Haslingden Union £33,040. On behalf of the guardians of the Haslingden Union it was contended that none of the said matters were matters in respect of which the arbitrator had power to award an adjustment as between the Haslingden Union and the Rochdale Union.

The arbitrator was of opinion that none of the said matters relied upon on behalf of the Rochdale guardians were matters for adjustment between the said parties under the said Acts and orders, and he accordingly declined to receive the evidence tendered, and awarded that no adjustment was required, subject to this case for the opinion of the court.

The Divisional Court held that an adjustment was required under section 68 of the Local Government Act, 1894, and referred the matter back to the arbitrator.

The Haslingden Union appealed.

Macmorran, Q.C., and C. A. Russell, Q.C., for the Haslingden Union.

Brynmor Jones, Q.C., and A. Glen, for the Rochdale Union, were not called upon.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—In my opinion the judgment of the Divisional Court is right and must be affirmed. I agree substantially with the judgment of Channell, J., and entirely with the principle involved in his judgment. The effect of the orders made in this case is that the respective boundaries of the Rochdale and Haslingden Unions have been altered in such a way that a part of the township of Spotland, which was formerly comprised in the Rochdale Union, has been detached from the Rochdale Union, and has been included in the Haslingden Union. The guardians of the Rochdale Union thereupon alleged that the change had worked to their pecuniary disadvantage, and they claimed to have an adjustment made between their union and the Haslingden Union. Two objections are taken to this claim. First, it is said that if any ground for adjustment exists at all, the adjustment cannot be between the two unions, but between the Rochdale Union on the one hand and the separated portion of the township of Spotland on the other. Secondly, that this is not a case for adjustment at all within the Act. As regards the first objection, it seems to me to be impossible to give effect to it, because there has been no addition to the Haslingden Union or separation from the Rochdale Union of any unit of government, or any body of persons representing any sort of legal entity—even if that would have made any difference, as to which I express no opinion—but there has been merely a portion of a township cut off from the Rochdale Union and added to the Haslingden Union. It seems to me that section 68 of the Local Government Act, 1894, contemplates that there may be an agreement for an adjustment between the parties—that is, an agreement between two parties capable of entering into an agreement, between two legal entities—and it seems to me impossible to suppose that in such a case as this it was intended that the adjustment should be made between a separated portion of a township on the one hand, and the union from which it was detached on the other hand. It seems to me, therefore, that if there is to be an adjustment at all, it must be between the two unions.

Coming now to the second objection, this depends upon the proper construction of sections 36 and 68 of the Act of 1894. It is important to see what is the scope of section 36. That section deals with areas and boundaries, and by sub-section 6, "where the alteration of a poor law union seems expedient by reason of any of the provisions of this Act, the county council may, by their order, provide for such alteration in accordance with section 58 of the Local Government Act, 1888, or otherwise, but this provision shall not affect the powers of the Local Government Board with respect to the alteration of unions." It was under that provision that the order in the present case was made, the effect of which is to transfer part of the township of Spotland from the Rochdale Union to the Haslingden Union. I must next consider what provision the Legislature has made for the consequences ensuing from the carrying out of the orders contemplated by section 36. It is conceded that there are in section 36 a number of cases which require an adjustment, and that section 68 is intended to apply to such cases. In section 36, however, there is a provision for the delimitation of union boundaries, and section 68, which is a general section applicable to all cases in which an adjustment is required, applies just as strongly to the delimitation of union boundaries, where an adjustment may be in equity required, as to the other cases in section 36 to which it admittedly applies. In other words section 68 may apply to all the cases which come within section 36. It is not necessary to say whether the whole of the language of section 68 applies in its entirety to each of the cases contemplated by section 36. Probably the whole of that language may not fit in with each of the cases contemplated by section 36. But the question we have to determine is whether it does not apply to the present case. The complaint of the guardians of the Rochdale Union is that a portion of a rateable area has been taken from their union and transferred to the Haslingden Union, the rateable value of the portion so transferred being £33,040, and that the inclusion of that area in their union was a distinct advantage to them because the area was of such a kind that, though the rates were considerable, the maintenance of the paupers coming therefrom entailed a very slight burden upon the rates. They said that their position would be pecuniarily prejudiced by the transfer, and that the Haslingden Union would be the gainers thereby, and that therefore there ought to be an adjustment. I think that view is right. I do not go in detail into the particular heads of adjustment claimed. I may say generally that the arbitrator will be entitled to take into consideration on the one hand the loss sustained by the Rochdale Union in consequence of a valuable rateable area being taken from them, and the relief caused to that union by their being freed from the obligation to maintain the paupers coming from the transferred area, and on the other hand the benefit to the Haslingden Union arising from the transfer. The arbitrator will then say how far the Rochdale Union has been pecuniarly damnified by the transfer. For these reasons, I think that the appeal should be dismissed.

JAMES v. LONDON AND COUNTY BANKING CO. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Proof—Bill of exchange—Secured creditor—Consolidation of debts and securities.

The holder of four dishonoured bills of exchange sent in a proof, in the liquidation of the estate of a firm which had endorsed each bill, for the aggregate amount of the four bills with noting expenses. The trustee in the liquidation had different rights of indemnity in respect of the four bills. In respect of two of the bills the holder had received more than 20s. in the £ upon his proofs against the various parties to the said bills, but the total amount received by him was considerably less than the aggregate amount claimed in respect of the four bills.

Held (affirming Romer, J., 46 W. R. 627, [1898] 2 Ch. 413), that the holder could not be allowed to retain the surplus beyond the amount due on either of the two overpaid bills, and attribute it to payment of the amounts due on the other bills.

(a.) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Defendants' appeal from Romer, J. (reported 46 W. R. 627, [1898] 2 Ch. 413).

The question raised by summons was whether a creditor holding four separate bills of exchange could lump them together and put in one proof for the whole debt, or whether the bills must be considered as four distinct debts, dividends (after proof) being receivable only for the amounts secured by each bill respectively. The facts were as follows:

The defendants were at the date of the creditor's deed hereinafter mentioned, holders of four bills of exchange hereinafter referred to as A, B, C, and D. A, B, and C were for £2,000 each, and D for £1,000. A and C were drawn by Job & Co., in Newfoundland, upon Job Bros., in England, payable to order of the Commercial Bank of Newfoundland, and were accepted by Job Bros. B and D were drawn by Goodridge in Newfoundland upon Bennett in England, payable in like manner as A and C, and were accepted by Bennett. A, B, C, and D were severally endorsed by the bank to Prowse, Hall, & Morris, and by them to Ridley, and by Ridley to the defendants, all in the ordinary course and for value.

The bank, Job Bros., Bennett, and Goodridge became bankrupt or entered into liquidation, and the defendants proved against their respective estates for the amounts due upon the bills to which they were respectively parties. In September, 1896, Ridley paid the defendants in respect of the four bills £615 odd, forming part of the estate of Prowse, Hall, & Morris, which came into the hands of Ridley, and the propriety of such payment was not disputed.

The plaintiff was the trustee of a creditors' deed entered into in April, 1895, by Morris, the debtor, who was the surviving partner of the firm of Prowse, Hall, & Morris. The deed in effect provided for the distribution of that firm's assets as in bankruptcy among the assenting creditors who would have been entitled to prove if the debtor had been adjudicated bankrupt as therein mentioned. The defendants claimed under the deed against the estate of the firm for the amount of the four bills of exchange with noting expenses, making, after deducting the sum of £615 odd, a total of about £6,430.

Upon their proofs against the various parties to the bills, the defendants received amounts in respect of the bills B and D exceeding the amounts due on such bills, with noting expenses and interest, by £373 odd and £192 odd respectively. The defendants had not received payment in full of either of the bills A and C, and the whole amount received by them was less than the whole amount due in respect of the four bills.

In these circumstances the plaintiff claimed that the defendants were not entitled to any further dividends from the estate of Prowse, Hall, & Morris in respect of bills B and D, and that the sums of £373 and £192 should be repaid by the defendants to the plaintiff, and that the defendants should be ordered to deliver up the bills to the plaintiff. The plaintiff had paid the defendants by way of dividend from the estate of Prowse, Hall, & Morris the sums of £365 and £182 10s., in respect of the bills B and D, but did not know at the time of such payment how much had been received by them in respect of the bills.

Romer, J., held that the defendants were not entitled to retain the surplus beyond the amount due on either of the two overpaid bills and attribute it to payment of the amounts due on the other bills.

The defendants appealed.

Neville, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie, for the appellants, used the same arguments as in the court below, and in addition cited the following cases: Ex parte

[VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., referred to Robson's Law of Bankruptcy (7th ed.), p. 159, and Ex parte Reed and Bowen, 34 W. R. 493, 17 Q. B. D. 244.]

Levett, Q.C., and F. Thompson, for the respondent, referred to Ex parte Barratt, 1 Gl. & J. 327, and Paley v. Field, 12 Ves. 435.

Mackenzie, in reply, distinguished Ex parte Barratt on the facts, as being a bill paid in full by one of the prior parties who was entitled to the bill.

LINDLEY, M.R.—In this case I think the view taken by Romer, J., is right. One cannot doubt that although this is one proof for £6,000 it is substantially a proof on four bills. It is a mere matter of convenience that they are lumped together. Under ordinary circumstances, of course, it does not matter and simplifies accounts, but it cannot alter the rights of the parties.

Now, when we look at these four bills it appears to me that it becomes of some importance to trace out the persons from whom dividends have been obtained in respect of them. There are two sets of bills, two accepted by Job Bros., of Liverpool, and two accepted by Bennett. The drawers of Job's bills were Job Bros., of Newfoundland, the drawers of Bennett's were Alan Goodridge & Co. All four bills were drawn in favour of the Commercial Bank of Newfoundland, and were endorsed by that bank; all four were endorsed by Prowse, Hall, & Morris, who are the persons claiming them now under the creditors' deed, to Ridley and by Ridley to the London and County Bank. The London and County Bank had no claim at all against the estate of Prowse, Hall, & Morris except as the holders of these bills. The bank were not creditors on any separate account, holding these bills as collateral security. Now, what was their right of proof as against Prowse, Hall, & Morris? Their right was to prove on the four bills, and they had no other right. Of course it might have happened that there was no necessity for keeping them separate, but when you consider that the moneys have been paid in respect of those bills by different people it becomes necessary to consider who they are; and on looking at the details you do not find a single payment there by anybody except by persons who were under liability to Prowse, Hall, & Morris to pay. Take the first, Job Bros.; they were either acceptors or drawers, I do not know which, and I do not know whether they were two firms or one, but they were liable either as acceptors or drawers. As to Bennett's dividends they were acceptors. Goodridges were drawers for Bennetts. Then Ridleys—they paid out of Prowse, Hall, & Morris's funds; that counts for nothing, and so you go on. There is not a single payment made by anybody except in discharge of his own obligation to the bankrupt. Now, that being the case, it does appear to me to be very extraordinary that, because the proof was admitted for one sum of £6,000 odd instead of four sums aggregating that amount, the rights of the parties should be in any way altered.

I think Romer, J., was right. We must not be mislead or misguided by the mere fact that one proof has been admitted and acted upon before anything turned upon it; but when we find that the bank have received more than 20s. in the £ on the bills under a mistake, they must account for the excess.

So far as the authorities go I think Ex parte Barratt is much nearer and more in point than any of the other authorities. The appeal will be dismissed with costs.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think it is plain that the proofs were four separate proofs on four separate bills. We know that the only right of proof they had was on these bills. They had no choice. They could not alter that right by merely adding up the figures and lumping them together. Then, following Mr. Muir Mackenzie's argument, with which I was much struck, I do not think they got one right of property in place of one claim. But, of course, if that be a sound analogy they get four rights of property in respect of four bills.

Then as regards the equity of the matter, I do not think it can be doubted that it was only because they added them up and lumped them together that they made one proof; and finally the moneys paid were, as to all but those paid by Messrs. Ridley, in respect of claims which the bankers would have on the acceptors, drawers, and the prior indorsees, all liable in priority to the bankrupt's estate. Messrs. Ridley & Co.'s payments were paid out of the bankrupt's money, and so with regard to all the payments. It appears to me all the payments have been paid in respect of obligations existing towards the bankrupt's estate, and as if paid out of that estate; and I cannot think any rule of practice compels us to disregard the true facts. I agree that the case of Ex parte Barratt when thoroughly worked out is an authority which appears to me to be consistent with the other authorities and to be one that we ought to follow.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I entirely agree. I want to say, however, with regard to proof on the bankrupt's estate that according to bankruptcy practice no one is entitled or allowed to take advantage of the form of the proofs. Here, supposing persons outside the estate altogether had paid the amount of these bills, the trustee in bankruptcy would not have been entitled to make a profit for the estate out of that fact and say to his creditors, "You have been fully paid and therefore nothing more can be paid in respect of this debt"; because the answer to that would be "Yes, but I have been fully paid by a person who has a right to stand in my shoes"; and in those circumstances although the practice in bankruptcy may not allow the person with a legal proof to receive more than 20s. in the £, and put an obligation thereupon on the outsider, the person who has not proved, to come in and prove in his own right and make the claim in his own right, yet, if the dividends had actually been paid over (as is the case here), you never make the creditor repay to the trustee dividends which ultimately would have to go into the pocket of somebody else. But in this case the persons who have paid what has been paid in respect of these bills were persons who were under an obligation towards the bankrupt and the bankrupt's estate to pay those amounts; and in those circumstances the moment the creditor has got 20s. in the £ and interest—it does not much matter from what source—any surplus that there is is a surplus which will not go to any persons other than the trustee of the estate of the bankrupt, but ought to go beneficially into the bankrupt's estate. In those circumstances it seems to me clear that this order is perfectly right, and that the creditor, who cannot be entitled to hold the dividends, and who is not accountable for them to anybody else, should hand back these dividends to the estate which is beneficially entitled to them.

ASTLEY v. NEW TIVOLI (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Director—Place of profit.

Articles of association provided that the office of director should be vacated by a director "if he accepts or holds any other office or place of profit under the company except that of managing director."

Held, that a director who accepted the trusteeship of a debenture deed given by the company at a salary ceased to be a director.

Motion.

This was an action against the New Tivoli and three directors to restrain the defendants from preventing the plaintiff from acting as director.

By article 104 it was provided "The office of a director shall be vacated (a) if he accepts or holds any other office or place of profit under the company except that of managing director."

The company was registered in 1891, and the first directors were the plaintiff and two other persons. In 1895 the existing debentures were paid off, and the plaintiff and H. S. Smith were appointed trustees of the deed to secure new debentures. The deed provided for the payment of £105 to each of the trustees.

In 1896 the plaintiff retired by rotation and was re-elected. In November, 1898, the question of his disqualification arose, and being excluded, he commenced this action. The motion was treated as the trial of the action.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Rowden.—A trustee of a debenture deed is not an officer of the company. And even if he was disqualified, his subsequent re-election while still a trustee was good: Dawson v. African Consolidated Land and Trading Co., 46 W. R. 132, [1898] 1 Ch. 6.

Buckley, Q.C., and M. Romer.—The company fixed the remuneration, and the object of the clause is to prevent directors from creating places for themselves. It is not shown that the disqualification was known when the plaintiff was re-elected.

Swinfen Eady replied.

NORTH, J.—I think it is reasonably clear that the trusteeship is a place of profit under the company. There is more difficulty in saying that the trustees are officers of the company, and I do not think they could be held responsible for misfeasance under section 165 of the Companies Act, 1862, or section 10 of the Act of 1890. The company is represented by its directors, who fix the character and form of the covering deed, and decide, if there are trustees, what is to be their remuneration. Then article 104 provides that the office of director shall be vacated if a director holds any other office or place of profit under the company. The meaning of that is to prevent the directors from doing anything by which they can accumulate in themselves offices of profit. It is not desirable that a director should be master and servant at the same time. In my opinion a trustee of a covering deed on the terms contained in this document is occupying a place of profit. If he was already a director his acceptance of the trusteeship vacated the office; but if he was a trustee when elected the article applies which vacates the office if he holds any place of profit under the company. The action fails, and must be dismissed with costs.

In re ADAMS & PERRY'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Will—Real estate—Charge of debts—Trustees—Devise of all testator's interest—Power to sell—Lord St. Leonards' Act (22 & 23 Vict. c. 35) s. 14.

Testator appointed his wife sole executrix, and after a direction to pay debts and legacies, devised and bequeathed the residue of his real and personal estate to trustees upon trust to permit his wife to receive the rents and profits during her life; then for his niece for life for her separate use; then upon trust to pay two legacies, and subject thereto for the children of the niece.

Held, that the real estate was charged with payment of debts and legacies, but that as the trustees took no legal estate therein during the life of the wife, there was a devise of all the testator's interest in the realty, and consequently the trustees could not sell the real estate by virtue of section 14 of Lord St. Leonards' Act.

This was a summons taken out under the Vendor and Purchaser Act by the vendors, asking for a declaration that they, as trustees of the will of Alexander Penprase, had power to sell, and could make a good title to the real estate devised by the said will, and could give good receipts for the purchase-money thereof to the purchaser. The testator by his will, dated the 21st of March, 1868, appointed his wife Teresa Penprase sole executrix, and directed his just debts, funeral and testamentary expenses to be paid as soon as conveniently might be after his death, and after certain specific and pecuniary bequests, gave, devised, and bequeathed all the residue of his real and personal estate to trustees upon trust, as to his freehold estate, to pay to or permit his said wife to receive the rents and profits thereof during her life, and after her decease upon trust to pay or permit his niece Eliza Adams to receive the same for her separate use during her life. And after the death of the survivor of his said wife and niece he directed his trustees to pay to William Adams and Ellen Clara Kingcome, and each or such one of them as should be then living, the legacy of £150, and the testator declared that his trustees should, after payment of the said sums of £150 and £150, stand possessed of his said real estate and the residue of his personal estate in trust for all and every the child and children of his niece Eliza Adams, with a gift over in default of such issue.

The testator died on the 22nd of August, 1869, and his will was duly proved by the widow, the sole executrix. The widow died on the 18th of June, 1881, and Eliza Adams, the second tenant for life, died on the 2nd of March, 1898. On the 17th of May, 1898, the trustees put the testator's real estate up for sale by public auction, subject to conditions, of which the last ran as follows: "The vendors are the trustees of the will of the said Alexander Penprase, and sell under powers conferred on them by virtue thereof, and the concurrence of persons beneficially interested in the purchase-money or property shall not be required."

The trustees claimed to be able to sell under section 14 of Lord St. Leonards' Act (22 & 23 Vict. c. 35 as devisees in trust of real estate charged with payment of debts and legacies.

The purchaser having raised an objection to the title of the trustees the present summons was taken out.

Upjohn, Q.C., and Manby, for the plaintiffs.—We have here a charge to pay debts, and the legal estate is in the trustees. Consequently they can make a good title under Lord St. Leonards' Act.

Jenkins, Q.C., and Badcock, for the purchaser.—There is no intention here to charge the real estate with payment of debts: Elliott v. Dearsley, 29 W. R. 494, 16 Ch. D. 322.

Upjohn, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 16.—STIRLING, J. (after stating the facts).—Now for the existence of the power so conferred by Lord St. Leonards' Act two things are essential. First of all there should be a charge of the real estate with debts or payments of legacies or other specific sums of money; and secondly, the real estate so charged should be devised to the trustee or trustees for the whole of the testator's estate or interest therein. I have therefore to inquire whether both of these requirements are satisfied. Firstly, therefore, I ask, is there a charge of debts or legacies? Now undoubtedly, on the principle of Greville v. Browne, there is a charge of debts and legacies which are given by the testator immediately on his own death. There is a direction that his just debts and funeral and testamentary expenses shall be paid. Then follows a gift of specific chattels, and also of pecuniary legacies, and then the testator proceeds, "all the rest and residue of my real and personal estate I give, devise, and bequeath to James Mayne and to Samuel Wise Adams, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns" as trustees upon trust. [His lordship read the provisions of the will above cited.] That, on the principle of Greville v. Browne, amounts to a charge of debts and legacies. But further than that I think that although the language of the will creates some difficulty, there is a charge of the reversionary legacies (as I will call them), that is, of the two sums of £150 which are directed to be paid after the death of the two tenants for life. As to this, the testator directs the trustees, who it is to be observed were not executors, to pay them. Then follows a declaration that after payment of these two sums last payable the trustees are to stand possessed of his other real estate and the residue of his personal estate in trust for all and every the child and children of his niece Eliza Adams. Now, the contention on the part of the respondents with reference to this was that although the words "after payment" might create a charge, the language in the subsequent part of the clause, to stand possessed of the real estate and the residue of the personal estate, showed an intention that there should be no charge because the will only spoke of "the residue" as regarded the personal estate, and it was to be inferred that the testator meant that the debts should be paid out of the personal estate in the hands or under the control of the trustees, and that one could not infer any intention therefrom to charge the real estate. No doubt that creates a certain difficulty, but the force of the words "after payment" is so strong as to lead to the belief that the true meaning was that whatever remained of the real and personal estate in the hands of the trustees at the death of the surviving tenant for life should be available for payment of these two reversionary legacies. Therefore I come to the conclusion that there does exist one of the two elements—namely, a charge of the two reversionary legacies, as well as of the debts and legacies—in this instance.

Now I come to consider the question whether the testator has, in the language of the Act, devised the estate so charged to his trustees for the whole of his estate and interest therein. The effect of that is that the power does not come into operation unless the testator has devised to his trustees on the true construction of the will all his estate and interest in the real estate charged with debts. Now, although the testator here purports to devise all the residue and remainder of his estate to his trustees, their heirs, executors, and administrators, it does not necessarily follow that the trustees took all the legal estate. It has been long established by a series of decisions to which it is unnecessary to refer that they only take such an estate as is sufficient to enable them to carry out the trusts imposed on them. It is to be observed that there is no specific direction to them as to payment of debts and funeral and testamentary expenses; there is only a general direction, without stating by whom it is to be carried into effect, and it does not necessarily follow that, notwithstanding the existence of these words, the trustees took an estate in fee simple. It is admitted that the law is correctly stated in Jarman (5th ed.), vol. 2, p. 1146. [His lordship read the passage, and continued:] Now these trustees are not named as executors, and are not expressly directed to pay debts or legacies which become payable on the testator's death. It seems to me in these circumstances that it cannot be inferred that the mere existence of a charge operates to give them the legal estate. It is, however, to be observed that as regards the reversionary legacies the charge, which I hold exists, is accompanied by an express direction for payment of legacies, and, in my judgment, that direction carries the legal estate to the trustees after the death of the two tenants for life. Furthermore, the second tenant for life took her life interest for her separate use, and it has long been established in these circumstances that the legal estate during the life of the second tenant for life would vest in the trustees. The real question to be considered is whether upon this will the trustees took the legal estate during the life of the testator's widow, the first tenant for life. Here there is no direction that the estate of the beneficiary was to be for her separate use. The language is upon trust to pay or permit his said wife to receive the rents and profits thereof during her life, and according to the decision in Doe v. Bolton that would, primâ facie, unless there is some context to alter the effect of the words, give her the legal estate during her life. It was, however, contended that the doctrine laid down in Harton v. Harton, and recently recognized by the House of Lords in Foxwell v. Van Grutten, 46 W. R. 426, [1897] A. C. 658, applies so as to vest the estate in the trustees from the death of the testator. Now, the rule established by that case, if I may be permitted to say so, is most briefly and accurately stated by Lord Davey in Foxwell v. Van Grutten, [1897] A. C. 658, at p. 683: "It is a convenient rule that where there are recurring occasions for the exercise of active duties by the trustees, and no repeated devises to them to enable them to perform their duties, the legal estate, if once in the trustees is to be deemed to be vested in them throughout, notwithstanding the duration in the meantime of what would, but for the recurring duties, be construed as uses executed in the beneficiaries." The important words here were "if once in the trustees"; and it is obvious from the consideration of the form of devise which was being considered by the House of Lords there, as well as of the previous portion of the speech of Lord Davey, that those were important words. In that case, as pointed out by Lord Davey, during the minorities of the testator's children the trustees were required to take the legal estate. After their death also it was clear that the trustees must take the legal estate in order to convey. The question arose as to the intermediate legal estate. There the House of Lords held that the legal estate was in the trustees as above mentioned. That does not apply here, because the question is whether during the life of the first tenant for life the legal estate is in the trustees. As to that it seems to me I must follow the law, which I think well established. I will refer for an example to Doe v. Bolton. In that case a testator devised a manor and mansion-house to trustees in trust to permit and suffer his wife, in case she should wish so to do, to occupy the same and receive the rents and profits thereof until his son was of age, provided she remained unmarried; and on the son attaining twenty-one to release, convey, and assure the manor and mansion to the son in fee, with a proviso that if the widow should not wish to occupy, the trustees should let the mansion till the son attained twenty-one. It was there held that, though the trustees must take the legal estate to convey to the son when of age, that alone would not prevent the widow from taking the legal estate in the meantime. [His lordship read the judgment of Denman, C.J., 11 Ad. & Ell., from p. 191: "It is plain that the trustees . . ." to "necessary for them to take the legal estate," on p. 192, and continued:] That is a test which we must apply here. The words of the gift in this will in favour of the wife to pay to or permit her to receive the rents and profits during her life are to be construed as passing the legal estate to the wife unless we can find something directing that a different person should take that estate. I cannot find anything here. For whatever reason it may have been the testator thought fit to appoint his wife sole executrix and did not impose any duty on the trustees during her life. Therefore the rule of Doe v. Biggs must be allowed to prevail, as he has not devised the estate to his trustees for his whole estate and interest therein. In my judgment, therefore, a good title cannot be made by the trustees as trustees. There will be a declaration that the vendors as trustees have not power to sell the real estate comprised in the contract, and liberty to apply as to damages and return of deposit or generally.

Twickenham Urban District Council v. Munton. (a.)

Local government—Street—Making up private street—Objection to plans, &c.—Amendment by justices—Private Street Works Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 57), ss. 5, 6, 7, 8 (1), 11.

The plaintiffs, an urban authority, resolved to do, with respect to the whole of M.-road, certain street works within section 6 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, and the plans, estimates, &c., and a provisional apportionment in respect thereof were duly approved by them, and notice thereof was served on the defendants and the other owners of property affected. The defendants did not, but another owner did, object thereto. Ultimately the justices held that part only of M.-road was a private street within the Act, and they amended the plans, &c., and provisional apportionment accordingly; the justices did not, however, amend the resolution, nor did they require any further notice to be given. No fresh notices were served, and the final apportionment, which apportioned the expenses in the same proportions as the amended provisional apportionment, was served on the owners of the property affected thereby, including the defendants. The defendants did not give any notice of objection to such final apportionment, but they refused to pay their proportion, on the grounds that the original resolution had not been expressly amended nor any fresh notice served.

Held, (1) that the justices had jurisdiction to amend the plans, &c., without expressly amending the original resolution; (2) that, whilst the justices had jurisdiction to direct fresh notices to be served, yet they were not bound to do so, it being a matter as to which they had a discretion; and (3) that the defendants were liable to pay the amount charged against them.

This was a summons claiming a declaration that the plaintiffs were entitled under section 13 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, to a charge on certain houses and lands vested in the defendants and situate Montpelier-road, Twickenham, for £27 10s. and £28 9s. 6d. the apportioned amounts of expenses incurred by the plaintiffs in executing private street works under section 6 of the above-mentioned Act, together with interest, and for consequential relief.

The Private Street Works Act, 1892, was duly adopted for the district of Twickenham, and came into operation on the 22nd of February, 1893.

On the 27th of June, 1895, the plaintiffs resolved with respect to Montpelier-road to do the various street works mentioned in section 6 of the Act, with the exception of lighting.

On the 25th of July, 1895, the plaintiffs passed the following resolution: "That the specifications, plans, sections, estimate, and provisional apportionment prepared by the council's surveyor with reference to the making up of Montpelier-road, Twickenham, be and they are hereby approved." The specifications, &c., mentioned in that resolution related to the whole of Montpelier-road. The resolution was duly published, and copies thereof served, in accordance with section 6, sub-section 3, of the Act, on the defendants and other owners of premises affected thereby.

The defendants gave no notice of any objection, but another owner did give such notice, and on the 1st of January, 1896, the matter having been brought before a court of summary jurisdiction, the justices held that a part of Montpelier-road was a street repairable by the inhabitants at large, but that the remainder was a private street within the meaning of the Act, and they amended the plans, estimates, and apportionment so as to limit the operation thereof to the latter portion of Montpelier-road. The justices did not direct any fresh notices to be served, and no further notices were served either on the defendants or any other person showing the alteration in the works proposed to be carried out.

On the 24th of October, 1896, the council's surveyor made his final apportionment by dividing the expenses in the same proportions in which the estimated expenses were divided in the amended provisional apportionment.

On the 19th of December, 1896, notices of such final apportionment were served on the several owners of the premises affected thereby, including the defendants. The defendants gave no notice of objection to the final apportionment.

The defendants were willing to pay the sums mentioned in the summons provided that the whole of Montpelier-road was repaired, but they objected to the repair of the portion to which the scheme of the plaintiffs had been limited by the magistrates as being detrimental to them so long as the rest of the road remained unrepaired.

The material provisions of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, are as follows:

"5. In this Act, if not inconsistent with the context . . . the expression 'street' means (unless the context otherwise requires) a street as defined by the Public Health Acts, and not being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large.

"6. (1) Where any street or part of a street is not sewered, levelled, paved, metalled, flagged, channelled, made good, and lighted to the satisfaction of the urban authority, the urban authority may from time to time resolve with respect to such street or part of a street to do" the private street works therein enumerated, "and the expenses incurred by the urban authority in executing private street works shall be apportioned (subject as in this Act mentioned) on the premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting on such street or part of a street. Any such resolution may include several streets or parts of streets, or may be limited to any part or parts of a street. (2) The surveyor shall prepare, as respects each street or part of a street, (a) A specification of the private street works referred to in the resolution with plans and sections (if applicable); (b) an estimate of the probable expenses of the works; (c) a provisional apportionment of the estimated expenses among the premises liable to be charged therewith under this Act. Such specification, plans, sections, estimate, and provisional apportionment shall comprise the particulars prescribed in Part I. of the schedule of this Act, and shall be submitted to the urban authority, who may by resolution approve the same respectively, with or without modification or addition, as they think fit. (3) The resolution approving the specifications, plans, and sections (if any), estimates, and provisional apportionments, shall be published in the manner prescribed in Part II. of the schedule in this Act, and copies thereof shall be served on the owners of the premises shown as liable to be charged in the provisional apportionment within seven days after the date of the first publication. During one month from the date of the first publication the approved specifications, plans, and sections (if any), estimates, and provisional apportionments (or copies thereof certified by the surveyor), shall be kept at the urban authority offices, and shall be open to inspection at all reasonable times.

"7. During the said month any owner of any premises shown in a provisional apportionment as liable to be charged with any part of the expenses of executing the works may by written notice served on the urban authority object to the proposals of the urban authority on any of the following grounds—that is to say: (a) That an alleged street or part of a street is not or does not form part of a street within the meaning of this Act; (b) that a street or part of a street is (in whole or in part) a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large; (c) that there has been some material informality, defect, or error in or in respect of the resolution, notice, plans, sections, or estimate; (d) that the proposed works are insufficient or unreasonable. . . .

"8. (1) The urban authority at any time after the expiration of the said month may apply to a court of summary jurisdiction to appoint a time for determining the matter of all objections made as in this Act mentioned, and shall publish a notice of the time and place appointed, and copies of such notice shall be served upon the objectors, and at the time and place so appointed any such court may proceed to hear and determine the matter of all such objections in the same manner as nearly as may be, and with the same powers and subject to the same provisions with respect to stating a case, as if the urban authority were proceeding summarily against the objectors to enforce payment of a sum of money summarily recoverable. The court may quash in whole or in part, or may amend the resolution, plans, sections, estimates, and provisional apportionments, or any of them, on the application either of any objector or of the urban authority. The court may also, if it thinks fit, adjourn the hearing and direct any further notices to be given. (2) No objection which could be made under this Act shall be otherwise made or allowed in any court proceeding or manner whatsoever.

"11. The urban authority may from time to time amend the specifications, plans, and sections (if any), estimates, and provisional apportionments for any private street works, but if the total amount of the estimates in respect of any street or part of a street is increased, such estimates and the provisional apportionment shall be published in the manner prescribed in Part II. of the schedule to this Act, and shall be open to inspection at the urban authority's office at all reasonable times, and copies thereof shall be served on the owners of the premises affected thereby; and objections may be made to the increase and apportionment, and if made shall be dealt with and determined in like manner as objections to the original estimate and apportionment."

Section 12 provides for a final apportionment to be made after the completion of the works, and empowers the owners to object on the grounds therein mentioned.

Section 13 gives the urban authority a charge on premises included in the final apportionment of the sums finally apportioned.

Macmorran, Q.C., and The Hon. Frank Russell, for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs are entitled to the charge which they claim; the resolution was duly passed, and, the defendants not having made any objection within a month are bound thereby.

R. C. Glen, for the defendants.—The council resolved to make up the whole of the road; that resolution stands and there has been no resolution to make up part only of the road. The plaintiffs rely on section 8, but we submit that the magistrates had no jurisdiction to make amendments in the resolution without having the parties before them. The foundation of the jurisdiction to declare a charge is that there should be a valid resolution; here there is none to justify what has been done. The defendants have been deprived of the opportunity to object to the apportionment. Section 8 shows that the justices ought to have directed a further notice to be given, and upon such notice being given the defendants would have the same power of objection as if that notice had been given originally by the council. There has been no valid final apportionment, and the defendants submit that the proceedings must be commenced de novo: Whitchurch v. Fulham Board of Works, 14 W. R. 277, L. R. 1 Q. B. 233.

Macmorran, Q.C., in reply.—[STIRLING, J.—Has there been any resolution that part only of the road should be made up?] Not in terms, but the council have amended the plans and done the works according to such amended plans; therefore they must have resolved to do them. If the justices found that part of the road was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large they would be obliged either to amend or else dismiss the application. The justices must therefore have some power of amendment.

Dec. 10.—STIRLING, J., after stating the facts and referring to sections 3, 4, 5 (definition of "street"), 6, 7, 8, 11, 12, 13 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, continued as follows: The defendants resist the summons on the following grounds: First, it is said that the justices have exceeded their jurisdiction by taking upon themselves the function of the urban authority with whom rests the determination of the question whether the whole or part only of a street should be repaired. Undoubtedly section 6, sub-section 1, gives the urban authority the right to decide whether the whole or part of a street is to be repaired, and, in the present case, the plaintiff council did by resolution determine that the whole of Montpelier-road should be repaired. Sub-section 2, however, provides that "the specification, estimate, and provisional apportionment shall be submitted to the urban authority, who may by resolution approve the same with or without modification or addition as they may think fit." In this case the approval was without modification or addition. Sub-section 3 provides for due notice of the last-mentioned resolution being given to the owners of the premises shown as liable to be charged, any one of whom may, by section 7, take objection to the proposed works on the following amongst other grounds: "(b) that a street or part of a street is (in whole or in part) a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large." Section 8 provides that such objections shall be dealt with by a court of summary jurisdiction, and also provides that "the court may quash in whole or in part or may amend the resolution, plans, sections, estimates, and provisional apportionments, or any of them, on the application either of any objector or of the urban authority."

Now, here the court did not quash the resolution, or the plan, sections, estimates, or provisional apportionments, but amended the plans, estimates, and apportionments, without, however, saying anything about the resolution. But it is to be observed that the court was acting within its power, because the Act empowers the court to quash or amend the resolution, plans, and so forth, or any of them; and in point of fact the resolution was in terms so framed by reference to the plans and estimates as not to require any verbal modification.

Now, upon the construction of the Act the jurisdiction of the court of summary jurisdiction to amend a resolution and the accompanying plans, sections, and so forth, appears to me to exist in a case where the objection taken is that the street or part of the street is a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, no less than where the objection is of any other nature specified in section 7; and where the jurisdiction is exercised I can find nothing in the Act which renders it necessary that the urban authority should begin their proceedings de novo or pass a resolution limiting the works to that part of the street which is not repairable by the public. So to decide would be, as it seems to me, in fact, to hold that the power of the court of summary jurisdiction is in such a case limited to quashing the resolution and the accompanying plans, and does not extend to amending them. I do not think that that is the true construction of the Act; but I think that the amended resolution, and plans, and so forth, were meant by the Legislature to take effect just as if they had been duly passed, ab initio, by the urban authority. In my judgment, therefore, the justices did not exceed their jurisdiction.

Secondly, it was contended that the defendants had been by these proceedings deprived of all opportunity of taking objection to the works now proposed to be executed. That is true; but section 8 provides that the court of summary jurisdiction may, if it thinks fit, adjourn the hearing and direct further notices to be given. It was, therefore, within the power of the court of summary jurisdiction to direct notices to be given to the defendants; but it was not obligatory on such a court so to do. Plainly the court had a discretion in the matter, and that discretion was exercised. It is not for me to say whether or not the discretion was properly exercised. All that I have to determine is whether the justices acted within their jurisdiction. I think that they did, and it appears to me that this objection also fails.

On the whole I come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs are entitled to the order for which they ask, and that order must be made accordingly.

Ex parte SALOMON. (a.)

Solicitor—Costs—Pauper client—Taxation of costs in House of Lords—Liability to costs as between solicitor and pauper client—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 16, rr. 22-31.

Where a solicitor had been retained by, and acted for, a successful pauper appellant (since deceased) in the House of Lords, but in accordance with the practice in the House of Lords as laid down in Johnson v. Lindsay [1892] A. C. 110, the respondent in the House of Lords was not liable for party and party costs;

Held—on an application by the solicitor against the estate of his deceased client for taxation of the costs of the appeal to the House of Lords—that the solicitor was entitled to recover from the client's estate the ordinary costs which a solicitor is entitled to charge, viz., costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client.

Summons to review the taxing-master's certificate.

The applicant, Ralph Raphael, had acted as solicitor for the late Aron Salomon in Broderip v. Salomon, 43 W. R. 612, [1895] 2 Ch. 323, and in the appeal of Salomon v. Salomon & Co., 45 W. R. 193, [1897] A. C. 22, in which the House of Lords, reversing the judgment below, held that, the company being regularly constituted under the Companies Acts, the appellant, Aron Salomon, was under no liability to indemnify it, as his agent or trustee, against the claims of creditors in the absence of fraud.

It was under the applicant's advice, that Aron

(a.) Reported by W. H. DRAPER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Salomon, who had been reduced to poverty by the decision of the Court of Appeal, had presented a petition to the House of Lords for leave to sue in formâ pauperis, with an affidavit in the terms of ord. 16, r. 22, of the Rules of Court, 1883.

Leave having been given, Aron Salomon succeeded in his appeal to the House of Lords, and ceased to be a pauper.

He died in 1897, and the respondent, Emanuel Salomon, took out letters of administration of his estate and effects.

On the successful appeal of a pauper to the House of Lords, party and party costs were disallowed in Johnson v. Lindsay, [1892] A. C. 110, 48 W. R. Dig. 180.

A bill of costs was delivered by the applicant to the respondent, in which, among other items, he claimed costs for work done by him as solicitor in the prosecution of the appeal to the House of Lords.

The bill having been taxed on the petition of the respondent, the taxing-master submitted these items to Mr. Taylor, of the Taxing Department of the House of Lords.

It was contended on behalf of the respondent that this being a taxation under an order of the Chancery Division, rule 27 of order 16 of the Rules of Court applied, and the applicant was not entitled to "take, or agree to take, or seek to obtain from" the pauper "any fee, profit, or reward for the conduct of his business in the court."

Mr. Taylor refused to tax the bill, on the ground that the Rules of the Supreme Court did not bind the House of Lords, and there did not exist any rules or practice of the House of Lords, in the case of a pauper appellant, regulating the liability to costs as between solicitor and client.

The items, therefore, were disallowed.

Kenyon Parker, for the applicant, said that the question was whether the costs of a successful pauper litigant in the House of Lords can be taxed as between himself and his solicitor. There being no special contract, the ordinary rules as between solicitor and client apply, since the Rules of the Supreme Court, ord. 16, rr. 22-31, do not apply to the House of Lords. The form of Johnson v. Lindsay, applies to party and party costs only. The pauper can make a bargain if he pleases: Richardson v. Richardson and Plowman, 44 W. R. 102, [1895] P. 276, 346. The matter should be referred back to the taxing-master to tax the disallowed costs as between solicitor and client.

S. O. Buckmaster, for Emanuel Salomon, the administrator of the estate and effects of Aron Salomon.

The practice is the same in the House of Lords as in the High Court; the rules were much discussed in Carson v. Pickersgill, 33 W. R. 589, 14 Q. B. D. 859. The result of allowing these costs would be that the solicitor would get the whole costs from the successful pauper, including profit costs, while the pauper would only get costs out of pocket from the unsuccessful respondents. The judgment of the House of Lords only relieved Salomon from paying a sum of £7,700 and did not give him anything. The costs were rightly disallowed, according to the practice of the Chancery Division.

KEKEWICH, J.—A novel and interesting point on the important question of costs arises in this way. The order of Vaughan Williams, J., and the Court of Appeal in Broderip v. Salomon, known as "the one-man company case," reduced Aron Salomon to poverty. He carried the case to the House of Lords. By the affidavit which he took to the House of Lords in support of his petition, which was considered by the Appeal Committee, he swore he was "not worth £5, his wearing apparel and the subject-matter of the cause or matter only excepted." On that he was allowed to appeal in formâ pauperis. The result was that he succeeded on his appeal, and though not thereby made a wealthy man, he was rehabilitated and removed from the list of paupers. He was then entitled as a successful appellant to certain costs from the unsuccessful respondents, and the costs were necessarily paid according to the rules laid down in the case of Johnson v. Lindsay—namely, "On the taxation of a pauper appellant's costs on a successful appeal to this House, the fees of this House, and the fees of counsel are to be disallowed, and the solicitor is to have his costs out of pocket with a reasonable allowance to cover office expenses, including clerks, &c." That is all he is entitled to recover from the unsuccessful respondents who were ordered to pay the costs. An order of the House of Lords on the respondent there, to pay the pauper appellant's costs would be construed to mean what I have stated. Then Aron Salomon's solicitor says he is entitled to recover from Aron Salomon, or rather to be paid out of his estate, the ordinary costs which a solicitor is entitled to charge, that is to say, costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client, and the question I have to decide is whether he is entitled to that or not.

It is strange that there is no direct authority upon the point at all. The orders of the Supreme Court do not help me, except so far as they may be treated as founded upon justice after much consideration by many learned judges and others. It has, however, been held that they are not binding on the House of Lords, and do not apply to the House of Lords; and I cannot possibly say that because, if this had been an action in the High Court, Mr. Raphael would not have been entitled to ordinary costs, therefore he is not entitled to recover ordinary costs in the House of Lords. On that the case of Johnson v. Lindsay does not help me in the least. I do not think I can pay any attention to the allegation in the petition set out in the report of Johnson v. Lindsay. It was urged on behalf of the petitioners at p. 111 of [1892] App. Cas. that "In the case of a pauper appellant in this House, the fees of the House are not required from him, and he obtains the services of counsel and solicitor without remuneration; that if the appeal is dismissed, no costs are given against him; that if when the appeal is successful the appellant's costs are allowed, and are taxed upon the principle hitherto in force in the House, the respondent has to pay when he loses, and not be paid when he wins, and, moreover, has to pay the appellant's costs—not of suing as a pauper, but of winning as a pauper." It is strange that there is there a statement not only that the fees of the House are not charged, but that the pauper obtains the service of solicitor and counsel without remuneration. If that had been true, it disposes of the case. But this allegation in the petition is controverted, and I find no proof of it anywhere. For the same or a like reason I cannot find much to guide me in the otherwise instructive case of Carson v. Pickersgill, because that case was in the Supreme Court. It was there held that under the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 16, rr. 24, 25, 26, 27, 31, a successful plaintiff in an action in formâ pauperis, tried before a judge and jury, is entitled upon taxation as against the defendant to costs out of pocket only, and cannot be allowed anything for remuneration to his solicitor or fees to counsel. That case went on the rules. The fact there that it was tried by jury, so that the costs were not in the discretion of the court, was much discussed. But in truth that decision went entirely on the Rules of the Supreme Court. They were very carefully considered and criticized by more than one learned judge, but at the same time the decision did go on the rules, and did not touch the general principle.

But the rules seem to me to be based on this, that when a man sues in formâ pauperis in the Supreme Court he has counsel and solicitor assigned to him, and that makes all the difference. They are assigned to him on certain terms which bind them as much as they bind him. So here I am left without authority, and have to consider the general principle. What is the contract? That on reflection seems to me to be the real question. What was the contract between Aron Salomon and his solicitor Raphael when Raphael accepted the client's retainer to conduct the appeal in the House of Lords? Am I to invent a special contract because the client was suing in formâ pauperis, a contract which would substantially say this, that whereas but for a special contract the retainer would enable the solicitor to charge the client subject to the ordinary rules—that is to say, to charge costs, including profit costs, subject to taxation, yet because he is suing as a pauper the client is not liable in that or in any other way, but only according to a special contract depending on the fact that he sues as a pauper? Why should I invent that contract for the occasion? When Raphael became the solicitor of Aron Salomon, not by assignment but by Aron Salomon's choice, why should I not say that the retainer is governed by the ordinary rules? I have said that there is no authority on the point, but there is a very useful case before Sir Francis Jeune, in which he expressed an opinion, subject no doubt to revision, if the actual point came before him—the case of Richardson v. Richardson. There there was an action in the Divorce Court and the petitioner suing in formâ pauperis obtained a verdict of £30 damages and a decree nisi with costs against the co-respondent, and the question there, as it was in Johnson v. Lindsay, was not what the solicitor was to obtain from the pauper client but what the co-respondent was to pay on the decree nisi to the pauper petitioner. It was not argued at great length, but some authorities were cited, and Sir Francis Jeune reserved judgment, and subsequently delivered a very instructive judgment in which he called attention more than once to the difference between the assignment of a legal adviser to a pauper and the retainer of a solicitor by him, and he says: "It follows, I think, that there is nothing to prevent counsel or a solicitor being retained by a pauper and receiving from him such fees as he, perhaps by the aid of friends, may be able to pay, and this is the effect of the opinion given by the Attorney-General (Sir Richard Webster) in 1891, as stated in the Law Times (vol. 90), p. 79 (2). Whether a solicitor, not assigned by the court, but employed by the pauper, could, if he thought it worth the whole, sue on a retainer, it is not necessary to decide, but my present opinion is that he could." Of course that opinion is not binding upon me, and it is not really a judicial opinion, but it is valuable as being an expression of opinion of the learned judge, not on the particular point before him, but on one connected with a point which involved a long disquisition on costs, where a man is suing in formâ pauperis. That view seems to me to be consonant with justice and commonsense. You may trust solicitors in general when they accept a retainer from a pauper not to sue him on the retainer. If a sense of honour would not prevent them from suing and recovering judgment, their own interest would, because, if they have got a pauper to deal with, it is not likely they will be willing to spend money in the recovering judgment against him. But does that prevent a solicitor from making an ordinary contract on the footing that the solicitor may make the client pay if he becomes able to do so? I wish to be perfectly understood. I do not lay down the doctrine that the contract between the solicitor and his client is that the client should not pay unless he succeeds. I do not think that would be a proper contract to infer, or that he will pay the expenses if, fortunately, he ever has the means so to do. I do not think that the contract is of that character, but I think it is the common contract—namely, the client from the moment of the retainer, so long as the retainer holds good, is bound to pay the ordinary costs, though he has not in fact the means to pay. That is in accordance with the ordinary practice. Solicitors often accept retainers from persons who, to their knowledge, may not be able to pay, and they do so partly out of kindness and partly because they are content to take the rough with the smooth in the course of business. It is hard to say because a solicitor happens to know that his client is impecunious, the solicitor cannot sue him if he thinks fit to do so; and I do not see, for this purpose, the distinction between the man who is known to be impecunious, though not described in the procedure as such, and the man who is suing in formâ pauperis, because he has been allowed to do so by the House of Lords. Only one other matter I must notice, as it was mentioned by counsel. The "one-man company case" was one of some notoriety, and people seemed to consider Mr. Raphael worthy of reward for his services in enabling tradesmen to turn their businesses into one-man companies and so avoid their liabilities. Therefore they got up a testimonial to Mr. Raphael for the services he had rendered, not to Aron Salomon, but to the public, the testimonial consisting of a piece of plate and an address on vellum. No doubt subscriptions were got under the idea that Mr. Raphael acted gratis. It was said that Mr. Raphael knew it. But it would be going too far to say that, if my view of the contract between the solicitor and client is right, the solicitor is estopped by the acceptance of a piece of plate and an address on vellum from getting his costs; such things would be a poor substitute for costs, and in my opinion the testimonial is not a reason for getting rid of or varying the contract entered into, if my view of that contract is right.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. PELLY. (a.)

Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 90), s. 8 (4)—Contract by English owners to sell ships to American Government—Contract to be void if United States became belligerents—Outbreak of war—Action to recover deposit.

By section 8 (4) of the Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870, it is an offence for anyone to despatch, or cause or allow to be despatched, any ship with intent or knowledge, or having reasonable cause to believe, that the same shall or will be employed in the military or naval service of any foreign State at war with any friendly State.

The defendants on the 21*st of April*, 1898, contracted to sell to the plaintiffs, the United States Government, prior to the commencement of hostilities between that country and Spain, two steamships, "to be delivered as soon as possible."

The plaintiffs paid a deposit, which was subject to the following clause of the contract: "If from blockade or any other cause arising from the United States becoming belligerents and preventing delivery of either of the said steamers, this contract is to be null and void, but the vendor is to retain the deposit as and for liquidated damages."

It was impossible for the defendants to have despatched the ships before the day (23rd of April) when the United States commenced hostilities with Spain; but the proclamation of neutrality by the British Government was not published until the 26th of April. In an action to recover the deposit,

Held, that the defendants' contention that they were "prevented" from making delivery by reason of the above-cited section of the Act of 1870, was a good defence to the action.

Commercial cause.

Action to recover £5,300 deposit paid under a contract for the purchase from the defendants of two steam colliers. The defendants pleaded that by reason of the outbreak of war between America and Spain it was impossible for them to deliver the ships, and that by the terms of the contract they were entitled to retain the deposit.

The material facts were as follow:

The contract was entered into on the 21st of April, 1898, in London, and by it the United States Government by their representative agreed to buy from the defendants two ships—The Rookwood and The Lockwood for the sum of £26,500 each to be delivered in New York "as soon as possible." The deposit paid was 10 per cent. on the purchase price. It was provided by clause 7 of the contract that if from blockade or any other cause arising from the United States becoming belligerents and preventing delivery of either of the said vessels, the contract was to be null and void, but in that case the vendors were to retain the deposit as liquidated damages, and in addition if the steamer or steamers had sailed from the United Kingdom a further payment of £2,500 for each steamer was to be made to the vendors.

At the date of the agreement both vessels were at sea, but The Lockwood arrived in the Thames on the morning of the 23rd of April, and The Rookwood arrived at Alloa in Scotland on the afternoon of the 22nd of April.

The plaintiffs alleged that there had been delay in despatching the vessels, and that the defendants were not "prevented" within the meaning of clause 7 of the contract from delivering the ships. The latter question turned upon the construction to be placed on section 8 of the Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870, which enacts that, "If any person within her Majesty's dominions, without the licence of her Majesty, does any of the following acts—that is say, (4) despatches, or causes or allows to be despatched, any ship with intent or knowledge or having reasonable cause to believe that the same shall or will be employed in the military or naval service of any foreign State at war with any friendly State such person shall be deemed to have committed an offence against this Act."

The defendants denied that there had been delay, and relied on evidence they adduced that on the 23rd of April the United States declared war with Spain. On that day they wrote to the Naval Attaché at the American Embassy in London, who had signed the contract on behalf of the United States Government, that as the United States had become belligerents they were prevented from delivering either steamer. The Naval Attaché replied that until the English Government had notified the fact that America was at war with Spain by a proclamation of neutrality the provision of the Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870, did not come into force, and that the ships were to be sent on at once.

This the defendants declined to attempt to do, and the present action was brought.

The argument sufficiently appears from the judgment.

Cohen, Q.C., Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Newton Crane, for the plaintiffs.

Sir R. T. Reid, Q.C., and Scrutton, for the defendants.

BIGHAM, J.—This was an action brought to recover a deposit made by the United States on signing a contract for the purchase of two ships from the defendants. By the contract the ships were to be despatched as soon as possible, and I have no doubt that the ships were purchased because it was thought that war was almost certain to break out. By clause 7 of the contract, if the United States became belligerents with another power and the vendors were thereby prevented from delivering the ships, the contract was to be void, except that the vendors were to be entitled to retain the deposit, which, in my opinion, was a reasonable and proper stipulation. By the terms of the contract the defendants were to do their best to get the ships despatched "as soon as possible," and one reason for that was, as the United States knew, that it was desirable to get the ships away before the Foreign Enlistment Act operated to interfere with their departure. It was suggested that the defendants from the very first intended to defeat the object of the contract and so make sure of retaining the deposit and in that way to realize a profit without giving any consideration for it. I do not think that there is the least ground for making that suggestion. The evidence satisfies me that the defendants did their best on the 22nd of April, the very day after the contract was signed, to carry out the contract, and I am sure that by the morning of the 23rd of April—that is, before the defendants had had time to start the ships on their way to New York—they had ascertained, as the fact was, that a state of war existed. [His lordship then referred to telegrams published in the Times stating that the American fleet sailed on the 21st of April from Key West, and on the 22nd of April a Spanish ship, The Bona Ventura, was captured, and to the fact that on the same day the American President issued a proclamation declaring a general blockade of Cuba.] In my judgment the argument of the plaintiffs was wrong when they contended that there was no state of war affecting the defendants unless and until war was formally recognized by our Government, and that the defendants were therefore free so far as contravening the Act of 1870 up to the 26th of April at any rate, when a declaration by her Majesty dated the 23rd of April, and stating that war had unhappily broken out between Spain and the United States, was officially published in the London Gazette. I agree that this proclamation is not, strictly speaking, evidence of the date when the fact that the United States had become belligerents became officially recognized by the Government of this country, but I confess that it is not without weight in my mind, because I cannot imagine that those who prepared that proclamation were not fully informed. For the reasons given I am constrained to hold that if the defendants had proceeded with the dispatch of the vessels on or after the 23rd of April, they would have violated section 8, and have brought themselves within the Act. It is sufficient for me to say that if a man found himself doing some act which was contrary to the law, he was "prevented" from doing that act. Clause 7 of the contract does not merely mean physical prevention. If, therefore, it was improper or wrong for the defendants to deliver the ships after the 23rd of April, which, on the evidence, was the day before they, by any possibility, could have despatched these vessels—then, by the terms of the contract, read as I think it was clearly intended by the parties when they signed it that it should be read—the defendants were not to do so, but were in that event to be compensated for their trouble and expenses by retaining the deposit. For these reasons there must be judgment for the defendants with costs.

MALLET v. GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Railway — Carriage of goods — "Owner's risk"— Breach of contract—Damages—Liability.

A railway company contracted with M. to carry certain goods to Jersey, viâ the Great Western Railway. Instead of doing so they carried them viâ the London and South-Western Railway, and in consequence there was delay, and M. suffered damage and loss. The contract was for carriage at owner's risk. In the contract was a clause relieving the company from all liability for loss, damage, misdelivery, delay, or detention, except where such arose from the wilful misconduct of the company.

Held, that, as the company had not carried out the terms of the contract, the above clause did not apply, and the company were liable.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from a nonsuit by the learned judge of the Lowestoft County Court.

The action was for breach of contract. The plaintiff entered into a contract with the defendant company whereby the latter undertook to carry for the plaintiff a quantity of fish to Jersey. The fish was to be carried by the defendants on their own line as far as London, and thence by the Great Western Railway to Weymouth, where it was to be placed on board the steamship for Jersey. Instead of this being done the defendants carried the fish from London by the London and South-Western Railway to Southampton. The consequence of this was that the fish arrived late and the plaintiff lost the market, whereby he suffered damage.

The contract, which was one for carriage at owner's risk, contained the following clause: "To be carried at the reduced rate below the company's ordinary rate, in consideration whereof I agree to relieve the Great Eastern Railway Co., and all other companies or persons over whose lines the merchandize may pass or in whose possession the same may be during any portion of the transit, from all liability for loss, damage, misdelivery, delay, or detention, except upon proof that such loss, damage, misdelivery, delay, or detention arose from wilful misconduct on the part of the servants of the company or of such other companies or persons as above."

At the trial the plaintiff proved that the defendants carried the fish viâ the London and South-Western Railway instead of by the Great Western Railway, and that in consequence he had suffered loss and damage. He did not, however, give any evidence showing the reason why the goods were carried by the former instead of by the latter company. The learned judge nonsuited the plaintiff on the ground that he was bound by the aforesaid clause in the contract and that he had given no evidence showing that anything had been done which would take the case out of that clause.

The plaintiff appealed.

Ernest Wilde, for the appellant.—There was here a clear case of a breach of contract. The contract was to carry by the Great Western Railway. The defendants had failed to do so; they had carried the plaintiff's goods by another line, and in consequence the plaintiff had incurred loss. The case was thus taken out of the above clause in the contract: Sleat v. Fagg, 5 B. & Ald. 342.

Bodilly, for the respondents.—The nonsuit was right. There was no wilful misconduct on the part of the defendants, and unless such was proved they are not liable for loss or damage: Stevens v. Great Western Railway Co., 52 L. T. Rep. 324, 33 W. R. Dig. 173; Lewis v. Great Western Railway Co., 26 W. R. 255, 3 Q. B. D. 195.

Wilde, in reply.—Delivery to the wrong person is wilful misconduct.

DAY, J.—I feel no doubt as to the rights of these parties. The plaintiff entered into a contract at Lowestoft with the Great Eastern Railway Co. whereby the latter undertook to carry the fish viâ the Great Western Railway and Weymouth. Immediately afterwards the defendants changed their mind upon the subject and sent the fish by the South-Western Railway and Southampton, and by reason of so doing the fish were greatly delayed. The defendants are not protected from liability for such delay by the terms of the above-mentioned clause. The delay there means delay in the performance of rhe contract. Here the defendants deliberately violated the contract, and by reason of not carrying out the contract they delayed the fish. The learned judge in the county court ought to have heard the case out. He did wrong in nonsuiting.

LAWRANCE, J.—I agree.

Appeal allowed.

ST. LOUIS BREWERIES (LIMITED) (Appellants) v. APTHORPE (SURVEYOR OF TAXES) (Respondent). (a.)

Inland revenue—Income tax—Annual profits or gains—English company—Business carried on abroad through foreign company—Income Tax Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 100, Schedule D., 5th case—Income Tax Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34), s. 2, Schedule D.

An English company formed under the Companies Acts and registered in London had power by its memorandum of association to acquire the whole or part of the capital stock of an American incorporated association, then carrying on a brewing business in the State of Missouri, in the United States, and to allow the legal estate and interest in any business or property acquired by the company to be vested in and carried on by any American company upon trust for, or as agents or nominees of, the English company. The English company acquired the whole of the share capital of the American association except fourteen shares. The brewing operations were carried on in the State of Missouri exclusively, and under the immediate management of the directors of the American association, and the breweries and other property were vested in that association, and the officers and employees were appointed by the American directors. At the end of each financial year copies of the balance-sheet and profit and loss account of the American association were sent to the English company, and, after considering them, the directors of that company informed the American association as to what dividend they thought ought to be declared, and the American association habitually declared a dividend at the rate mentioned. In the reports and accounts of the English company the breweries business and profits were treated as being the property and under the control of the English company, and the directors of the American association were referred to as "the board of management in St. Louis." The accounts of the breweries were audited annually by an English accountant sent for the purpose by the English company. The amount of the dividend on the shares held by the English company was transmitted to England for distribution amongst the shareholders.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the brewing business was in substance the business of the English company, and that they were liable to be assessed to income tax under section 2, Schedule D., of the Income Tax Act, 1853, in respect of the annual profits or gains arising from that business.

Case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

The appellant company appealed against assessments made upon them under section 2, Schedule D., of the Income Tax Act, 1853—"in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing in the United Kingdom from any profession, trade, employment, or vocation, whether the same shall be respectively carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere."

The appellant company contended that the assessment should be made under the 5th case of section 100, Schedule D., of the Income Tax Act, 1842—viz., the duty to be charged in respect (inter alia) of foreign possessions "shall be computed on a sum not less than the full amount of the actual sums annually received in Great Britain" (now the United Kingdom) ". . . computing the same on an average of the three preceding years," &c.—and they contended that the assessment should be reduced to the amount actually received by them in England.

The appellant company was an English company registered under the Companies Acts, and having its registered office in the City of London. Amongst the objects stated in its memorandum of association were:

"(a) To acquire the whole or any part of the capital stock of the St. Louis Brewing Association carrying on business at St. Louis in the State of Missouri in the United States of America, and to acquire and take over any contracts which it may seem expedient that the company as proprietors of the said stock should acquire and take over, and with a view thereto to enter into and carry into effect with such modifications (if any) as may be agreed upon the agreement with Edmund Fitzmaurice Lenon mentioned in clause 3 of the company's articles of association.

"(b) To carry on business as brewers, maltsters, &c.

"(c) To allow and cause the legal estate and interest in any businesses or property acquired, established, or carried on by the company to remain or be vested or registered in the name of or carried on by any American company formed, or to be formed, and either upon trust for or as agents or nominees of this company, or upon any other terms or conditions which the board of directors may consider for the benefit of this company, and to manage the affairs or take over and carry on the business of any such American company either by acquiring the whole or part of the shares or stock or debentures or other securities thereof or otherwise howsoever, and to exercise all or any of the powers of any such company or of holders of shares or stock or debentures or securities thereof, and to receive and distribute as profits the dividends and interest on such shares, stock, debentures, or securities."

The St. Louis Brewing Association was duly incorporated in May, 1889, under the laws of the State of Missouri, with a capital of 5,250,000 dols., divided into 52,500 shares of 100 dols. each, for the purpose of manufacturing and selling beer. It had (under its articles and bye-laws) a board of thirteen directors, who held office for a year and were elected annually by the shareholders, and other officers appointed by the directors. The board of directors had under the bye-laws the general management and control of the corporation and its officers, and a general supervision and control over the committees of the board, which committees were appointed by the board. The association had purchased a number of breweries at St. Louis, and the share capital of the association was entitled to the whole of the net profits of the breweries less an amount payable for interest on debentures issued by the association and secured by a mortgage upon certain of the breweries.

The St. Louis Brewing Association had issued 50,886 shares, of which 50,872 shares were held by the appellant company, and the remaining fourteen shares were held in America, thirteen being held by the directors of the St. Louis Brewing Association, each holding one share. The brewing, manufacture, and the brewing trade on which the profits wholly depended were carried on exclusively at St. Louis under the immediate management of the directors of the American corporation. These directors in the printed reports of the appellant company were termed the "Board of Management in St. Louis." The banking account of the American corporation and all the trade books and accounts were kept at St. Louis aforesaid. An English accountant was appointed by the appellant company to proceed to America at the end of each financial year and audit the accounts of the eighteen breweries at St. Louis. Although the directors of the American association were not paid salaries, under article 10 of the bye-laws each director received a salary as manager of an individual brewery committed to his charge for management purposes.

At the end of each financial year a balance-sheet of the American corporation and a profit and loss account were prepared showing the result of the brewing business for the past year. A copy of such balance-sheet and profit and loss account was forwarded by the American corporation to the appellant company, and the directors of the appellant company then considered the accounts and agreed upon the rate of dividend which they considered should be declared. They communicated their decision to the American corporation, who then always declared a dividend upon the shares of the American corporation at the rate mentioned. The directors of the American corporation having declared the dividend, the directors of the appellant company then declared a dividend upon the shares of the appellant company.

No dividend warrant was issued by the American corporation. Each stock or share holder, upon production of his certificate, was entitled to be paid the amount of dividend due to him. The amount of dividend on the shares held by the appellant company was sent over in bulk by telegram so far as required for the English shareholders in the appellant company in England. Such portion of the dividend as was required for American shareholders in the appellant company was retained in America by the American company and distributed there direct. The appellant company did not issue any dividend warrants in respect of such of its shares as were held by American shareholders.

The annual reports and accounts of the appellant company always stated and dealt with the subject of the breweries, their business and profits, as being the property and under the entire control of the appellant company alone.

The commissioners found as follows:

1. That the business carried on at St. Louis in the United States of America was in fact carried on by, and was the business of, the appellant company, and that the profits made were the profits of the appellant company.

2. That the head and seat and directing power of the appellant company were at the appellant company's registered office in the City of London, and that if the business at St. Louis and the profits made thereby were technically the business and profits of the American company, the American company was for such purpose the agent of the appellant company.

The commissioners confirmed the said assessments and stated this case at the request of the appellant company.

Asquith, Q.C. (Bremner and Macaskie with him), for the appellants.—The commissioners were wrong in holding that the brewing business was carried on by the appellant company; they are interested in it only as shareholders in the American association, whose business it is. The appellant company have no control over the business or the officers of the American company, except so far as by means of the voting power conferred on them as shareholders they can exercise such a control. The case is within Colquhoun v. Brooks, 38 W. R. 289, 14 App. Cas. 493, and Bartholomay Brewing Co. v. Wyatt, 42 W. R. 173, [1893] 2 Q. B. 499, and is distinguishable from Apthorpe v. Peter Schoenhofen Brewing Co., 79 L. T. Rep. 98, on the ground that in that case the English company had complete control over the American company.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G. (Danckwerts with him), for the respondent.—The commissioners were right; the case falls within the first branch of Schedule D. of section 2 of the Income Tax Act, 1853 (Dowell's Income Tax Laws (4th ed.), p. 242). The English company was formed, as its memorandum of association shows, to acquire the business and property of the American association; their accounts shows that the breweries and other American property are treated as the property of the English company; the American association is merely a device, contemplated by the English company's memorandum, for enabling the business to be carried on, and the property to be held in the State of Missouri in accordance with the local law. The business is the business of the English company carried on by them in London through the agency of the American association or the American managers, who are in substance the servants or agents of the English company. Colquhoun v. Brooks does not overrule the decisions in Cesena Sulphur Co. v. Nicholson and Calcutta Jute Mills Co. v. Nicholson, 25 W. R. 71, 1 Ex. D. 428. Bartholomay Brewing Co. v. Wyatt has been overruled by San Paulo (Brazilian) Railway Co. v. Carter, 44 W. R. 336, [1896] A. C. 31, as Wright, J., pointed out in Apthorpe v. Peter Schoenhofen Brewing Co. The Bartholomay case is inconsistent with a series of previous decisions: Imperial Continental Gas Association v. Nicholson, 37 L. T. Rep. 717, 1 Tax Cas. 138, 26 W. R. Dig. 102; London Bank of Mexico and South America v. Apthorpe, 39 W. R. 564, [1891] 2 Q. B. 378; Denver Hotel Co. v. Andrews, 43 W. R. 339, 3 Tax Cas. 356; Norwich Union Fire Insurance Co. v. Magee, 44 W. R. 384, 3 Tax Cas. 457; Grove v. Elliots, 3 Tax Cas. 481.

Bremner, in reply.—The decisions in the series of cases referred to do not go beyond the decision of the House of Lords in the San Paulo case. In those cases there was only one company, viz., an English company, and the business abroad was carried on by their agents or managers; here there is an independent American company, and the English company are merely shareholders in it.

WILLS, J.—I have come to a clear conclusion that the Crown is entitled to judgment in this case. I am well aware that if the American law as to companies is the same as our own we must treat this American association as subject to the same principles of law as those which affect our companies here. There is no evidence before us that the American courts take the same view as to the position of companies as was taken by the House of Lords in the case as to a "one-man company": Salomon v. Salomon & Co., 45 W. R. 193, [1897] A. C. 22; but I will assume for the purposes of my judgment that this is so, and that in American law as in our own a company is a separate entity, distinct from the shareholders which form it. It is no doubt true, as Mr. Bremner has contended, that in theory the business of this American association is carried on by the American directors and the English company have no legal power, no power which could be enforced in a court of law to order the American directors to do or abstain from doing any particular act. But clause (c) of the memorandum of association of the English company (which it is stated is in a form in common use) shows that there is a recognized way by which one company can in effect obtain power to manage the affairs of another company by acquiring all or practically all the shares in that other company. In that way, although the foreign company may not be theoretically or legally governed by the English company, the English company can and do control the business carried on by the foreign company. The business of the English company in this case is to manage the business of the American association in the interests of the shareholders in the English company. That that is the nature of the business carried on by them here in London it is impossible to doubt. If Mr. Bremner's argument represented the real state of things the English directors would have nothing to do except occasionally to send out someone to see how things were going on with the business in America; and to do this merely for the sake of gratifying their curiosity, for neither they nor the person whom they sent out would have any power to act with respect to the American business; yet these English directors divide between them a large sum annually as remuneration for their services. That fact shows that there is something more to be done by the English directors.

My decision does not merely depend on the description of the business of the appellant company as set out in their memorandum of association. The substance of the matter must be looked at. I do not propose to discuss the question whether the English company can be said to be carrying on the business of the American association. If the substance be looked at, and not mere machinery only, there is a good deal to be said in favour of the larger view that the English company is doing through the American company the business which is done in America. I do not, however, found my judgment on that larger ground, though there is much in the reports and accounts to support that view.

The previous decisions which have been referred to are not of much assistance to me; the question is really one of fact, and the circumstances of the cases differ. Most of the cases cited differ from this case in that one company only was concerned; but that does not apply to the Cesena case, in which there was an Italian company. The case of Bartholomay Brewing Co. v. Wyatt I do not pause to consider, for my brother Wright (who was a party to that decision) has himself said that the effect of that case has been destroyed by the decision of the House of Lords in San Paulo (Brazilian) Railway Co. v. Carter. On the question of fact submitted to me here I am of opinion that the appellant company were effectively carrying on business in America, and that they did this by acquiring a preponderating influence in the American association. The possession of the shares in the American association enabled them to do what their memorandum of association states to be one of their objects—they managed the affairs of the American association by acquiring practically all the shares in it. For these reasons I think that the Crown is entitled to judgment.

BRUCE, J.—I agree. I should have felt that some difficulty was occasioned by the Bartholomay case if my brother Wright had not said that his decision there was gone. Looking at the matter from a practical business point of view I am satisfied that these American directors are not carrying on their business independently of the English company. The head and seat and power of the business are with appellant company here, and the American company were practically the agents of the English company.

DILWORTH AND OTHERS v. THE COMMISSIONER FOR LAND AND INCOME TAX.

DILWORTH v. THE COMMISSIONER OF STAMPS. (a.)

Charity—Institution for education—Church of England—Beneficiaries to be brought up in a particular religion—Beneficiaries from another country—Deceased Persons Estates Duties Act, 1881 (New Zealand), Exemption Act, 1883—Land and Income Assessment Act, 1891 (New Zealand), Exemption Act, 1892.

A testator, who died in 1894, bequeathed the residue of his estate, both real and personal, to trustees for the purpose of founding and endowing an institution for the maintenance and education of boys who were orphans, or the sons of persons in straitened circumstances, resident in the provincial district of Auckland, or in the province of Ulster, Ireland; and the institution was to be managed by persons of a particular religion, and the inmates were to be brought up and instructed in that religion.

Held to be a charitable devise or bequest, and a "public" institution within the New Zealand Estates Duties Exemption Act, 1883;

Also, as to the land devised, that the institution was "carried on for charitable purposes" within the New Zealand Land and Income Tax Exemption Act, 1892.

These were two appeals from the Court of Appeal, New Zealand, and involved the consideration of several points bearing upon the general law of charitable gifts.

The facts are given at length in the judgment of their lordships. The sections of the various statutes bearing upon the matter are also set out therein.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the appellants.

Haldane, Q.C., and Rowden, for the respondents.

The judgment of their lordships (Lords WATSON, HOBHOUSE, and DAVEY) was delivered by Lord WATSON.—The appellants, in both these cases, are the testamentary trustees and executors of the late James Dilworth, of Remuera, near Auckland, in the colony of New Zealand, who died on the 23rd day of December, 1894. Before the commencement of either of the suits in which these appeals are taken, the appellants had obtained probate and had carried out the whole directions of the testator, with the single exception of his instructions with regard to disposal of the residue of his estate, real and personal.

The testator, after making due provision for all persons whom he conceived to have a moral claim upon him, declared his intention of establishing an institution, to be called the Dilworth Ulster Institute, with the object of affording to boys of the classes thereinafter mentioned such maintenance, education, and training as would enable them to become good and useful members of society; and for that purpose he bequeathed to the appellants the whole of the residue of his real and personal estate which he had power to dispose of by will. At the time of the testator's death, the residue of his trust estate, both real and personal, was certified by the Commissioner of Stamps to be of the value of £100,655 2s. 3d.

The testator directed the appellants to reserve not less than twenty-five acres of his land at Remuera, known as Graham's Hill, for the purpose of erecting suitable buildings for the Dilworth Ulster Institute; and also, in the event of their resolving to establish an industrial branch of the institute at Waitakerei, to reserve sufficient land for that purpose. Instructions were given to the appellants, that, in order to prevent the net income derivable from the residue falling below the sum of £5,000 per annum, they should accumulate and invest such sum of money as they might think necessary before proceeding to erect any buildings for the purposes of the institute. And they were directed that, whenever the net income of the residue amounted to not less than £5,000 per annum, and the money in their hands amounted to not less than £10,000 over and above any sums which they had invested for the purpose of securing the net income of £5,000, they should proceed to erect a substantial building upon the testator's lands at Auckland known as Graham's Hill.

The testator further directed that, as soon as the buildings at Auckland were completed, and all liabilities incurred in the erection thereof discharged, the appellants should select so many boys of sound bodily and mental health, being orphans or sons of persons of good character and of any race, as in the opinion of the appellants that portion of the income available for the purpose will be sufficient from time to time to support, train, and educate. All boys selected must be either destitute orphans or the children of persons in straitened circumstances resident in the provincial district of Auckland or in the province of Ulster in Ireland; and, ceteris paribus, a preference is to be given to boys resident in or near the town of Dungannon in the province of Ulster. Boys selected from the provincial district of Auckland must not be under three nor above five years of age, and those selected in the province of Ulster must be between five and eight years of age. The Ulster boys are to be selected by the minister for the time being of a church in Dungannon in connection with the General Synod of the Anglican Church called the Church of Ireland, and failing his nomination by the appellants themselves. Provision is made for supplying the Ulster boys with an outfit, and forwarding them to the Dilworth Ulster Institute at Auckland. No pupil is to remain in the institute after he has attained the age of fifteen, but in the case of pupils distinguished by their industry and natural talents, the appellants are empowered to make arrangements for their maintenance and the prosecution of their studies at any university in New Zealand, or in Dublin, or in or near the city of Belfast in Ireland, and to allow such pupils in the meantime to remain resident in the institute.

All boys selected as pupils of the institute are to be maintained in the buildings of the institute, are to be clothed in a suitable uniform dress, are to be brought up and educated in the tenets of the Church of the Province of New Zealand commonly called the Church of England, and are to be instructed in such branches of learning and industry as shall be considered likely to make them good and useful members of society. It is expressly declared that no person shall be appointed chaplain, secretary, master, teacher, or other officer of the institute until he shall have signed a declaration that he is a member of the Church of the Province of New Zealand commonly called the Church of England, and that he accepts and maintains the principles of the Reformation accomplished in the Church of England in the sixteenth century of the Christian era.

The appellants have hitherto been accumulating the income of the residue, in accordance with the directions of the testator; and they have not yet commenced to erect the buildings of the Dilworth Ulster Institute.

So far as hitherto stated, the facts are common to both appeals; but the questions raised by these appeals depend upon the construction of different Acts of the Legislature of New Zealand, and must now be separately considered.

FIRST APPEAL.

Under the provisions of the Deceased Persons Estates Duties Act, 1881, the Commissioner of Stamps for the Colony, who is the respondent in this appeal, assessed the death duty payable by the appellants in respect of the residue of the testator's estate at the sum of £12,735 13s. 6d. The appellants declined to pay, upon the ground that they were exempted from liability by the Charitable Gifts Duties Exemption Act, 1883; but the respondent held that they were not entitled to exemption, inasmuch as the bequest to the Ulster Institute is a gift to a sect or class, and is not a devise or bequest to a public institution, or a charitable bequest within the meaning of the Act. A case was accordingly prepared for the opinion of the Supreme Court of the Colony. The questions submitted to the court were:

1. Is the bequest to the Dilworth Ulster Institute so made as aforesaid exempt from the payment of duty chargeable under the Deceased Persons Estates Duties Act, 1881, and its amendments?

2. What refund of duty (if any) are the said executors entitled to demand in respect of said assessment?

The case was first heard before Connolly, J., who, on the 18th of December, 1895, answered both these questions in the negative. On the 27th of April, 1896, his judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeal, who unanimously held that the testator's bequest of residue did not come within the exemption provided by the Act of 1883.

The controversy between the parties turns upon the construction of two clauses in "The Charitable Gifts Duties Exemption Act, 1883," which are in these terms:

Section 2.—"In this Act, the term 'charitable purposes' includes devises, bequests, and legacies of real or personal property respectively of whatever description to public institutions such as libraries, museums, institutions for the promotion of science and art, colleges and schools, or to hospitals, orphan, lunatic, or benevolent asylums, dispensaries."

Section 3.—"Notwithstanding anything contained in 'The Deceased Persons Estates Duties Act, 1881,' or any other Act of a like character, no duty whatsoever shall be payable in respect of any charitable devise or bequest."

These two clauses form the substance of the exempting Act of 1883, which contains only four sections. Section 1 relates to the short title of the Act, and section 4 to the date on and after which its provisions were to be operative.

Section 3, which enacts exemption from the duty imposed by the Deceased Persons Estates Act, 1881, or by any Act of a like character, is expressed in very wide and general terms. It provides that no duty whatsoever shall be payable "in respect of any charitable devise or bequest." The only test of immunity required by that enactment, when considered per se, is that the devise or bequest shall be of a "charitable" nature. It does not appear to their lordships to admit of reasonable doubt that the gift of residue to the Ulster Institute is charitable, in the popular sense of that word. It provides for the maintenance and education of boys who are orphans, or the sons of parents who are in straitened circumstances; and it does not, in their lordships' opinion, derogate from the charitable nature of the gift, that the institution is to be managed by persons of a particular religious persuasion, or that its inmates are to be instructed in the tenets of the same sect.

But, in the argument addressed to their lordships, a question was raised in regard to the true legal construction of section 2, and to what extent, if any, its provisions qualify the enactments of the succeeding clause. Section 2 is, beyond all question, an interpretation clause, and must have been intended by the Legislature to be taken into account in construing the expression "charitable devise or bequest," as it occurs in section 3. It is not said in terms that "charitable bequest" shall mean one or other of the things which are enumerated, but that it shall "include" them. The word "include" is very generally used in interpretation clauses in order to enlarge the meaning of words or phrases occurring in the body of the statute; and when it is so used these words or phrases must be construed as comprehending, not only such things as they signify according to their natural import, but also those things which the interpretation clause declares that they shall include. But the word "include" is susceptible of another construction, which may become imperative, if the context of the Act is sufficient to show that it was not merely employed for the purpose of adding to the natural significance of the words or expressions defined. It may be equivalent to "mean and include," and in that case it may afford an exhaustive explanation of the meaning which, for the purposes of the Act, must invariably be attached to these words or expressions.

Their lordships have come to the conclusion that it is not necessary for the decision of this appeal to determine in which of these senses the word "include" is used in section 3. They are willing to assume, and will accordingly assume that the word was meant to introduce an exhaustive definition, and that the provisions of that clause must govern the meaning of the words "any charitable devise or bequest" which are the subjects of direct exemption in section 3. The objects defined in section 2 are charitable in the legal sense of the word; but they do not comprehend all of the objects which would naturally fall under the general definition of "charitable."

Upon the assumption now made, the crucial question in this appeal comes to be—whether the gift of residue to the Ulster Institute is a charitable bequest within the meaning of the second section of the Act of 1883?

The second section enumerates two classes of institutions, a legacy or devise of real or personal property in whose favour will constitute a charitable bequest not chargeable under the Death Duties Act of 1881. The first class of objects must be of a public and not a private character, and consist of "public institutions such as libraries, museums, institutions for the promotion of science and art, colleges and schools." The second class of objects is introduced by the alternative "or," and consists of "hospitals, orphan, lunatic, or benevolent asylums, dispensaries." The word public, which characterizes all the objects of the first class, is not repeated in or connected with the second class; and it appears to their lordships that it was not meant to apply to any of the objects enumerated in that class.

In considering whether the Ulster Institute is within the second class of objects enumerated in section 2, their lordships therefore think it is immaterial whether the institution, when duly completed and administered according to the testators' directions, will be public or private. One thing is tolerably certain, that it will not be a dispensary, the main purpose of which is the distribution of medicine. "Hospital" is a word of wider and more variable meaning, and primarily signifies a place built for the reception of the sick or the support of the aged or infirm poor. It has been used in Great Britain, in some instances, to denote an institution in which poor children are fed and educated. But that is not the ordinary meaning of the word; and, in the present case it is necessary to compare it with the other expressions which occur in section 2. "Schools" are enumerated in the first class; and, if it were plain that the Ulster Institute, when in operation, will be a public school, there would be an end of the present question. On the other hand, if the institute will be a private school, and is so excluded from the first class, there can, in their lordships' opinion, be no presumption that it was meant to be included in the second class under the general description of an hospital. It would, in their opinion, require more definite language in order to produce that result. The word "asylum," which is the only other term of importance occurring in the second enumeration, is qualified by the expressions, which are used as adjectives, "orphan, lunatic, or benevolent." The word "asylum," according to its original derivation, and in its widest meaning, simply signifies a refuge, a place of retreat and security. In its English acceptation the word is most commonly used to denote an establishment for the detention and cure of persons suffering from mental disease, and also a place for the reception and up-bringing of destitute orphans. Although the word might be loosely applied to a night refuge for the homeless, or to any similar institution, there does not seem to be any warrant for describing the Ulster Institute as a "benevolent asylum." Then the institute has no relation to the insane; and the benefits which it confers are not confined to the children of deceased parents. The fact that some of its inmates are to be orphans will not impart to the institution generally the character of an orphan asylum.

It does not appear to their lordships to admit of doubt that the Ulster Institute is in its essential character a school for the education of boys between the ages of 3 and 15, and that it must at all events, be regarded as an institution of a similar nature to a college or school. But the right to exemption from death duty depends, in their view, upon the institute being a "public" institution within the meaning of the first branch of the enumeration in section 2. It was plainly the intention of the Legislature to exclude from the benefit of the exemption bequests to scholastic institutions which are not public, or in other words, which are of a private character; but the context of the Act does not define, and affords no means of determining what, according to the general understanding of the colony, constitutes the essential difference between a public and a private school. As these words are used in England, there would be no difficulty in pointing out some schools which are public, and others which are unmistakably private; but it might be troublesome to explain the reason why some schools are called public, whilst others not very different in their character and circumstances are known as private. It is in regard to the latter class that the difficulty arises of correct description, such as occurs here.

Schools founded or maintained by the community, and managed by its representatives, are clearly public, while schools conducted by individuals, for their own emolument, are as clearly private. All schools, whether public or private in the strictest sense of the words, which have a reasonably large attendance of scholars, have one feature in common. They give instruction to the public, or in other words to the children of different sections of the public; and the character of the school, as public or private, must depend not upon the scholars to whom education is given, but upon the terms on which and the circumstances in which education is given.

The Ulster Institute is designed to give free maintenance, clothing, and education to the children of a certain section of the public whose parents are resident in the colony of New Zealand. In their lordships' opinion the character of the institution is not materially altered either by the circumstance that the remainder of the beneficiaries are to be selected in another country, and thence conveyed to the institute at Auckland, or by the circumstance that all of the beneficiaries are to be educated according to the religious tenets of a particular church. If the institute be, within the meaning of the Act of 1883, a public institution, such as a school, there is no provision in that Act which can deprive it of the benefit of the exemption in respect of either of these circumstances.

Their lordships have come to the conclusion, not without hesitation, owing to the view taken by the courts below, that the Ulster Institute, as designed by its founder, does answer the description of a public institution, such as a school.

It appears to them that, if the testator had directed his trustees forthwith to hand over the administration and management of the Ulster Institute to a public body in New Zealand, or if he had made his bequest directly to such public body for the same purposes, the institute would necessarily have been regarded as a public and not as a private institution. What he has directed to be done is in substance the same thing. His trustees to whom he has delegated the duty of building the institute and of superintending its administration, are his trustees in this sense only that he appointed them. They have no personal interest in the residue, which they hold only for behoof of those children, members of the public, whom he has directed them from time to time to select as the beneficiaries under the trust. The bequest is an educational endowment in perpetuity, and the beneficial interest in it is not vested in any private person, but belongs inalienably to the public. Such being the character of the charity founded by the testator, their lordships do not think that the inmates of the Dilworth Ulster Institute could with propriety be described as the recipients of private education.

SECOND APPEAL.

In this case the appellants complain of an assessment of £557 9s. 8d., imposed by the respondent, who is Commissioner of the Colony for Land and Income Tax, upon the income and profits of the land and personalty forming the residue of the testator's estate, during the year 1895-96. The assessment was made under "The Land and Income Assessment Act, 1891," which repealed the provisions of "The Property Assessment Act, 1885," and it was objected to by the appellants upon the ground that the income derived by them from the residue was expressly exempted from duty by section 16 of the Act of 1891. The respondent disallowed the objection; and a special case was stated by the parties for the opinion of the Court of Appeal, in which the only question submitted was, in substance: Whether the appellants, as trustees of Mr. Dilworth's will, are liable to pay to the respondent "Land Tax upon the lands vested in them as aforesaid?" The case does not raise any question as to income arising from estate other than lands. It was heard before the Court of Appeal, who, on the 29th of October, 1896, unanimously answered the question submitted to them in the affirmative, and gave the respondent judgment for the amount of duty which he claimed.

In the case lodged by them with a view to this appeal, the appellants rely upon a clause in "The Land and Income Assessment Act Amendment Act, 1892," creating additional exemption, which is in the following terms: "Section 3 (4).—All mortgages held, and all income received or derived by or on behalf of any public charitable institution, whether formed under 'The Hospitals and Charitable Institutions Act, 1885,' or any other Act for the time being in force, or howsoever formed, if carried on for any public charitable purpose, and not for any gain or profit." Their lordships are of opinion that these provisions, whatever be their effect, must be taken into account in construing the principal Act of 1891; because the assessment in question was imposed in virtue of that Act, as amended by the statute of 1892.

The enactments with respect to exemption from duty, in so far as they have any bearing upon the present case, are contained in sub-section 1 of section 16 of the principal Act, which is in these terms:

"16. Land owned and income derived or received, as hereinafter mentioned, shall be exempt from taxation under this Act, subject, however, to the provisions hereof:

"(1) All land owned by any person or body, corporate or unincorporate, and used or occupied by such person or body solely for any of the purposes hereinafter mentioned:

"(a) A place of worship or a place of residence for the clergy or ministers of any religious body.

"(b) And public school established under 'The Education Act, 1877,' and all lands and buildings used for any school which is not carried on exclusively for pecuniary gain or profit, but so that not more than fifteen acres be used or occupied for the purposes of any one such school.

"(c) The site of any university, or college or school, incorporate by any Act or Ordinance, or the site of a public library, athenæum, or mechanics institute, or any public museum, or any school of mines.

"(d) A public cemetery or burial-ground.

"(e) The ground or place of meeting for any agricultural society being the property of the society.

"(f) A place of meeting for the purposes of a friendly society, or of a masonic lodge, or of any building society registered under the Acts in force relating to building societies.

"(g) Public charitable institutions constituted under 'The Hospitals and Charitable Institutions Act, 1885,' and charitable institutions not carried on for gain or profit.

"(h) Public gardens, domains, or recreation or other public reserves not occupied by a tenant, and all public roads or streets.

"(i) Owned and occupied by Maoris only, and not leased to or occupied by any person other than the Maori owner.

"(j) Any public railway, including the land occupied and used as permanent way, and for yards, stations, sheds, and all buildings used for the purposes of traffic only, but not further or otherwise.

"No lands vested in Her Majesty or in the New Zealand Railway Commissioner, nor any land vested in any corporate or other body for the purposes of, or in relation to, local self-government, or for any educational or public charitable purpose, shall be liable to taxation under this Act, except when there is a tenant or occupier liable to pay such tax."

The sub-section which has just been quoted creates certain exemptions from the taxability of lands and buildings. Its sub-sub-sections, which are denoted alphabetically, only exempt such lands or buildings as are actually used or occupied for one or other of the purposes therein specified. Thus, in the case of any school which is not carried on exclusively for pecuniary gain or profit (g), or of a charitable institution not carried on for gain or profit (g), the exemption obviously has no application, except to an institution which has been erected and is in actual operation. It is therefore unnecessary to consider whether, if the Ulster Institute had been completed according to the testator's directions, exemption could have been claimed for it under one or other of these heads. In that case the claim would not have extended beyond the building and its site; and if it were held to be a school within the meaning of sub-sub-section (b), not more than 15 acres used and occupied for the purposes of the institute would be entitled to exemption.

The concluding enactments of sub-section (1) have a much wider scope. They expressly exempt lands vested in the Crown, and all lands vested in any corporate or other body for the purposes of, or in relation to, "local self-government, or for any public educational or public charitable purpose." The trustees of the late Mr. Dilworth, although not a public body, are within the alternative of "any other body," and they are vested for certain purposes with the residue of his real and personal estate. The only question which arises under this part of the sub-section is whether the appellants are vested with the residue, so far as consisting of lands, either for a public educational purpose or for a public charitable purpose. It would be difficult to arrive at the conclusion that an institution like the Ulster Institute, which is unquestionably in the nature of a charity, would not serve any public charitable purpose, seeing that the objects of the charity, who are to be selected from the public, have a vested beneficial interest in perpetuity. And if it were held to be in its character a public charity, the real estate forming part of the residue would be exempted from taxation, although it has not yet been applied to the objects for which it is held by the appellants.

Section 3 of the Amendment Act of 1892, which is incorporated with and must be read as part of the principal Act, appears to their lordships to be sufficient to entitle the appellants to the exemption which they claim in this appeal. They are not incorporated under "The Hospitals and Charitable Institutions Act, 1885," or under any other Act; but the exemption extends to the income derived or received by any and every other body, whether corporate or not, which performs the same charitable function toward the public, "not for any gain or profit."

Their lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty, in both these cases, to reverse the judgment of the Supreme Court of New Zealand; in the first appeal, to declare that the appellants, as trustees of the will of the testator, are not liable to pay to the respondent death duty upon the real and personal estate vested in them as part of the residue of the testator's estate; to remit to the court below to determine what refund of duty (if any) the appellants are entitled to demand and receive from the respondent, the Commissioner of Stamps; and, in the second appeal, to answer the question submitted by the special case in the negative. In each case the respondent must pay to the appellants their costs of the appeal.

FIELD STEAMSHIP CO. (LIMITED) v. BURR. (a.)

Insurance—Marine—Policy on ship—Cargo rendered worthless by sea peril—Cost of discharging cargo—Liability of underwriters on ship.

A ship, while insured by a time policy on hull and machinery against perils of the sea and all other perils which might come to her hurt, detriment, or damage, was injured by collision. She was carrying a cargo of cotton seed, which was so damaged by sea water and mud in consequence of the collision that it became rotten and worthless, and the consignees refused to accept it.

Held, that the shipowners were not entitled to recover from their underwriters the cost of discharging the worthless cargo at the port of destination.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Judgment of Bigham, J., 46 W. R. 490, [1898] 1 Q. B. 821, affirmed.

Appeal from the judgment of Bigham, J., at the trial of an action without a jury, 46 W. R. 490, [1898] 1 Q. B. 821.

The action was brought by the owners of the steamship Elmfield to recover a partial loss under a time policy of marine insurance subscribed by the defendant.

The policy was "on hull and materials, on machinery and boilers" of the steamship Elmfield, valued at £10,000; and the perils insured against were, amongst others, "of the seas . . . and all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the said ship, &c., or any part thereof."

During the currency of the policy the vessel was carrying a cargo of cotton seed on a voyage from Alexandria to London under a charter-party. On the 20th of December, 1896, she arrived in the Thames, when a vessel called The Derwent came into collision with her, and caused such serious damage to her hull below the water-line that it became necessary to run her ashore in order to prevent her from sinking in deep water. During the next ten days part of her cargo was put into lighters, and by this means she was sufficiently lightened to enable her to be towed to the Tilbury Dry Dock, where she was temporarily patched. On the 5th of January, 1897, she was towed to Millwall Dock, where it was intended that the remainder of her cargo should be discharged. It was found, however, that, by the action of the water and mud which had found their way into the ship in consequence of the casualty, the cargo had become rotten and offensive, and was a nuisance; and thereupon the sanitary authorities, acting under the powers of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, ordered the ship to abate the nuisance and to remove the cotton seed. In the meantime the owners of the cargo had abandoned the cargo to their underwriters, and neither the cargo owners nor their underwriters would pay freight or take delivery, alleging, as the fact was, that the cargo had ceased to be cotton seed and had become worthless.

In these circumstances the plaintiffs made a contract with a firm of Samuel Williams & Sons, who were the owners of a pier at Dagenham, near the mouth of the river, to discharge the cargo and to spread it out on some land at a short distance from the pier at a charge of 5s. per ton, and so to get rid of it. The ship accordingly left the Millwall Dock for Dagenham Pier, and the cargo was there discharged by Samuel Williams & Sons.

The plaintiffs made a claim against the defendant and his co-underwriters under the policy, and the whole of the claim was settled except as to items amounting to £1,046 12s. 10d. These items consisted of (1) £287 2s. 10d., charges incurred in dealing with the cargo betwen the date of the casualty and its arrival at Dagenham; and (2) £759 10s., the charges of Messrs. Williams for discharging and disposing of the cargo at Dagenham.

Bigham, J., held that the expense incurred by the plaintiffs in meeting these charges was not covered by the policy, and gave judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Lewis Noad, for the plaintiffs.

Carver, Q.C, and Scrutton, for the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 8.—A. L. SMITH, L.J., read the following judgment: The facts of this case will be found in the judgment of my brother Bigham, and the question which arises thereout is whether a shipowner insured under a policy of marine insurance covering hull and machinery against perils of the sea is entitled, in the case of damage to hull and machinery by a sea peril, to recover from his underwriters the cost of discharging the cargo, which has become putrid by reason of a sea peril and is rightly refused by the consignee at the port of discharge, in addition to the damage occasioned to the hull and machinery by the sea peril. I have found from experience in cases of marine insurance that a case which is in itself tolerably clear is often obscured by the putting by the learned counsel of numerous instances said to be analogous, and which upon their face are somewhat similar to, but are not when understood, the case in hand; and, in my opinion, unless the case is concluded by authority, the best and safest way to arrive at a true decision as to what is recoverable under a policy of marine insurance is to ascertain, in the first place what constitutes the subject-matter of the insurance, and next against what perils that subject-matter is insured. When this is arrived at, what is covered—that is, what is recoverable under the policy—will be understood. Now, in this case the subject-matter of the insurance is clear; it is hull and machinery, and nothing else. The peril against which this subject-matter is insured is also clear; it is the deterioration occasioned to the hull and machinery by perils of the sea Having got thus far, it follows that to constitute a claim upon a marine policy covering hull and machinery against sea perils the assured must establish a deterioration to the hull and machinery by a sea peril, and this, when established, the underwriter of hull and machinery is liable to make good to the assured. This is the underwriter's sole liability, and so far I apprehend this cannot be disputed. Now, if the underwriter has paid every farthing's worth of deterioration of the hull and machinery occasioned by the sea peril—for this is the measure of the shipowner's loss—(see Stewart v. Steele, 5 Scott N. R. 927, and Pitman v. Universal Marine Insurance Co., 30 W. R. 906, 9 Q. B. D. 192)—what is to take place? What further claim has the shipowner against the underwriter under a policy upon hull and machinery after all this has been made good to him? This is the question in this case. The answer, which seems to me spontaneously to arise, is that the shipowner has no further claim, and this is the judgment of my brother Bigham now under appeal. The above is how this case appears to me to stand unencumbered by hypothetical cases which were put forward in argument. As to authorities, there certainly are none to the contrary, and what authorities there are are in favour of what I am saying, and will be found in the judgment of Bigham, J.

Notwithstanding this, it is now argued for the shipowner, who has been paid every farthing's worth of deterioration brought about by the sea peril to the hull and machinery of his ship by the underwriter thereof, that, inasmuch as by the sea peril the cargo became putrid and in such a state that the consignee at the port of discharge was not bound to accept it, and the shipowner has thereby lost his freight, he can recover the expenses of discharging this putrid cargo from the underwriters of hull and machinery, and it is said that this is so because the discharge of the putrid cargo was made, not in order to deliver it to the consignee, but to enable the repairs to be done to the injured hull and machinery, and that this expense consequently forms part of the deterioration occasioned to the hull and machinery, by the sea peril. The validity of this argument I have been unable to appreciate, and in my judgment it is wholly unfounded. Whether the cargo be sound, or partially damaged, or putrid, it has to be discharged at the port of destination by the shipowner, if it is to be got out of the ship at all. With this the underwriter of hull and machinery has nothing to do. Whether the cargo be such that the consignee was bound to receive it or not is, in my opinion, as regards the liability of an underwriter upon hull and machinery, wholly immaterial. What has he to do with it? I am not dealing with a case of jettison; that has nothing to do with this case. If loss is occasioned by delay in the discharge of cargo, whether sound, unsound, or putrid, at the port of destination, this is not damage to hull and machinery, and the loss must be covered, if covered at all, by one of those policies which cover losses which are not undertaken by underwriters upon a policy upon hull and machinery, or possibly by a policy upon freight. A delay occasioned by discharging cargo is not, as before stated, a deprivation of the use of the hull and machinery to the owner by reason of an injury to the subject-matter insured, and forms no part of the deterioration to hull and machinery for which an underwriter upon hull and machinery is alone liable, and a fortiori the mere extra expense of getting out the cargo is no part of his liability. Take a case where the hull and machinery is not damaged by a sea peril but the cargo is. What liability in these circumstances is the underwriter upon hull and machinery under? What has he to do at the port of destination with the cargo or the discharge of it, or who takes it, or where it is taken to, or the time it takes to discharge it, or what the discharge costs the shipowner, or whether it be the shipowner's cargo or someone else's, or whether it be sound or putrid? Surely nothing. An underwriter upon hull and machinery has nothing to do with the cargo on board, even if that cargo belongs to the shipowner himself: see Arnould on Insurance (2nd ed.), p. 267. So, again, take the case where both the hull and machinery and the cargo are damaged by a peril of the sea. What liability in these circumstances is the underwriter upon hull and machinery under after he has made good to the shipowner the whole deterioration to the hull and machinery of his ship by reason of the sea peril? What has he to do with the cargo or its discharge? Now take the present case, where the hull and machinery is deteriorated by a sea peril, and where the cargo is so deteriorated by a sea peril as to become putrid and in such a state as to justify the consignee in refusing to receive it. How does this affect the underwriter upon hull and machinery, though it was strenuously argued that it did? The underwriter upon hull and machinery cares nothing, and legitimately cares nothing, as to what becomes of the cargo, whether sound, damaged, or putrid. All this is wholly immaterial to him. All he has to do under his contract is to make good to the assured shipowner the deterioration occasioned to the hull and machinery of his ship by a sea peril and nothing more. It was suggested in argument, though no authorities were cited to support the suggestions, nor, as far as I know, do any exist—(1) that the cost of removing sand or gravel or mud washed into a ship by a sea peril did or might fall upon underwriters of hull and machinery; (2) that the cost of removing ballast fell or might fall upon the underwriter upon hull and machinery. I give no opinions as to either of these suggestions, but I will say that I am by no means convinced that they are correct, and when they come up for decision I will endeavour to decide them; it is sufficient to say that neither of these suggested cases is the present case, which relates solely to the cost of removal of a putrid cargo at the port of destination.

It was then said that the cost of removing cargo at a port of refuge in order to repair damage to hull and machinery fell upon the underwriter of hull and machinery. This may be so, but I do say that such a case at a port of refuge is certainly not a case of removing cargo at a port of destination, and different considerations obviously arise thereon. It was further argued that the shipowner might at any rate recover the extra if not the whole of the cost of removal occasioned by the cargo being putrid from the underwriter of hull and machinery. Why so? What I have already said in my opinion covers this point. To accentuate this, I will take for instance the case of a cargo of cement in bags solidified by a sea peril so as to become stone and thus to cost more to discharge than otherwise would be the case. If by the solidification the cement got affixed to the hull or machinery, so that either the hull or machinery became damaged, I can understand the argument that for this damage the underwriter upon hull and machinery might have to pay, but for the mere extra cost of removal of the cargo at the port of destination, with which removal the underwriter upon hull and machinery has nothing to do, in my opinion the underwriter upon hull and machinery is not liable. This cost forms no part of any deterioration to the subject-matter of the insurance—viz., the hull and machinery, any more than damages an assured upon hull and machinery may have to pay the owner of a ship with whose ship the ship of the assured has come into collision. I am of opinion that the judgment of Bigham, J., is correct, and that this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

CHITTY, L.J., read the following judgment: I am of the same opinion. In the decision of this case the subject-matter of the insurance ought to be kept steadily in view. The thing insured was the ship and the machinery. For all damage sustained by the hull and the machinery the underwriters have made full compensation to the plaintiffs. They have thus indemnified the assured against all loss and damage occasioned to the thing assured by the perils of the sea. But the appellants insist that the measure of the indemnity to which they are entitled under the policy is not thereby satisfied. They claim to be recouped the expense they have incurred in getting rid of that which was cargo, but had become a putrid mass by the action of the sea-water on the cotton seed.

I think that the true question is, How much has the thing insured been deteriorated by the peril insured against? Counsel for the appellants, in his excellent argument, suggested the case of a ship damaged by sea perils putting into a port of refuge for repairs, and he argued that in such a case, if the cargo had to be removed in order to get at the damaged parts of the ship and to execute the necessary repairs, the underwriters would be chargeable with the reasonable expense of such removal. But this hypothetical case is clearly distinguishable from the present, and for this reason. The ship had arrived at her port of destination on the voyage she was then prosecuting. This is an important element in considering the plaintiffs' claim. Had the cargo arrived undamaged, the underwriters on the ship would have been clear of all liability in respect of its discharge from the ship. The cargo would have been taken out of the ship, and the ship left free and open for repairing the hull and machinery. Why, then, should the liability of the underwriters be increased by the circumstance that the cargo, which is entirely outside their policy, has ceased to be cargo in specie and become a stinking mass? They are not concerned with the cargo or with the stuff into which it has been transformed by the action of the sea-water. In so far as the ship itself and the machinery have been deteriorated by the action of the rotten cotton seed, the deterioration has been made good by the underwriters. Among the many hypothetical cases suggested during the argument was that of a cargo of cement powder in bags becoming consolidated into a hard mass by the action of sea-water passing through a hole in the ship's bottom. It may well be that in such a case as that the underwriters would be liable for the expense of clearing the inside of the ship from the cement adhering to it, for that could be reasonably regarded as a damage to the structure of the ship. But as regards the expense of clearing away the rest of the cement at the port of destination, that would merely present the question on the appeal in another form. The position taken up by counsel for the respondents seems to me to be sound. They said that the basis of the appellants' claim when examined was the expense sustained by the assured, not as owners of the structure of the ship, but as carriers.

The case has been so fully dealt with by Bigham, J., and A. L. Smith, L.J., and in the judgment of Collins, L.J., which I have had an opportunity of reading, that I think it unnecessary to pursue the matter further. My conclusion is that the appellants' claim, when properly understood, does not fall within the reasonable limits of the policy on which they sue.

COLLINS, L.J., read the following judgment: I am of the same opinion. It is not necessary to restate the facts. The sole point left for decision is whether the assured on hull and machinery can throw upon the underwriters the expense of discharging at the port of destination a cargo which, having become putrid by the action of the perils of the seas, has lost its identity, and in respect of which therefore no freight is payable by the consignee. The mere statement of the point would seem to carry its own answer. It is true that the ship was itself damaged, and likewise the machinery, by the peril which destroyed the cargo, but all this damage has been fully satisfied by the underwriters, and the right of the plaintiffs may, I think, be tested by considering what their position would have been if the sea-water had got access to and spoilt the cargo without physical damage to the hull. How can the presence of a putrid cargo in the ship be said to be a damage to the hull? The fabric of the ship is not injured by it. So far as it affects the ship at all, it is by interfering with its use until it is removed. But this is not damage to hull, which is the interest insured, but damage to the shipowner in his business as carrier. And though in the opinion of some writers it would be more scientific to regard a ship merely as a freight-earning instrument, and not as a fabric having a value of its own, and therefore to treat interference with its freight-earning capacity as a damage to ship instead of looking only to the physical injury to the fabric (see Lowndes on Insurance, par. 189, 18 and 158); yet this view has clearly not been adopted in our law. Damage by delay is clearly not damage to ship: Ibid., par. 126, citing De Vaux v. Salvador, 4 A. & E. 420, and Wilson v. Bank of Victoria, 15 W. R. 693, L. R. 2 Q. B. 203. That is the ground on which Fletcher v. Poole, 1 Park Ins. (8th ed.), 115; Eden v. Poole, Ibid. 117, 2 Marshall Ins. (3rd ed.), 730; and Robertson v. Ewer, 1 T. R. 127, were decided. "Here," says Buller, J., in the latter case, "the ship itself was safe, and the court only looks to the thing itself which is the subject of insurance; and the wages and provisions" (during the period of detention for repair of damage caused by sea perils) "are no part of the thing insured." Counsel for the appellants contended that the principle of those cases only applied when and because these charges are to be borne by the owner in return for his freight, and therefore cannot defeat the right of the plaintiffs in this case, as no freight is payable, and he cited passages in Arnould which seem to put those cases on that ground: see Arnould on Marine Insurance (5th ed.), pp. 755, 783, 842. But this argument is open to more than one answer. In the first place the right or loss of right to receive freight cannot alter the subject of insurance, which is not freight, but ship and machinery only. Secondly, the passages in Arnould rest only on the authority of the above cases, or of those which decide that ordinary expenses payable by the owner under the contract of affreightment at a port of refuge are not general average expenses, and none of these involve the proposition that such expenses, whether to be borne by the shipowner or not, would be recoverable on a policy on ship. And, lastly, the passages when examined, based as they are on the class of authorities I have mentioned, are, such of them as deal with the claim of owner against underwriter on ship, only explanatory of the fact that the interest affected by such losses is not the ship itself, but something else—viz., the adventure covered by the contract of affreightment. The others deal with average expenses, and to these such considerations are more directly applicable, but have no relation to the point now in discussion. I have pointed out that the subject-matter insured cannot vary with or depend upon the right to receive freight. If the expense—more or less—of discharging the cargo is outside the contract of insurance on hull when the owner retains the right to receive freight, it is equally outside it when he has lost such right. The right or loss of the right is each a possible incident of the contract of affreightment, which is a subject-matter quite outside the ship itself, and is not covered by a policy thereon, though the ship may be a factor in performing it. The inability to recover for loss incident to delay under a policy on ship is, I think, properly put on the ground taken in the cases I have referred to, but it may also be rested on the ground on which it was placed by Lord Denman in De Vaux v. Salvador—viz., that the sea peril cannot be regarded as the proximate cause of such a loss. "These losses," says Mr. Lowndes, "result not from the damage but from the delay incident to the damage." Here (on the hypothesis by which I am testing the plaintiff's case—viz., that of no physical damage to hull) the real sea damage was to the cargo, the incidental consequence is that the ship cannot be used again till the damaged cargo is removed, and the loss is therefore, on the same reasoning, not due to a sea peril as the causa proxima. I agree therefore with Bigham, J., that the claim here is analogous to the claim for expenses during detention, which were held in the cases cited to be irrecoverable under a policy on ship. Counsel for the appellants could cite no authority in support of their proposition that the presence of a putrid mass in the hull was in itself a damage thereto, but they stated that the presence of sand or mud washed in by a sea peril was in practice treated as such by the underwriters, and the cost of removing it paid for under a policy on ship. Of course such an expense might well be, and no doubt often is, properly recoverable under the sue and labour clause, with which we are not concerned in this case, as the ship was in perfect safety when the expense in question was incurred; and it is often the fact also that the practice of underwriters is not in conformity with the strict legal rights under the contract with which alone we are here concerned. If this practice should be drawn in question hereafter, it may become necessary to pronounce upon it, but I am certainly not prepared to hold on the strength of it that the presence in the hull of a cargo turned into manure by sea damage is of itself a damage thereto. Being of opinion that the presence of the rotten cargo was not in itself a damage to ship, it is not necessary to decide whether, being a damage to ship, it was to be referred to a peril of the sea as causa proxima. If the case is to be tried by this standard it might well be distinguishable from the illustration of sand washed in by the direct action of the sea, and it does not seem to me that the case is concluded by Montoya v. London Assurance Company, 6 Exch. 451. The ground of that decision was that the tobacco and the hides were to be treated as one entire cargo, injury to a part of which had spread to the whole. Thus the cargo as a whole was injured by the direct action of a peril of the sea. It is obvious that this reasoning does not necessarily cover the case of damage to hull arising out of damage to cargo by the action of the sea.

I conclude, therefore, that the presence of the rotten cotton seed in the hull being otherwise uninjured was not of itself a damage to hull. But it is said the hull was in fact injured, and the repairs could not be effected without removing the cargo, and the cost of its removal must therefore be part of the expense of the repairs. But all physical damage to hull and machinery has been actually paid for. The cost of repairs is not necessarily the measure of such damage (Stewart v. Steele, and Pitman v. Universal Marine Insurance Co.), and I do not think the cost of removing the cargo for the purpose of effecting them can, on the findings in this case, be treated as something payable over and above the sum paid for the physical damage to hull and machinery. But there is a broader ground on which it follows, from what I have already said, that the assured on hull cannot throw upon the underwriter the cost of removing the cargo at the port of destination. The cargo was put on board under the contract of affreightment. All the contingencies which might happen to the cargo were incidents of that contract. If the cargo had arrived in specie, freight could have been claimed for it, and the shipowner would have had to bear the expense of delivering it over the ship's rail. The cargo not having arrived in specie, freight cannot be claimed for it, and whatever the relative rights of the shipowner and the freighter or consignee may be in such case as to the delivery of the cargo, they are just as much incidents of the contract of affreightment as is the right to receive freight when the goods arrive ready to be delivered in specie. The insurer on ship has nothing to do with these matters. They concern the profit or loss on the venture covered by the contract of affreightment, which is quite outside the risk on hull and machinery. I am of opinion that the judgment of Bigham, J., was perfectly right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Infant—Guardianship—Mother sole surviving guardian—Re-marriage of mother—Appointment of additional guardian—Discretion of court—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886 (49 & 50 Vict. c. 27), s. 2.

By his will X. appointed his wife (during her widowhood) and his own father guardians of his infant son during his minority, and directed that, on the death of either of them, the survivor should be sole guardian. X. and his wife were both Protestants. X. died in 1886, and his father in 1890. In 1896 the widow married again, her second husband being a Roman Catholic, whilst she remained a Protestant, and the infant son was being brought up as a Protestant. In 1897 the infant's paternal grandmother, as his next friend, took out a summons asking that an uncle of the infant (the husband of a sister of X.) might be appointed to act jointly with the mother as guardian of the infant.

Held (dismissing the summons), that the mother of an infant had entirely new rights conferred upon her under the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886: she became statutory guardian under the Act, whether she was appointed testamentary guardian by her husband or not.

The court has power, in its discretion, to remove a guardian or to appoint another guardian to act jointly with the statutory guardian; but the court will not interfere except on good grounds shown to be clearly for the benefit of the infant.

Defendant's appeal from Kekewich, J.

By his will dated the 10th of March, 1886, X. appointed the defendant (his wife) during her widowhood and his father (since deceased) to be the guardians of his infant son, and gave directions as to the education of his son.

The testator bequeathed to his trustees his share and interest in a legacy of £50,000, and in a residue, and directed them to pay to his wife during widowhood a sum of £3,000 per annum, and subject to the annuity he left the legacy and share of residue to his infant son absolutely on attaining the age of twenty-five years. The surplus income to arise from the said sum of £50,000 and share of residue over and above the annunity was to be accumulated until his son attained the age of twenty-five years, or for such lesser period as the law would allow, after the testator's decease. The residue of his property he left to his son absolutely on attaining twenty-one, with full powers of maintenance.

The testator died on the 9th of April, 1886, and his will was proved on the 14th of April, 1887.

On the 2nd of June, 1896, the widow married again, her second husband being a Roman Catholic. The mother continued a Protestant, and the infant son was being brought up as a Protestant.

On the 9th of November, 1897, the grandmother of the infant as his next friend took out a summons asking for the appointment of an uncle of the infant by marriage as guardian during his minority to act jointly with the mother.

The rest of the facts sufficiently appear from the judgments.

Kekewich, J., made the order as prayed.

The defendant appealed.

Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C., Warrington, Q.C., and Howard Wright, for the appellant.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the respondent.

P. S. Stokes, for the trustees.

LINDLEY, M.R.—I do not think that the order made by Kekewich, J., can stand: it is made on erroneous principles. I think that I can see that he has been guided and convinced by Mr. Vaughan Hawkins' argument on behalf of the respondents and by attaching too much importance to the old practice (which was the practice within my knowledge) long before 1886.

The law as regards the rights of mothers as guardians has been revolutionized by the Act of 1886, and I cannot think that Kekewich, J., has fully appreciated the immense alteration which has been made by that Act of Parliament. In this case the father of the lad whose guardianship is in question made a will by which he appointed two gentlemen trustees; and his wife, during her widowhood, and his own father, guardians of his infant son; and he directed that on the death of either of them, the survivor should become and be the sole guardian. I doubt whether that does amount to an appointment of his wife, though she survived, as sole guardian after her widowhood. We have not had that discussed, but my impression upon the true construction of this will is that in the events which have happened—that is to say, when she married again—there was no guardian appointed by the testator. That is not all. He goes on in his will to state what he wishes as regards the future of his son, and he says: "In reference to the education of my son, I should wish him, at the age of nine, not later, earlier if possible, to go to a first-class private school (Cheam, or any other the guardians may think fit); at twelve, but not later than thirteen years old, to go to Eton College, to Mitchell's House if possible, and considered first-class by guardians, or, if not then in existence, to any other they (the guardians) may think fit; if possible then to go to University (Oxford), but if that is found not to be practical [sic] with his going into the foot guards (Grenadier Guards, if it can be arranged), is to be dispensed with"—that is, Oxford is to be dispensed with. "I consider, too, it is most important for him to get into the Brigade of Guards at as early an age as possible—if he cannot get a commission in the Grenadiers, I should choose next the Coldstreams, and if he cannot get a commission in them, then the Scots Guards." Therefore the father had a scheme for the education of his son which he indicates in the manner which I have read. He died in 1886, and everything went on, so far as I know, without any discussion or unpleasantness until June, 1896, when his widow married again; she married a gentleman who is a Roman Catholic, the father having been, and she and the son being, Protestants. Thereupon unpleasantness arose, and the grandmother thought it would be for the benefit of her grandchild that somebody should be associated with the mother in the guardianship of the boy; and and hence the litigation and the proceedings which we have to consider.

Now we must look at the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, which by section 2 says this: "On the death of the father of an infant, and in case the father shall have died prior to the passing of this Act, then from and after the passing of this Act the mother if surviving shall be the guardian of such infant, either alone when no guardian has been appointed by the father, or jointly with any guardian appointed by the father." That revolutionized the law as to the mother and gave her rights which were entirely new. Her legal position before as regards the guardianship of her children was most unfortunate and most cruel and unjust. The matter was brought to the attention of the Legislature, hence this statute which says that she is to be the guardian. In the events which have happened she is sole guardian, not by the appointment of her husband, but under the exigency of the statute. Then the section goes on: "When no guardian has been appointed by the father, or if the guardian or guardians appointed by the father is or are dead, or refuses or refuse to act, the court may, if it shall think fit, from time to time appoint a guardian or guardians to act jointly with the mother." That is to say, the mother is to be guardian; but, to use the language of the Act, the court may if it shall think fit from time to time appoint a a guardian or guardians to act jointly with the mother. Well, why should the court think fit to do anything without some sufficient reason? Why should it interfere at all? It is quite obvious that, although the surviving mother is made guardian by the Act of Parliament, there is nothing in the Act (quite apart from the words I have read) to control the power of the Court of Chancery, or now the Chancery Division, over all guardians and to remove her as well as anybody else who is guardian —even the father—for misconduct which justifies such an interference with the parental rights. But why should the court interfere? That is the strength of Sir Edward Clarke's argument. We have power to do it, but what are the principles upon which we ought to act in thinking fit to add somebody to the mother, whose rights are conferred upon her by the earlier part of the section? I say nothing in this case about personal misconduct because we have not to consider any such thing. Of course personal misconduct, if proved, would be ample ground for interfering. There can be no conceivable ground for our interfering except the benefit of the infant. That is the ground upon which the court always acts in considering these questions of guardianship—whether they arise between fathers or testamentary guardians or anybody else. What is the benefit of the infant? We have to look at that and look at that alone. Now, here it is that I think the learned judge went wrong. He was guided, I cannot help thinking, by the old practice which is summed up in the passage in Simpson on Infants which Mr. Vaughan Hawkins read, and it is repeated in another shape at p. 120, from which I will read it. After saying that in the case of the death of the father and there being no testamentary guardian the mother was guardian by nurture and had the right to the care and custody of her children, he says (this was the old practice): "She will not necessarily be superseded if she marry again, but the practice now is, if the mother marry again, to have a reference to appoint a new guardian." That is to say, that if under such circumstances the mother married again an inquiry was directed, if necessary, to see whether it was desirable that she should continue. But are we to introduce the old practice and pass it on to the new statutory enactment? I say no, not at all. I do not say that her marriage again goes for nothing. It may go for a good deal. If she had married some gentleman who might interfere with the boy and render it desirable that the boy should be removed from her influence, or anything of that kind, it might go for a good deal; but all you can say is that she has married again, and that her husband is of a different religion. When the boy is left alone and brought up properly why should the court interfere? I think that grounds must be shewn that, having regard to the real benefit of the infant, the court ought to interfere; and if no such ground is shewn it would be the duty of the court not to interfere. Those are the principles which appear to me to be sound and upon which we ought to act.

Now, if we look, as we ought, at the benefit of the infant, I take the affidavit of the trustee as showing conclusively that there is absolutely no ground for interfering at all. I am very much struck with the third paragraph of that affidavit which shows that after the mother had married—namely, on the 10th of May, 1897, an order was made by Kekewich, J., granting the trustees liberty to pay a certain sum for the maintenance and education of this child. That was done six months after she married. There is not a word there said about her, or any impropriety or any desirability for removing her. What has happened since? Nothing that I know of. We are sufficiently men of the world to see what is the unfortunate circumstance which has given rise to this litigation. I do not propose to say a word which will give the slightest offence to anybody. There is no imputation against the mother, absolutely none against the gentleman Kekewich, J., has appointed, and absolutely none against the other gentleman whom the mother would prefer to be associated with her, if anybody must be associated with her. But I proceed upon the ground that there are no sufficient reasons to justify the court in thinking fit to appoint anybody to interfere with the mother. There is a period of five years before this boy can possibly go into the army, and in the face of the affidavit to which I have referred, and especially the fifth paragraph, which Sir Edward Clarke read and to which I listened, there is no reason whatever to suppose that it will be in the slightest degree for the benefit of this infant that he should be interfered with at all, or that he should be associated with anybody except his mother as his legal guardian. She will have the benefit of the advice, I hope, of the boy's father's friends, and certainly from the trustees. I see no reason at all for interfering, and I think that on principle Kekewich, J., has made a mistake, and has not given full effect to the great alteration made by the Act of 1886.

I think, therefore, the appeal must be allowed, and that the summons asking for the appointment of a guardian must be dismissed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The case is fundamentally different from all those cases that preceded the Act of 1886, where the court was dealing with, say, a lady—mother or not, under the then unfortunate state of the law. All those cases must—I do not say absolutely—be put aside, but at any rate treated as not authorities for anything to be done under this Act.

Now, as far as I can judge from the different sections of the Act, the Legislature intended to place the husband and wife, with regard to the guardianship, practically in the same position. Whereas, previously, the husband had the exclusive right of appointing a testamentary guardian, the wife gets a co-ordinate right. He may appoint and she may appoint, and, if there is an appointment by each, both are guardians. If the case arises which has here arisen—that the wife—the mother of the infant—is alive, then the second section of the Act says in effect, if there is a guardian appointed by the father, she shall act jointly with that guardian, but if there is no guardian appointed by the father, then she shall act alone as guardian. That is the first point, subject to what follows. There is a statutory right, which is not to be taken away from her without good cause. It says nothing about her being married again; it says nothing, of course, about her having married a husband of a different religious faith; but it lays down as a general rule, applicable to all mothers—that is, married or not married at the time—that they, if there be no guardian appointed by the father, shall alone be guardian. That is in accordance with the whole course of legislation. We do not attach now so much importance to the fact that a lady is married as in former times we did. The idea that she is under the control of her husband—though of course it is still true and always will be true to a certain extent—has not been looked upon as a guiding idea to anything like the same extent that it was, and that accounts for the fact that it is not an unmarried mother, but a mother whether married or not, who is to have this privilege. Then, reading the section, I protest against the idea that one is to look at what was the state of things before this Act as to appointing a guardian, whether a mother or not, and when the mother had no right at all, and that one can bring in rules and to that extent repeal the Act—for it would be a repeal of the Act—by taking into consideration what the Court of Chancery did in different circumstances, and apply them to the state of things supposed by the Act—I do not think that that is in accordance with the true construction of the Act; and I think that wherever the court is called upon to exercise the judicial discretion which is given by this Act you must go upon the special circumstances of the case and not upon the general rule formerly existing, and exercise that discretion in accordance with what is thought best for the infant.

I think Kekewich, J., has gone too far in treating the prior doctrines of the court as applicable here. I concur with what has been said on both sides, and especially that there is no personal imputation upon any of these parties.

Considering all that, and not seeing anything special here, but rather thinking it would not be for the benefit of the infant to have two guardians with, it may and probably will be, conflicting policies, in my opinion, we ought not to interfere. I think it will be better for everyone that the state of things which is existing under the Act should not be interfered with.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I entirely agree, not only in the conclusion, but also in the view that has been taken as to the effect of the Act of Parliament upon the position of the wife in relation to guardianship.

But I wish to add two observations. One is that I do not think that a more responsible or difficult jurisdiction can have to be exercised by any judge than that which a judge has to exercise in respect of the guardianship of infants, and I am quite sure that it is not intended by the decision of this court to-day to depart one iota from the old rule as to not interfering with the discretion of the judge when he has exercised it in respect of this very responsible duty. If such discretion were to be interfered with, the performance of those duties would be almost impossible. But here I do not consider that we are interfering with the discretion of the learned judge. I consider that in this case the learned judge was obviously guided by the consideration that he thought that the old rules laid down in the older cases with regard to the guardianship by mothers of children ought to govern cases under this Act. In that principle of law we think that he was wrong; but I do not understand that there is any intention to depart in any degree from the old rule as to not interfering with the discretion of the learned judge in matters of this sort.

The second observation I want to make is this. Although we have held to-day that there is no ground brought before us which renders it right that the court shall act upon the power that the second section gives it, if it shall think fit, to appoint a guardian or guardians to act jointly with the mother, it is not in any way intended to say by our decision that that was a power which could only be exercised in cases in which some moral reflection was cast upon the mother. I can conceive all sorts of cases in which it might be, under this Act, fit that the court should exercise this power, although there might not be any moral reflection of any sort or kind on the wife; that is to say, in cases in which it was obviously for the interest of the child that the power of appointing a joint guardian should be exercised.

UNDERWOOD & SONS (LIMITED) v. BARKER. (a.)

Restraint of trade—Covenant—Validity—Reasonableness—Injunction.

B., being in the employ of the plaintiffs, who were wholesale and retail hay and straw merchants carrying on business in the United Kingdom and elsewhere, covenanted that he would not, "for the space of twelve months next after his leaving or being dismissed, carry on the business of hay and straw merchant, or enter into the service of, or act as agent for, any person or persons carrying on the business of hay and straw merchant in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or in France, or in the kingdom of Belgium, or Holland, or in the Dominion of Canada."

B., having voluntarily left the plaintiffs' employ, immediately entered the service of a rival hay and straw merchant in London.

Held, by the Court of Appeal (dissentiente Vaughan Williams, L.J.), that the restraint being reasonably required for the protection of the plaintiffs, having regard to the nature of their business, was not void, and that, therefore, B. must be restrained by injunction from committing a breach of his covenant.

Defendant's appeal from Kekewich, J.

The plaintiffs were wholesale and retail hay and straw merchants at Brentford, carrying on a large business in the United Kingdom and other countries.

By an agreement dated the 26th of October, 1897, the plaintiffs agreed to employ the defendant as their clerk and foreman in Calais or elsewhere, at a weekly wage of 35s., and the defendant agreed to do all in his power for the furtherance of the plaintiffs' interests, and, in particular, he covenanted that he would not, "for the space of twelve months next after leaving or being dismissed, carry on the business of hay and straw merchant, or enter into the service of or act as agent for any person or persons carrying on the business of hay and straw merchant in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or in France, or in the kingdom of Belgium, or Holland, or in the Dominion of Canada," and further, that for the space of five years after leaving the plaintiffs' employ he would not, either on his own account or as agent for others, carry on, directly or indirectly, the business of hay and straw merchant or other like business in the Republic of France, and in the event of any breach of such covenant he would pay to the plaintiffs the sum of £500 as and for liquidated damages, and not by way of penalty.

Under the agreement the defendant was employed at Calais for about four months (having been previously employed by the plaintiffs on several separate occasions in 1890); after this he was removed to London at an increased salary. The defendant remained in the plaintiffs' employ until the 12th of November, 1898, when he voluntarily left their employ and entered the service of one Kitts, a hay and straw merchant, of Mark-lane.

The plaintiffs thereupon commenced this action, and moved for an interlocutory injunction in terms of the restrictive covenant contained in the agreement.

Kekewich, J., made the order as prayed.

The defendant appealed.

Dobb, for the appellant.—Until recent years covenants in general restraint of trade were bad. This covenant is far too wide both in point of space and time. If the order of Kekewich, J., stands, it will go far beyond the limits of any case hitherto decided.

Clayton, for the respondents.—The true test of a covenant is this: it must be partial either in space or time (as the covenant here is), and the burden is on the covenantor to prove that it is bad. If there is a limit either in space or time the covenant is good.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 31.—The following written judgments were delivered.

LINDLEY, M.R.—Before referring to the facts I will state the principles of law which are applicable to this case. The law as now settled cannot, in my opinion, be more accurately expressed than it was by Lord Macnaghten in Nordenfelt v. Maxim-Nordenfelt Guns and Ammunition Co. (Limited), [1894] A. C. 535, at p. 565. He there says: "The true view at the present time, I think, is this: The public have an interest in every person's carrying on his trade freely; so has the individual. All interference with individual liberty of action in trading, and all restraints of trade of themselves, if there is nothing more, are contrary to public policy, and therefore void. That is the general rule. But there are exceptions; restraints of trade and interference with individual liberty of action may be justified by the special circumstances of a particular case. It is a sufficient justification, and indeed it is the only justification, if the restriction is reasonable—reasonable, that is, in reference to the interests of the parties concerned and reasonable in reference to the interests of the public, so framed and so guarded as to afford adequate protection to the party in whose favour it is imposed, while at the same time it is in no way injurious to the public." Time was when all agreements in restraint of trade or liberty to work were regarded as against public policy and invalid. But this view of the law was found mischievous and intolerable, and it was gradually disclaimed and modified. The modern doctrine, as I understand it, is that if an agreement restraining a person from carrying on business is injurious to the public interests of this country such agreement is invalid to the extent to which it is injurious, but not further, if it is so framed as to permit of division into two portions, one of which is good and the other bad: see as to this Baines v. Geary, 36 W. R. 98, 35 Ch. D. 154, and Maxim-Nordenfelt Guns and Ammunition Co. v. Nordenfelt, 41 W. R. 604, [1893] 1 Ch. 630, where the clause was severable; and Perls v. Saalfeld, 40 W. R. 548, [1892] 2 Ch. 149, where it was not. Further, it is now settled that, unless there are circumstances showing some reasonable ground for imposing a restriction on a person's liberty to do what he can for his own support, such restriction will be held not binding upon him. According to this doctrine an agreement in restraint of trade which is wider than is reasonably necessary for the protection of the person seeking to enforce it is invalid so far as it is wider than is so necessary, and this may invalidate the whole restraint sought to be imposed if the clause imposing it is so framed as not to be severable: see the last two last-mentioned cases and Rogers v. Maddocks, [1892] 3 Ch. 346, 41 W. R. Dig. 207. But where an agreement restraining a person from carrying on business is entered into with another person engaged in a similar business for the purpose of protecting him from rivalry in that business, and is no wider than is reasonably necessary for his protection in that business, it is difficult to imagine the circumstances which can render such agreement injurious to the public interests of this country. As pointed out by Lord Macnaghten in Nordenfelt's case, [1894] A. C., p. 566-67, what may be reasonable on the sale of a business may be unreasonable on the departure of a man from the service of his employer; but I do not understand him as saying that a restriction that is reasonably necessary for the protection of a man's business can be held invalid on grounds of public policy unless some specific ground can be clearly established. If there is one thing more than another which is essential to the trade and commerce of this country it is the inviolability of contracts deliberately entered into; and to allow a person of mature age, and not imposed upon, to enter into a contract, to obtain the benefit of it, and then to repudiate it and the obligations which he has undertaken is, primâ facie at all events, contrary to the interests of any and every country. Of course, I am not speaking of contracts induced by fraud, duress, or undue influence, or impeachable on any other recognized ground of invalidity. Omitting all such cases, the public policy, which allows a person who obtains employment on certain terms understood and agreed to by him, to repudiate his contract conflicts with and must, to avail the defendant, prevail for some sufficient reason over the manifest public policy which, as a rule, holds him to his bargain. I do not say that no such case can arise even where the terms impose a restriction on his liberty no wider than mentioned above, but at this moment no example of such a case short of some pernicious monopoly occurs to me. In Dubowski v. Goldstein, 44 W. R. 436, [1896] 1 Q. B. 478, the court, influenced no doubt by these considerations, treated the reasonableness of the restriction for the protection of the employer as the general practical test in cases of this description.

The fact that the person restricted is out of work, and is seeking employment, and is therefore at a disadvantage in making a bargain, cannot be a ground for holding his bargain invalid unless some unfair advantage is taken of his position; and so long as his bargain is reasonable, having regard to the protection of the employer, it cannot be truly said that any unfair advantage is taken. In this particular case oppression is not even suggested; nothing could be more kind and considerate than the treatment of the defendant by the plaintiffs. I can find no circumstance to relieve the defendant from his bargain on the ground of public policy if the restraint put upon him is no wider than is required for the protection of the plaintiffs in their business. This question turns on the nature of their business and on the true construction of the contract, and to these I will now allude. [His lordship stated the facts and read the contract, and continued:] The defendant's counsel asked us to put a very far-fetched, and I think unreasonable, construction on this contract. He contended that if the defendant in any part of the world acted for any hay merchant carrying on business in any of the enumerated countries the defendant would be guilty of a breach of his contract. But, as pointed out in Dubowski v. Goldstein, the contract must be construed with reference to the business of the plaintiffs which it was the object of the parties to protect. This is good law and good sense, and, guided by this principle, I am of opinion that the restriction imposed on the defendant is not wider than is reasonably required for the protection of the plaintiffs, regard being had to the nature of their business and the injury which the defendant could inflict upon them by competing with them himself or by entering into the service or acting as the agent of rival hay merchants in the countries where they carried on their business. The restriction is limited to a year and, as I read the agreement, to the places specified in it. It is to be taken as proved that it is important to the plaintiffs that their rivals should not know either to whom the plaintiffs sold their hay or where they got it from. The defendant was engaged as their clerk and foreman, and would, whilst acting as such, obtain information on these matters, and such information would, if imparted to a rival in trade, greatly benefit him and proportionately injure the plaintiffs. These circumstances appear to me to distinguish this case from Ward v. Byrne, 5 M. & W. 548, which is nearer the present case than any other. There the plaintiffs were coal merchants and the defendant was their town traveller and collecting clerk, and he agreed not to follow or be engaged in the business of a coal merchant for nine months after he should leave the plaintiffs' employ. This agreement was held invalid on the ground that it was unlimited in point of space. This case was much discussed in Nordenfelt's case. The restraint was considered unreasonably wide, and I think myself that it was so; but after Nordenfelt's case it does not follow that all agreements not to carry on or be employed in a particular business anywhere in this country are necessarily against public policy and therefore invalid. The question in each case is whether such a restriction is reasonable or not in the sense already explained. If it is reasonable in this sense it will be valid unless, on some other ground than its application to the whole of the United Kingdom, it can be held to be against public policy. In the face of the evidence adduced by the plaintiffs and in the absence of all evidence to contradict or modify it, I do not feel compelled by Ward v. Byrne to hold the restraint in the present case unreasonable so far as this country is concerned, which is the material question, for the defendant has entered the service of a rival of the plaintiffs in this country. If the restraint is unreasonable as to the foreign countries named, which I do not think it is, still the agreement as to them is clearly severable from that part of it which relates to this country.

The parties having agreed that this appeal shall be treated as an appeal from a judgment on the trial, an injunction must be granted in the terms of the contract and the defendant must be ordered to pay the costs of the action and of this appeal.

RIGBY, L.J.—I agree with all that has been said by the Master of the Rolls, and therefore only give a comparatively short judgment.

The law as to contracts in restraint of trade was originally founded on public policy according to the ideas and having regard to the business organization of the time. The whole business organization of society has been revolutionized by the use of railways, the post office, and the telegraph, so that a single firm may have a business extending over a vastly larger portion of the earth's surface than would have been dreamt of in the days when questions similar to that raised in this action were first dealt with. In addition to this it has been clearly recognized in recent times that public policy is at least as much concerned in holding persons to their contracts as in prohibiting contracts in restraint of trade. I do not say that there may not be exceptional cases where public policy can be brought in irrespectively of the reasonableness of the actual contract made. I cannot, however, think that in the present case any such exceptional question of public policy is involved. I think that the only question here is whether the restraint to be dealt with is reasonably necessary for the protection of the employer.

In my opinion the true construction of the contract leads to the conclusion that the operative part of the bargain for the present is that the defendant binds himself not to enter within twelve months in the United Kingdom into the service of anyone carrying on the business of hay and straw merchants in the United Kingdom. Everything else appears to me to be severable, and therefore not material for present purposes. Now, it appears on the uncontradicted evidence that the plaintiff company does an extensive wholesale and retail trade buying and selling hay and straw from all parts of the United Kingdom. Not only is this evidence (contained in the only affidavit filed in the court below) uncontradicted, but the defendant when offered an opportunity of answering the affidavit elected not to do so. In the Court of Appeal an affidavit was tendered in which the defendant deposed that he had no dealings in any way with the plaintiffs' customers and neither travelled for nor sold nor bought anything for them, but this affidavit was read by consent only on the express admission by counsel for the defendant that he did learn, during his employment by the plaintiff company, where the hay and straw came from and to a considerable extent where they went to. This was, of course, important information which would be at the disposal of another employer.

I do not think, having regard to the limited time during which the restraint was to last, that it was more extensive than was necessary for the reasonable protection of the plaintiff, which in cases of this kind is the test of the validity of the contract. The injunction will be made to extend to the 28th of November as the parties agreed that the application on the appeal should be treated as an appeal from an order made on the trial of the action.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I have arrrived at a different conclusion. I cannot think that the rule of law that all covenants in restraint of trade or binding an individual not to earn his living in the best way he can are primâ facie (if there is nothing more) contrary to public policy and therefore void, has been rescinded by recent decisions. Nor can I think that, when it is said that the only test by which to determine the validity or invalidity of such a covenant given for valuable consideration is its reasonableness for the protection of the trade or business of the covenantee, it is intended to leave out of consideration the question whether the particular covenant is such as is calculated to injure the public. The ruling case as to the validity of such contracts at the present time is Nordenfelt v. Maxim-Nordenfelt, &c., Co., which was decided by the House of Lords in 1894, and I think that, if the reasons for that decision given by the noble lords are looked at, it is reasonably clear that no one of them considered that the rule of law, that contracts in restraint of trade or in restriction of the right of every citizen to earn his livelihood by any lawful industry were void, had ceased to exist, and that no one of them considered that the test of the reasonableness of the contract for the protection of the contractee can be applied to the exclusion of the consideration of how far the contract restraining individual liberty has a tendency injuriously to affect the interests of the public. Before calling attention to certain passages appearing in the reasons given by the respective noble lords, I should like to call attention to the fact that in the case then before the House the covenant in respect of which the question arose as to its validity or invalidity as being a covenant in restraint of trade, was a covenant entered into by the vendor of a world-wide business not to carry on anywhere in competition with the buyer the business which he was selling to him; whereas in the case now before the court the contract as to which the question arises as to its validity or invalidity as being a contract contrary to the policy of the law, is a contract given by a servant to his master as a condition of his employment. This difference between the case in the House of Lords and the present case seems to me important, because in the decision of questions of this sort one always has to balance two considerations against each other, the one being the interest of the public in maintaining the rules of fair dealing between man and man, the other being the consideration of the interest of the public in maintaining liberty of individual action, and it seems to me that in the case of the sale of a business, while the public have the deepest interest that the contract by the seller not to compete with the buyer shall be fairly carried out, the restraint imposed by the contract upon liberty of individual action is so slight as to be of no public interest whatever; whereas in the case of master and servant the servant does not enter into the contract with the same freedom of choice as that with which a person buys a business, and the restraint on the servant from earning his livelihood in the manner best suited to his capacity seems to me to be a restriction of individual liberty in which the public have a deep interest. [His lordship then considered the Nordenfelt case, and continued:] The observations which I have quoted seem to me to show that, in considering what is a reasonable protection for the covenantee to whom the restrictive covenant is given, one cannot leave out of consideration the interest of the public in freedom of trade and in the liberty of the covenantor to earn a livelihood in any lawful industry. Nor can one limit the consideration of the public interest to the interest of the public in the observance of the contract made for valuable consideration, but must also consider whether the bargain is one which ought to have been made or whether it is contrary to public interest, being too wide or otherwise oppressive. [His lordship then reviewed the history of the present case at length, and concluded:] In the present case I find nothing to the advantage of the public to counterbalance the disadvantage to the public of the restrictive covenant. The maintenance of the rules of fair dealing between man and man is not, in my opinion, sufficient in a case where the covenant is of such a character that the master ought not to have required it of the person seeking employment; and I think that a covenant that the covenantor will not carry on or enter into the service of those carrying on that business in which his life previous to the engagement has been passed, is of such a character.

BENCE v. SHEARMAN. (a.)

Debt—Assignment—Negotiable instrument—Assignment of consideration—Notice of assignment after negotiation—Duty of debtor.

A debtor who, after giving a negotiable instrument for his debt, receives notice that the debt itself has been assigned, may properly disregard such notice and pay to the assignor who still holds the instrument.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

The defendant Shearman agreed to pay to one Adams a commission of £175 if he should find a purchaser for a public-house called the "Earl of Essex."

In January, 1897, the plaintiff, who had been introduced by Adams, entered into a contract for the purchase of the public-house.

In February, 1897, Adams gave the plaintiff, to whom he owed about £200, a document stamped as a receipt, and expressed as follows: "Received of Mr. Thomas Bence the sum of £200 in various sums, and I transfer my commission to him on the 'Earl of Essex,' Manor-park, in payment thereof."

The date fixed for the completion of the purchase was the 4th of March, 1897. The plaintiff, the defendant Shearman, and Adams all being present, the plaintiff paid the purchase-money to Shearman, who then gave Adams a cheque for £175, the amount of his agreed commission.

The plaintiff afterwards induced Shearman to stop the cheque at his bank, and to promise not to pay it either until he had communicated again with the plaintiff or until he had seen Adams again (there being a conflict of evidence as to the exact terms of the promise).

Next day the plaintiff, having had another interview with Adams, withdrew the notice stopping payment. Adams accordingly received the money.

The plaintiff then brought an action against Shearman and Adams, claiming £175.

Kekewich, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff against both defendants.

Shearman appealed.

Renshaw, Q.C., and John Henderson, for the appeal, cited Ex parte Richdale, In re Palmer, 30 W. R. 262, 19 Ch. D. 409; Lloyd v. Banks, 16 W. R. 988, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 488; and Saffron Walden Building Society v. Rayner, 28 W. R. 681, 14 Ch. D. 406.

Warrington, Q.C., and Beddall, for the plaintiff, referred to the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), s. 75, sub-section 1.

John Henderson replied.

LINDLEY, M.R., examined the evidence, coming to the conclusion that he could not hold it proved that the assignment was shown to Shearman before he gave the cheque; that it did not appear that on the 4th of March, 1898, it was Shearman's duty to pay the plaintiff rather than Adams; and that Shearman was under no legal obligation either to stop the cheque, or after stopping it, not remove the stop. [His lordship then proceeded:] That brings me to the last point, which is of very great importance to these parties, and to business people in general. Mr. Warrington has contended that after Shearman had given Adams this cheque and Adams had got it, in consequence of the notice then given by the plaintiff to Shearman it was Shearman's duty not to pay the cheque, and Shearman's business to take proceedings against Adams. That is a proposition to which I am not at all disposed to accede. Let us try to work it out. Someone is a creditor of another on a promissory note or cheque. The person who gave the note is informed that the debt which was the consideration for it was assigned before the note was given. Is the debtor on the note under any obligation not to pay it? I think he is under no such obligation at all. See what the contrary involves: if you have a person who is indebted upon any account, and whose creditor holds a negotiable instrument, the consideration for that negotiable instrument can be assigned in such a way that the person who is the debtor upon the instrument is not to pay it. I think the true principle is this: that notice to the debtor who has given a negotiable instrument, that the debt has been assigned, can be disregarded by him. To hold the contrary would be frightfully embarrassing. Just consider the consequences. A man owes another person money, and he pays it, or undertakes to pay, by giving a negotiable instrument. Why is he to be embarrassed by an assignment of the obligation which was the consideration for that instrument? It is a very ingenious contention by Mr. Warrington, which if well founded would settle the matter in his favour; but I think it is not well founded. On all points, therefore, the appellant is right. The appeal must be allowed.

CHITTY, L.J., stated the facts, and continued: I am satisfied, on the evidence, that no notice of the equitable assignment sufficient to bind Shearman was given previously to the handing over of the cheque. The law on the subject is quite clear, and is laid down in Lord Cairns' judgment in Lloyd v. Banks, 16 W. R. 988, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 488 at p. 490. It must be clearly made out, not only that there has been constructive notice, but that the mind of the trustee has in some way been brought to an intelligent apprehension of the nature of the incumbrance which has come upon the property, so that an ordinary man of business would act upon the information and regulate his conduct by it. Taking that, which is an excellent statement of the law on the subject—taking that to apply to this case, I am of opinion that there was no such notice given by the plaintiff to Shearman before the handing over of this cheque. Indeed, I think it was not the plaintiff's intention that the matter should be arranged by a payment from Shearman to the plaintiff. Moreover, there was nothing like a distinct notice from the plaintiff to Shearman that he was not to pay the cheque. As I have already explained, the plaintiff intended to get the money from Adams, and I accept Mr. Beddall's argument that, on the cheque being handed over to Adams, Adams became a trustee of the cheque and the money for the plaintiff.

But it is said that notice, after the cheque had thus been delivered, that the consideration for the cheque had been assigned to the plaintiff, was sufficient to impose some obligation upon Shearman. It appears to me, first, that there is no authority for any such proposition; and, secondly, that the principle upon which the law affecting the creditor whose debt has been assigned rests, is inconsistent with any such view. Lord Cranworth in Jones v. Farrell, 1 De G. & J. 208, 218, 6 W. R. Ch. Dig. 22, commenting upon an observation of Knight Bruce, L.J., that great embarrassment would be caused by carrying the doctrine of equitable assignment too far, said: It "was observed by Knight Bruce, L.J., during the course of the argument, and it has often occurred to me, that the doctrine of this court as to equitable assignments, if we look at it merely as theorists, may lead to very great inconvenience. Nobody can be wholly free from debts. The most solvent person in the world owes debts; he may owe something to a tailor, or a butcher, or a baker, and it would be very inconvenient to him to be told unexpectedly by one of these tradesmen, 'I have assigned over to A. B. the £25 which you owe me as the amount of my bill.'" I read that as showing that the doctrine of equitable assignments is not to be carried to such an extent as to embarrass ordinary men in the course of business.

When Shearman had delivered the cheque to Adams he had no more to do with the business. It is said that he was under some obligation. But in reference to these equitable assignments a man is not made a trustee without his own consent, and I do not see any reason for making that trusteeship, thus imposed by law, more burdensome than it already is.

In this case Shearman did, upon the request of the plaintiff, give notice to the bank stopping the cheque. If the plaintiff had relied upon, or established, a binding promise on Shearman's part to give such a notice, and thereby to delay payment long enough to let the plaintiff take proceedings to recover the money, that would have been quite another case. But it is plain, first, that no such promise is set up, and, secondly, that no such promise was proved; no promise upon which an action could be brought, because no consideration was given in the way of refraining from taking steps. In fact, I think I might throw out of account altogether the suggestion that there was any promise which affected Shearman's legal position; so that he stands in the position of being liable (if at all) only because he was constituted a trustee of this consideration by the notice he received after giving the cheque. The argument against him is a most ingenious one; striking for its ingenuity, and equally, in my opinion, for its unsoundness. I need not consider whether he could have defended an action if he had continued the notice stopping the cheque, because I think he was under no obligation to put himself in this embarrassing position. He is not, after he has once handed over that promissory note in the presence of the plaintiff to be exposed to any such liability. He was then quite free in the matter; and I dissent from the argument that a notice given after the delivery of a negotiable instrument, in such circumstances as these, constitutes the original debtor a trustee, or imposes upon him any obligation which can be properly deduced out of the consideration of the equitable principles which govern the matter. There was no duty. All that Shearman did in the way of stopping the cheque was a voluntary courtesy on his part; and the argument of Mr. Beddall, that what happened afterwards amounted to the giving of a new promissory note, cannot be sustained. The plaintiff's ground of complaint against Adams was such that Shearman might reasonably say, as he did say, I will stop the cheque until I have seen Adams. It is really quite immaterial whether Shearman said he would stop the cheque until he had seen the plaintiff, or until he had seen Adams.

The sum of my opinion, therefore, is that Shearman is under no liability; that he has not been converted into a trustee, because, before he knew of the plaintiff's claim, he had brought himself under an obligation to Adams, by giving him the cheque. To what I have said I add a passage from the judgment of Jessel, M.R., in Ex parte Richdale, In re Palmer, "I never heard of any obligation on the part of the drawer of a cheque given for value to stop the payment of it for the benefit of a third party."

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and but that we are differing from the learned judge below I should not add anything.

The one point in this case is whether notice of the fact of the assignment by Adams to Bence was brought home to Shearman. Unless it was—that is, unless not merely the document was shown to him and observations made about it, but unless, in the opinion of a jury, knowledge of the fact that the debt had been assigned was really communicated to Shearman—clearly he was justified in paying Adams and not Bence. On that part of the case I should have felt very much embarrassed, inasmuch as the learned judge saw the witnesses, if he had rested his judgment on a finding that Shearman had such notice. But he did not find, though he said he was inclined to think, that notice was given. When one comes to look at the evidence it seems to me that, fairly taken, it does not support that view. Mr. Warrington, indeed, gave up that point, for his contention was that the intention of the parties was fully carried out when Shearman handed the cheque to Adams. Bence appears to have thought that he would be sufficiently safe if he saw that done, and there is evidence that he was desirous the transaction should be carried out in that form, because he did not wish to interfere with the ordinary course of things upon a cheque. That appears to me to be the real point, and therefore I think the learned judge was wrong.

But another point was taken, which, I think, was the basis of the learned judge's judgment: that, the cheque having been properly handed by Shearman to Adams—that is, after Shearman had come under a legal obligation—which in ordinary parlance is payment, Shearman, being asked to stop the cheque that inquiry might be made, and assenting, has come under an obligation not to pay it to the legal owner, but to another person who now apprises him that he is the assignee of the consideration for the cheque. That certainly would not be the common law view of the question; and I am very glad to find, on the great authority of the other members of this court, that equity has never been carried to such lengths as that. Here Shearman was under no obligation to stop the cheque, but he agreed to do so. Even by that he ran a risk. The cheque might have been in the hands of the original donee or of somebody to whom he had transferred it. Then, having as a matter of courtesy stopped the cheque, Shearman is told that the debt has been assigned. But does that constitute him a trustee? In the meantime he has given his cheque and become liable upon it; and it seems to me that this is really an attempt to create a trust by giving notice after payment, and to put the assignee in as good a position as if he had given notice before payment. It is then too late to give notice. The person to whom notice is given has come under a legal obligation, which may result in an action being brought against him. It seems to me, therefore, that, having given a cheque on which he is legally liable, he is bound to deal with the holder, notwithstanding any notice he may subsequently receive. For these reasons I agree that the judgment of Kekewich, J., must be reversed.

In re CARNE'S SETTLED ESTATES. (a.)

Settled land—Trust to allow widow to occupy castle and lands so long as she might wish to do so—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 2, 38, 58.

A mansion-house was vested in trustees for a term of 1,000 years upon trust to allow the plaintiff to occupy the same rent free so long as she might wish to continue to do so.

Held, that the plaintiff was tenant for life within the meaning of the Settled Land Act, 1882; but held, that the trustees of the term were not trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Act.

Adjourned summons.

By an indenture dated the 14th of March, 1890, certain hereditaments including the castle and manor of St. Donats were (subject to a rent-charge) conveyed to trustees for a term of 1,000 years upon trust to allow the plaintiff to occupy the castle, pleasure ground, stables, and certain fields rent free as long as she should desire to do so, and upon further trust to raise some specified sums of money, and subject to the term to the use of one of the defendants in fee.

The plaintiff took out a summons to have it determined (1) whether she was tenant for life under the settlement; (2) whether the trustees of the term were trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts; and, (3) if necessary, for the appointment of trustees for the purposes of those Acts.

H. Terrell, Q.C., and W. M. Cann, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff is within the definition in section 2 (1), sub-section 5, or at all events has the powers of a tenant for life under section 58 (1) vi. [They cited In re Paget's Settled Estates, 33 W. R. 898, 30 Ch. D. 161; In re Edwardes' Settlement, [1897] 2 Ch. 412, 45 W. R. Dig. 142; In re Eastman's Settled Estates, [1898], W. N., p. 170.] The power to raise money includes a power of sale (Tasker v. Small, 6 Sim. 625), so that the trustees of the term are trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and J. G. Wood, for the defendant, the reversioner.—In In re Edwardes there was more than a mere right of personal occupation, which is all there is here. In In re Paget's Settled Estates section 51 applied, and the person who had the powers of tenant for life was entitled to the rents and profits.

Terrell, Q.C., replied.

NORTH, J.—I do not see how to escape from the decision of Romer, J., in In re Eastman's Settled Estates. I see no distinction between the two cases so far as the limitation goes, and according to the old authorities such a limitation grants an estate for life: see Co. Litt. 42*a*, and Burton's Real Property (7th ed.), p. 239. It may be that the mansion-house can be sold and the rest of the estate left, and that this is contrary to the intention of the settlor; but the question is, what does the Act say? I do not see my way to put a different construction to that adopted by Romer, J. The trustees of the term, however, are not, in my opinion, trustees for the purposes of the Act, and there must be a reference to chambers for the appointment of trustees.

(A. L. Smith, Collins, and Romer, L.JJ.) March 11.

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accidental injuries—Arbitration—Jurisdiction of county court judge—New trial—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 1, sub-section 3; Schedule II., ss. 2, 4—Workmen's Compensation Rules, 1898, rr. 1 (4), 24, 64.

A county court judge has no jurisdiction to grant a new trial in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

Appeal from a decision of the judge of the Nottingham County Court refusing to grant a new trial in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The workman in this case having made a claim to compensation under the Act, the matter was heard on the 15th of November, 1898, before the county court judge sitting as an arbitrator under the Act, and an award was made in favour of the workman. On the 10th of December the employer gave notice of his intention to apply to the county court judge for a new trial. On the hearing of the application on the 21st of December it was objected on the part of the workman that the county court judge had no jurisdiction to grant a new trial. The county court judge was of opinion that he had jurisdiction to entertain the application, but he dismissed the application on the merits, refusing to allow a new trial. The employer appealed.

Etherington Smith, for the workman, took a preliminary objection to the hearing of the appeal.—The county court judge had no jurisdiction to hear the application for a new trial, and no appeal lies from his refusal to grant a new trial. At the original hearing he sat as an arbitrator, and when once he had made his award he had no power to review it. The only power of appealing from an award under the Workmen's Compensation Act is that given by section 4 of the second schedule, which is as follows: "The Arbitration Act, 1889, shall not apply to any arbitration under this Act; but an arbitrator may, if he thinks fit, submit any question of law for the decision of the county court judge, and the decision of the judge on any question of law, either on such submission, or in any case where he himself settles the matter under this Act, shall be final, unless within the time and in accordance with the conditions prescribed by Rules of the Supreme Court either party appeals to the Court of Appeal." The only appeal given by this section is an appeal on a question of law decided at the hearing of the arbitration; and it must be brought within twenty-one days: see ord. 59. r. 12, of the High Court Rules. The county court judge has no power to reconsider his award, except in the single case provided for by section 12 of the first schedule, which allows him to review a weekly payment. With this exception his award is final, unless there is an appeal within twenty-one days. The appellant did not give notice of appeal within twenty-one days, and therefore he is out of time for appealing from the original decision.

W. H. Stevenson, for the employer.—The Workmen's Compensation Rules, 1898, show that an arbitration under the Act is an action in all but name. Rule 1 (4) incorporates the County Court Rules. Rule 24 says that "subject to the special provisions of these rules, the procedure in an arbitration shall be the same as the procedure in an action commenced in the county court by plaint and summons in the ordinary way, and determined by the judge without a jury; and the statutory provisions and rules for the time being in force relating to such actions shall, with the necessary modifications, apply to such arbitration accordingly; and in the application of such provisions and rules the applicant's request for arbitration shall be deemed to be a summons with particulars annexed, the day fixed for proceeding with the arbitration shall be deemed to be the return day, and the applicant and respondents shall be deemed to be plaintiff and defendants respectively." And by rule 64, "where any matter or thing is not specially provided for under these rules, the same procedure shall be followed and the same provisions shall apply, as far as practicable, as in a similar matter or thing under the County Courts Act, 1888, and the rules made in pursuance of that Act." Part of the procedure of an action in the county court is the procedure relating to an application for a new trial. The county court judge, therefore, had jurisdiction to hear an application for a new trial, and an appeal lies from his refusal to grant a new trial: see Pole v. Bright, 40 W. R. 95, [1892] 1 Q. B. 603.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I think that the preliminary objection is a good one. The question is whether the county court judge had jurisdiction to entertain an application for a new trial. It is clear from a consideration of the Act that the county court judge at the original hearing was sitting as an arbitrator, and as an arbitrator only. Section 1, sub-section 3, says: "If any question arises in any proceedings under this Act as to the liability to pay compensation under this Act, or as to the amount or duration of compensation under this Act, the question, if not settled by agreement, shall, subject to the provisions of the first schedule to this Act, be settled by arbitration in accordance with the second schedule to this Act." The first schedule deals with the scale and conditions of compensation. And in passing I may refer to section 12, which gives the arbitrator power to review any weekly payment. Section 2 of the second schedule says that in the absence of agreement as to an arbitrator the matter should be settled by the county court judge. Section 4 of the second schedule is as follows: "The Arbitration Act, 1889, shall not apply to any arbitration under this Act; but an arbitrator may, if he thinks fit, submit any question of law for the decision of the county court judge, and the decision of the judge on any question of law, either on such submission, or in any case where he himself settles the matter under this Act, shall be final, unless within the time and in accordance with the conditions prescribed by Rules of the Supreme Court either party appeals to the Court of Appeal; and the county court judge shall, for the purpose of an arbitration under this Act, have the same powers of procuring the attendance of witnesses and the production of documents as if the claim for compensation had been made by plaint in the county court." In my opinion the idea governing the whole of the enactment is that a county court judge who sits to hear a case under the Act sits as an arbitrator. Now, can an arbitrator grant a new trial of a case which he has heard? It is perfectly clear that he has no such power. It was argued that rule 1 (4) and rule 24 of the Workmen's Compensation Rules bring in the County Court Rules and practice, and give the judge the same powers as if he were sitting not as an arbitrator. And reliance was specially laid on rule 64, which says: "Where any matter or thing is not specially provided for under these rules, the same procedure shall be followed, and the same provisions shall apply, as far as practicable, as in a similar matter or thing under the County Courts Act, 1888, and the rules made in pursuance of that Act." In my opinion those rules are intended to apply to cases under the Act the powers to which they refer so far as they are applicable to arbitrations, and no further. The county court judge, therefore, was not vested with his ordinary county court jurisdiction, and he had no power to entertain on application for a new trial.

PEMBERTON v. HUGHES. (a.)

Divorce—Foreign law—Decree of foreign court competent to deal with the cause—Irregularity—Want of jurisdiction—Validity.

A decree pronounced by a foreign court competent to deal with the case must, if not contrary to natural justice, be treated in this country as valid until it is set aside, though the irregularities of the process by which it was obtained were such as by the local law to deprive the foreign court of jurisdiction. A decree of divorce pronounced by a Florida divorce court between persons whom it was competent to summon before it will, therefore, be received here as valid, even if it be the law of Florida that, the summons having been issued only ten days (instead of ten clear days) before the return day, the court had no jurisdiction, and its decree is an absolute nullity.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

The material facts are sufficiently stated in the judgment of Lindley, M.R., to which statement it need only be added that the divorce granted by the Florida court against Mrs. Pemberton, the appellant, on the petition of Holmes Erwin, her former husband, was pronounced on the ground of the lady's violent temper.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 16.—The following written judgments were delivered:

LINDLEY, M.R., read the following judgment: The plaintiff in this action claims to be entitled to a jointure of £200 a year under the will of Francis A. R. Pemberton, who died on the 2nd of August, 1892. The plaintiff's right to the sum depends upon whether she is the widow of the testator, and this depends upon the validity of their alleged marriage, and this depends upon the validity of a previous divorce of the lady from a former husband of the name of Erwin.

Kekewich, J., has held the divorce invalid, and has dismissed the plaintiff's action with costs. From this decision she has appealed. The material facts are as follows: In February, 1884, the plaintiff and Erwin, who were both domiciled and resident in the State of Florida, were married in that country according to the laws thereof. On the 18th of January, 1888, Erwin, the husband—the plaintiff and her husband being then in Florida—sued the plaintiff for and obtained a decree for divorce. This decree was pronounced by a court having jurisdiction in Florida to pronounce divorces between persons domiciled and resident in Florida, and the decree has never been set aside or reversed. It stands as a final and subsisting decree. Its validity is, however, impeached by the defendants on grounds which will be stated presently. On the 20th of December, 1890, Erwin being still alive, the plaintiff and Mr. Pemberton married in Florida; they lived together as man and wife until his death in August, 1892. Under the will and codicil of his grandfather, Mr. Pemberton was entitled to certain estates in this country for his life, and he had power to charge them with an annuity or jointure of £200 a year in favour of any woman whom he should marry. In exercise of this power he made a will appointing the £200 a year to the plaintiff. The defendants, who are entitled to the estates, dispute the validity of the appointment, and contend that the decree divorcing the plaintiff from her former husband, Erwin, was void and of no effect by the law of Florida. It is proved that by the law of Florida suits for divorce are commenced by a bill (i.e., a petition) presented to a judge of a circuit court sitting in Chancery. The statements are verified by a short affidavit by the plaintiff made before a notary of the court. The bill and affidavit are then filed in the office of the clerk of the court. A subpœna to appear addressed to the defendant is then issued under the seal of the court. The time for appearance must not be less than ten clear days from the issue of the subpœna. The subpœna is sent to the sheriff for service, and it must be served ten days before the time for appearance. When served the subpœna is returned and filed in the office of the clerk of the court which issued it. If the defendant does not appear a præcipe for a decree pro confesso is obtained by the plaintiff and is filed with the clerk of the court, and after a certain time a decree pro confesso under the seal of the court is entered by him. This, however, is not the final decree. Before that is obtained evidence in support of the plaintiff's case is taken before the master. He certifies it to the court, and the evidence and his certificate are then filed in the proper office. Before the case is brought before the court for final decision, a short summary of the proceedings with their dates (called "step notes") is prepared, and is signed by the clerk of the court and is filed. The papers and proofs are then laid before the judge, and if he is satisfied with them a decree for divorce is pronounced and is drawn up and signed by the judge and filed.

The above procedure was followed by Erwin, and save in one respect everything was perfectly regular. His bill was duly presented and filed in the proper court on the 25th of November, 1887; a subpœna was duly served on his wife. She did not appear. All subsequent steps were duly taken, and on the 18th of January, 1888, a final decree was pronounced against her, which is as follows. [His lordship read the decree, and proceeded:] The decree was filed on the 28th of January 1888. It has now been ascertained that the subpœna to appear did not leave ten clear days between the date of the writ and the time for appearance. The subpœna was dated the 25th of November, 1887, and the time fixed for the wife's appearance was the 5th of December, 1887—i.e., ten days, but not ten clear days after the 25th of November, 1887. The writ was, in fact, served on the wife on the 25th of November, so that the rule as to service was complied with, and no application to the clerk to enter a decree against her was applied for until the 2nd of January, 1888. There are no grounds whatever for saying that she did not know of the proceedings, nor that she had not time to enter an appearance on or before the 5th of December, nor that she had no opportunity of defending herself. Moreover, she is not herself questioning the validity of the decree of divorce; on the contrary, she maintains it was and is perfectly valid.

The defendants, however, contend, and they have adduced expert evidence to prove, that as the subpœna to appear did not give the wife ten clear days for appearance the subpœna was not irregular only, but absolutely void, so that all subsequent proceedings were void also, and that the court had no jurisdiction to pronounce any decree against the wife. The defendants further contend that the decree, being wholly void by the law of Florida, must be treated as wholly void by this and all other civilized countries. The evidence of the law of Florida is not to my mind so clear as to convince me that the decree, standing as it does unimpeached, could be treated in a collateral proceeding as wholly null and void even in Florida. Mr. Struntz, the plaintiff's expert, does not take that view of the law. It is true that in two passages of his cross-examination (pp. 29-31) he says that if proper proceedings were not taken the court would not have jurisdiction, but he insists that as the wife was served in time the defect in the subpœna was not fatal to the jurisdiction of the court. The defendant's expert, Mr. Warts, unquestionably goes much further, and says that Mrs. Pemberton and Mr. Erwin, who also married after the divorce, could be both convicted in Florida of bigamy, notwithstanding the decree. But even Mr. Warts says that the defect in the writ of subpœna would have been cured by the wife's appearance (see p. 42), which makes me hesitate in saying that I am satisfied that the decree is void, even by the law of Florida, for want of jurisdiction. The court which pronounced the decree ought to be credited with knowing what irregularities (if any) were fatal to its jurisdiction and what were not, and the court had before it all the materials necessary for forming a judgment, and oversight or carelessness ought not to be presumed by us. Although, therefore, Kekewich, J., considered Mr. Warts a more satisfactory witness than Mr. Struntz, I could not myself without further information come to the same conclusion as the learned judge as to the utter worthlessness, even in Florida, of the decree which the defendants impeach. Further information on this point could be procured, if necessary, under the provisions of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 11, but, in my opinion, it is not necessary to pursue this question further.

Assuming that the defendants are right, and that the decree of divorce is void by the law of Florida, it by no means follows that it ought to be so regarded in this country. It sounds paradoxical to say that a decree of a foreign court should be regarded here as more efficacious, or with more respect than it is entitled to in the country in which it was pronounced. But this paradox disappears when the principles on which English courts act in regarding or disregarding foreign judgments are borne in mind. If a judgment is pronounced by a foreign court over persons within its jurisdiction and in a matter with which it is competent to deal, English courts never investigate the propriety of the proceedings in the foreign court, unless they offend against English views of substantial justice. Where no substantial injustice, according to English notions, is committed, all that English courts look to are the finality of the judgment and the jurisdiction of the court, in this sense and to this extent—viz., its competence to entertain the sort of case which it did deal with, and its competence to require the defendant to appear before it. If the court had jurisdiction in this sense and to this extent, the courts of this country never inquire whether the jurisdiction has been properly or improperly exercised, provided always that no substantial injustice, according to English notions, has been committed. There is no doubt that the courts of this country will not enforce the decision of foreign courts which have no jurisdiction in the sense above explained —i.e., over the subject-matter or over the persons brought before them. [His lordship referred to Schibsby v. Westenholz; Rousillon v. Rousillon, 28 W. R. 623, 14 Ch. D. 351; Price v. Dewhurst, 4 My. & Cr. 76; Buchanan v. Rucker; Sirdar Gurdyal Singh v. Rajah of Faridkote, [1894] A. C. 670.] But the jurisdiction which alone is important in these matters is the competence of the court in an international sense —i.e., its territorial competence over the subject-matter and over the defendant. Its competence or jurisdiction in any other sense is not regarded as material by the courts of this country. This is pointed out by Mr. Westlake (Int. Law, s. 308) and by Foote (Private Int. Jur. (2nd ed.), p. 547), and is illustrated by Vanquelin v. Bouard. That was an action on a judgment obtained in France on a bill of exchange. The court was competent to try such actions, and the defendant was within its jurisdiction. He let judgment go by default, and in the action in this country on the judgment he pleaded that by French law the French court had no jurisdiction because the defendant was not a trader and was not resident in a particular town where the cause of action arose. In other words, the defendant pleaded that the French action was brought in the wrong court (see the 13th plea). The Court of Common Pleas held the plea bad and that the defence set up by it should have been raised in the French action. The French action in Vanquelin v. Bouard was an action in personam, and the parties to the action in France were also the parties to the action brought in this country on the French judgment. The decision therefore does not exactly cover the present case, but it goes far to show that the defendant's contention in this case cannot be supported. The defendant's contention entirely ignores the distinction between the jurisdiction of tribunals from an international, and their jurisdiction from a purely municipal, point of view. But that distinction rests on good sense and is recognized by modern writers on private international law: see Westlake and Foote; Piggott on Foreign Judgments, p. 129, et seq. The latter says at p. 130: "The jurisdiction to pronounce judgment in a suit depends solely on the right to summon a person before the tribunal to defend the suit." Wharton's Int. Law, paragraphs 792, &c., contains a careful review of the question by a learned American lawyer, and brings out the distinction very clearly: see paragraphs 801, 812. In paragraph 812 he says, "The true test is competence according to the rules of international law"; and it is plain that these do include mere rules of procedure.

In Dicey's Conflict of Laws there are some valuable chapters (xi., p. 361; xvi., p. 400) on the jurisdiction of foreign courts; and in them will be found various meanings of the expression "court of competent jurisdiction." Those various meanings show the danger of using that expression without taking care to avoid the confusion to which they may easily give rise.

It may be safely said that, in the opinion of writers on international law, and for international purposes, the jurisdiction or the competency of a court does not depend upon the exact observance of its own rules of procedure. The defendants' contention is based upon the assumption that an irregularity in procedure of a foreign court of competent jurisdiction in the sense above explained is a matter which the courts of this country are bound to recognize if such irregularity involves nullity of sentence. No authority can be found for any such proposition, and, although I am not aware of any English decision exactly to the contrary, there are many which are so inconsistent with it as to show that it cannot be accepted. A judgment of a foreign court having jurisdiction over the parties and subject-matter—i.e., having jurisdiction to summon the defendants before it and to decide such matters as it has decided—cannot be impeached in this country on its merits: Castrique v. Imrie (in rem), Godard v. Gray (in personam), Messina v. Petrococchino, 20 W. R. 451, L. R. 4 P. C. 144 (in personam). It is quite inconsistent with those cases, and also with Vanquelin v. Bouard, to hold that such a judgment can be impeached here for a mere error in procedure. And in Castrique v. Imrie Lord Colonsay said that no inquiry on such a matter should be made (p. 448). A decree for divorce, altering as it does the status of the parties and affecting, as it may do, the legitimacy of their after-born children, is much more like a judgment in rem than a judgment in personam:—see Niboyet v. Niboyet, 27 W. R. 203, 4 P. D. 1, at p. 12. And where there are differences between the two the decisions on foreign judgments in rem are better guides for the determination of this case than decisions on foreign judgments in personam. The leading recent cases on foreign judgments in rem are: (1866) Doglioni v. Crispin, L. R. 1 H. L. 301; 15 W. R. H. L. Dig. 8; (1870) Castrique v. Imrie; (1887) In re Trufort, Trafford v. Blunc. There is nothing, however, in the decisions in those cases to assist the defendants. On the contrary, the judgments delivered in them are, in my opinion, adverse to the defendants' contention.

In Doglioni v. Crispin, a Portuguese court decided that the respondent was the natural son of a deceased man domiciled in Portugal and not a noble, and that the respondent was consequently to succeed to his father's personal estate. The appellant was a party to those proceedings, but she afterwards claimed the property in question under a will of the deceased. She was held precluded from disputing the Portuguese decree. Lord Cranworth distinctly stated (p. 315) that the decision, having been pronounced by a court of competent jurisdiction, was one which English courts were "bound to receive without inquiry as to its conformity or non-conformity with the laws of the country where it was pronounced"; and a little lower Lord Cranworth stated that in his opinion evidence to show that the decision was not in accordance with Portuguese law ought not to have been received. Lord Cranworth's judgment did not, as I understand it, turn on the fact that the appellant was personally estopped from disputing the Portuguese judgment because she was a party to the proceedings in Portugal; his decision was based on the competency of the court and the nature of the controversy before it.

It is necessary, however, to bear in mind that undefended proceedings for divorce require to be very narrowly scrutinized, for such divorces may be easily connived at. It is unnecessary to consider whether an English court would recognize a foreign divorce proved to have been obtained by collusion even if the parties divorced were foreigners domiciled and resident within the jurisdiction of the foreign court. No collusion is relied upon or proved in the present case. If, therefore, the principles above explained are correct, I see no ground on which an English court can refuse to recognize the validity of the divorce in question in this case, unless it be on one or other of the two following grounds—viz., (1) that a foreign divorce decree pronounced in an undefended action will never be recognized in this country; or (2) that the courts of this country will not recognize any divorce even of foreigners for any cause other than those for which a divorce can be obtained in this country. To lay down now for the first time either of these doctrines is, in my judgment, quite impossible, nor were they alluded to by counsel. I thought it, however, desirable to mention them in order that it might not be supposed that they had been overlooked.

In the result the appeal must be allowed and the judgment reversed, and a declaration be made that the plaintiff is entitled to the £200 a year with an account and order for payment. The defendants must pay the costs of the action and of the appeal.

RIGBY, L.J.—I agree, and I base my judgment on the ground that we have no right in this action to inquire into the question whether or not the court of Florida did or did not act upon a correct view of the law and procedure of their own State. The State had exclusive jurisdiction to deal with the persons domiciled and resident within its territory, the court which pronounced the decree for a divorce was the proper court, and the only proper court, for entertaining and deciding upon divorce actions within the territory, and it seems to me that on principle and authority the courts of this country are bound to assume that the court understood its own procedure and law, and that the evidence of experts ought not to have been resorted to. Castrique v. Imrie (a case of a judgment in rem) and Vanquelin v. Bouard (where a judgment of a French court was supported) are two of the more important authorities on the point. The court which has sole jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the action and the parties thereto must by the courts of this country be treated as the only competent tribunal to deal with the question raised in the divorce action. Even though it were possible to point out some mistake as to the municipal procedure or law, the courts of this country ought not on that ground to override the actual decision.

The objection taken is that the court of Florida had, according to the municipal law, no jurisdiction to pronounce a decree, but such an objection as that I think ought not to be entertained by us. Mrs. Erwin had all the notice of the proceedings which the law of the State required, though if we had a right to inquire further it may well be that there was an irregularity in fixing the day for appearance. The effect of a judgment such as this, determining the status of Mrs. Erwin to be that of a feme sole, has as much effect as against persons not parties to the action as a judgment in rem in analogous circumstances would have had.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree with the rest of the court that the divorce decree in the court in Florida must be treated as the judgment of a foreign court of competent jurisdiction, and cannot be examined or impeached on any of the grounds suggested. That the Florida court is, from an international point of view, a court of competent jurisdiction is not questioned. The parties were married in Florida, and domiciled there, and present within the jurisdiction.

It is said that the evidence of the foreign experts shows that the judgment is a nullity by reason of the defective process, and that we are bound by their evidence as to what the foreign law is. But this evidence does not show in regard to judgments generally that, if in civil proceedings in Florida the judgment had been relied on, the party against whose interest it was set up would not have had to show that the judgment had been set aside. It is clear in the case of a judgment of a superior court on a personal action in England if a plaintiff arrested on a process sued in trespass, and the defendant justified under process under a judgment of a superior court, the plaintiff, if he impeached this judgment, even on the ground that the action was wrong in its inception, would have had to allege and prove that the judgment had been set aside and that error had been successfully brought.

There is no evidence that this law is not the same in Florida, and I think that we ought, in favour of the foreign judgment, to make this presumption in favour of the judgment—that is to say, to treat it in civil proceedings as we should treat the judgment of a superior court.

The present case is analogous to the case where, in in a foreign country, the proceedings have been taken against a person subject to the jurisdiction, but not in the proper court. In Vanquelin v. Bouard and Doglioni v. Crispin, the defendant was properly served and had the opportunity in the suit of pleading to the jurisdiction of the court which was not the proper court. Here there was no proper service. The true principle seems to me that a judgment, whether in personam or in rem, of a superior court having jurisdiction over the person, must be treated as valid till set aside either by the court itself or by some proceeding in the nature of a writ of error, unless there has been some defect in the initiation of proceedings, or in the course of proceedings, which would make it contrary to natural justice to treat the foreign judgment as valid; as, for instance, a case where there had been not only no service of process, but no knowledge of it.

The allegation of no service alone would not in such a case avail the defendant: Buchanan v. Rucker, Ferguson v. Mahon, Bullen and Leake's Pleadings, (5th ed.), p. 748.

GROSE-SMITH v. BRIDGES. (a.)

Settled land—Pecuniary legacy—Gift over in event of sale of settled land—Invalidity—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 51.

The widow of a settlor died in 1869 leaving a will bequeathing personal property to the person entitled to the ownership and enjoyment of the settled estate, with a gift over in the event of a sale of the settled real estate.

Held, that the gift over was inoperative if a sale was made under the Settled Land Acts.

Adjourned summons.

Henley Smith devised the Priory estate to trustees upon trust for his wife for life, and after her death on trust, by sale or mortgage, to raise portions for his daughters, and, subject as aforesaid, on trust for his son Henley Grose Grose-Smith (the plaintiff) for life, and after his death in trust for his first and other sons in tail male with remainders over. There was a power of sale with the consent of the tenant for life. The testator died in 1867. His widow, who died in 1869, directed the accumulation of the income of her residuary estate for twenty-one years, and directed that after the expiration of that period the income should be paid to the person entitled to the ownership and enjoyment of the Priory estate under her husband's will, with a gift over to Charles Dodgson in the event of a sale of the Priory estate within twenty-one years of her death.

The plaintiff took out this summons in order to determine whether the gift over was valid.

Carson, for the plaintiff.—Section 51 of the Settled Land Act applies, although the testatrix died before the Act was passed: In re Ames, 41 W. R. 505, [1893] 2 Ch. 479; In re Paget's Settled Estates, 33 W. R. 898, 30 Ch. D. 161.

Dibdin, for the trustees, referred to In re Eastman's Settled Estates, [1898] W. N., p. 170.

D. Jones, for the executors of C. Dodgson.—Section 51 only applies where a fetter on sale is imposed by the settlor. These settlements were made before the Act was passed, and the Legislature cannot have altered the existing rights of persons.

NORTH, J.—I do not see how to escape from the decision urged on me by Mr. Carson. At the time these instruments were prepared a man was allowed by law to tie up land during the life of a tenant for life. The Legislature considered the law ought to be altered and power to sell was given to tenants for life by statute. The Legislature further provided that any attempt to induce a tenant for life not to sell should be ineffectual. The provision in the widow's will was, I cannot doubt, inserted to induce the tenant for life not to exercise the power of sale. It is suggested that the fact that this is contained in a settlement made by a person who did not settle the real estate, makes a difference. I do not see that it does, and I think the words of the section are too strong. The object of the Act cannot be defeated by the use of two deeds instead of one. And the words of the Act show that the Act applies not only when the settle-

SEN SEN CO. v. BRITTEN. (a.)

Trade-mark—Passing off—Improper use of the words "trade-mark"—Misrepresentation—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 105.

Where a name is put on goods, with the addition of the words "Trade-Mark," but the trade-mark has not been registered, it does not necessarily follow that there is a representation that the trade-mark had been registered, so as to disentitle the plaintiff to relief in a passing-off action.

Held, on the facts, that the plaintiffs were entitled to an interlocutory injunction to restrain the defendant from passing off his goods as or for those of the plaintiffs.

Motion.

The plaintiffs in this action sought to restrain the defendant from passing off certain goods as and for the goods of the plaintiffs by means of the get-up of the goods. The goods in question consisted of a medical preparation which was said to be useful for the voice. The plaintiffs were an American company, which, since 1896, had sent large quantities of these goods to England and sold them. The goods were made up in small packages, and in a certain distinctive way. They bore on them, at the top and bottom and front portions of the parcel, the words, "Sen Sen—Trade-mark"; under that and diagonally across there was a ribbon made up in a bow. Various packages were made up in this way in different colours. In addition to that the packages were sold in boxes. The striking feature of these boxes was, that there was on each of the two opposite sides a transparency, behind which was seen a placard containing representations of three of the small packages, and the evidence was that at the time they were introduced into England that was a very distinguishing feature of the parcel. The defendant was the agent in England of a Canadian company who had recently introduced their manufacture into England. They made up their goods in small packages of the same shape as those of the plaintiffs. They marked these packages "Santé," and instead of a ribbon passing diagonally across the front there was a cord which was passed lengthwise and breadthwise across the package with a knot in the middle. The colours were not exactly identical in tint with those used by the plaintiffs, but closely resembled such colours. The defendants had also adopted a box in which they sold those packages, and which differed in shape from the plaintiffs' box, but there was also this characteristic feature of a transparency on one side, and behind that there was, as in the case of the plaintiffs' box, a card containing a representation of three of the defendants' packages.

The Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, s. 105 (1), provides: "Any person who represents that any article sold by him is a patented article, when no patent has been granted for the same, or describes any design or trade-mark applied to any article sold by him as registered which is not so, shall be liable for every offence, on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding five pounds."

(2) "A person shall be deemed, for the purposes of this enactment, to represent that an article is patented or a design or a trade-mark is registered, if he sells the article with 'patent,' 'patented,' 'registered,' or any word or words expressing or implying that a patent or registration has been obtained for the article, stamped, engraved, or impressed on, or otherwise applied to, the article."

Upjohn, Q.C., and Sebastian, for the plaintiffs.—There may be a trade-mark, although it is not registered. There are two modes of acquiring a trade-mark, by user or by registration. It is no offence to call a mark a trade-mark although it is not registered. "Sen Sen" is a trade-mark in the old common law sense of the term. The plaintiffs are suing to prevent the defendant from dressing up his goods so as to pass them off for the plaintiffs' goods.

Upjohn, Q.C., replied.

March 1.—STIRLING, J., after stating the facts, said: Now, the question is whether all this combination of the defendant's goods is such as to lead the unwary purchaser to purchase the goods of the defendant as and for the goods of the plaintiffs. That is a question which must be mainly decided by the eye. There has been the usual conflict of evidence and as usual certain distinctions between the two were pointed out, both as to the packages and the boxes. But in my judgment looking at the matter as a whole this is a case in which the unwary purchaser would very easily be led to mistake the defendant's goods for those of the plaintiffs. Of that I have no doubt at all. The doubt which is occasioned in my mind is as to whether an injunction can be granted in the circumstances mentioned by the learned counsel for the defendant—namely, that the plaintiffs have throughout used parcels and packages on which are found the words "Sen Sen—Trade-mark." Now, as regards their right to a trade-mark the position is this. On behalf of the plaintiffs an affidavit has been filed in which it is said that the trade-mark "Sen Sen" had been adopted in America and that although it was not registered here steps had been taken with a view of getting that registration effected. In 1896 the first boxes were shipped to this country, and they were marked in the same way as those which were sold in the United States. Now, it is alleged that that statement which was found upon those packages amounted to a misrepresentation so as to disentitle the plaintiffs to relief by way of injunction. How stands the law? I take it that the law is that a trader may still acquire a right to a trade-mark in the United Kingdom by user. The effect of the Trade-Marks Act is not to provide that no one shall have a trade-mark unless he register it in accordance with the Act, but only that the person using such trade-mark is not to be entitled to sue in respect of it unless he have it registered. On that I would refer to the law as laid down by Cotton, L.J., in In re Hudson, 32 Ch. D. 320, and by Chitty, L.J., in Barlow v. Johnson, 7 Rep. Pat. Cas. 404-5. Then is the statement on the goods that a particular mark is a trade-mark a misrepresentation such as will prevent the plaintiffs from exercising their rights in respect of the get-up which they would otherwise have had? Now, my attention has been called to the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, s. 105. [His lordship read sub-section 1.] Of course, if the plaintiffs were brought within the terms of that enactment they must be denied relief. And I would go further and say that by committing an offence under this section the plaintiffs might be guilty of such a misrepresentation as would not entitle them to relief in a court of equity. Now, what is the offence which the Legislature desires to punish. It is, as regards trade-marks when "Any person who describes any trade-mark applied to any article sold by him as registered which is not so." The offence is not in applying the word "trade-mark," but in representing that that trade-mark has been registered. The contrast is very strong with what is said with respect to a patent. If he represents any part of an article as patented when it is not so that is an offence. It is not said that if he represents that he has a trade-mark when it is not registered that he commits an offence. But that is not the whole of it. [His lordship read sub-section (2) of section 105.] Now, the plaintiffs have certainly not used the word "registered." Have they used any words implying that registration has been obtained? That comes very close to the general question as to whether there is such a misrepresentation as to disentitle to relief in equity. Now, it seems to me that the words in the front, "Sen Sen—Trade-mark," are susceptible of meaning that the trade-mark referred to is a trade-mark that possesses the ordinary rights and incidents, including the right to sue, and therefore implying registration; but that at the same time it has not necessarily that meaning. It may mean simply an intimation to the person intending to deal in or buy the goods, that if they desire to make sure that the goods they are buying come from the plaintiffs, they can see those words which are one indication by which the genuineness of the article may be ascertained. Now, I have no evidence before me as to the effect which this representation has had upon anybody. I have nothing before me but the bare fact that this appears. My attention has been called by Mr. Gatey to a case before Kekewich, J., of Lewis's v. Goodbody, in which in a part of the judgment the learned judge used language which possibly might be read as an indication of opinion on his part that under such circumstances it ought to be taken that there was a representation that a trade-mark existed. I have made some inquiry with respect to it, and it appears that these observations were delivered with reference to certain evidence which does not appear in the report. However that may be, I do not think that the learned judge meant to say that in any circumstances to put a name on the goods with the simple addition of the word "trade-mark" necessarily carried with it the implication that the trade-mark had been registered.

Therefore, upon the materials now before me, I am unable to come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs have been guilty of such a misrepresentation as to disentitle them to an injunction, and whatever may happen at the trial, I think that an interlocutory injunction ought to be granted. I think the proper order will be to restrain the defendant, his servants and agents, until judgment in this action or further order, from selling or offering or exposing or advertising for sale or procuring to be sold any medical preparation in the boxes, packets, or wrappers or other enclosures so got up or contrived as, by colourable imitation of the plaintiffs' boxes, packets, wrappers, or enclosures or otherwise, to be calculated to represent or lead to the belief that such preparations are of the plaintiffs' manufacture or merchandise. Costs to be costs in the action.

GUARDIANS OF STAMFORD UNION v. BARTLETT. (a.)

Poor law—Pauper lunatic—Expenses of maintenance—Arrears—Statute of Limitations (21 Jac. 1, c. 16).

W., a lunatic not so found, was maintained by the guardians of the S. Union in a pauper lunatic asylum from 1882 until her death in 1898. In 1894 W. became entitled to a share of a fund, and in 1895 a person was appointed to exercise the powers of a committee of W., but the fund was not in fact paid into court to the credit of W. until after W.'s death.

In 1895 the guardians gave notice to the Master in Lunacy of their claim in respect of the past and future maintenance of W.

After the death of W. this action was commenced by the guardians against the administratrix of W., claiming arrears of maintenance.

Held, that the expenses of maintenance was a debt of the lunatic, and that arrears of maintenance could only be recovered in respect of six years prior to the commencement of the action.

This case raised a question as to the right of guardians to recover moneys paid by them for the maintenance of a lunatic in the following circumstances.

The above-named Elizabeth Watson, who was a person of unsound mind not so found, was from 1882 until her death in 1898 maintained in a pauper lunatic asylum by the Guardians of the Stamford Union. She had no means at the time when she was admitted to the asylum, but in January, 1894, upon the death intestate of an illegitimate son in Kimberley she became under the law of Cape Colony entitled to a share in his estate. These facts were, early in 1894, communicated to the solicitors of the guardians.

By an order made in May, 1895, but not drawn up till August, 1895, under section 116 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, Mrs. Bartlett, a sister of the lunatic, was appointed to exercise the powers of a committee of the lunatic.

On the 19th of November, 1895, the solicitors to the guardians wrote to the Master in Lunacy asserting the claims of the guardians in respect of the past and future maintenance of the lunatic, and on the 21st of November, 1898, the master replied that the claims of the guardians would be borne in mind in dealing with the fund belonging to the lunatic.

(a.) Reported by W. SCOTT THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 8th of June, 1898, an order was made in Lunacy directing that a sum of £1,691 15s. 2d. should be paid into court by Mr. Greenfield, the solicitor to the person appointed in Cape Colony to represent the intestate son's estate, such sum being the balance of moneys admitted by Mr. Greenfield to have been received by him in respect of the lunatic's share of that estate.

On the 9th of June, 1898, a summons was taken out in Lunacy on behalf of the guardians claiming payment of the expenses of the past and future maintenance of the lunatic.

The lunatic died on the 11th of June, 1898.

On the 29th of June, 1898, Mr. Greenfield, in pursuance of the order of the 8th of June, 1898, duly paid into court the balance of the lunatic's said share in his hands, he being then unaware of the lunatic's death.

On the 2nd of July, 1898, letters of administration to the lunatic's estate were granted to Mrs. Bartlett.

On the 4th of July, 1898, this action was commenced by an originating summons by the guardians against Mrs. Bartlett asking for a declaration that the plaintiffs were entitled to the sums expended by them in respect of the maintenance of the lunatic for the six years immediately preceding the 1st of January, 1894, and in respect of her maintenance as from that day down to her death, and also of the sums expended by them in respect of her funeral expenses.

On the 20th of July, 1898, the defendant offered to pay to the plaintiffs all arrears of maintenance not barred by the Statute of Limitations, together with the costs of this action to that date, but such offer was declined.

By an order made in Lunacy on the 4th of August, 1898, it was by consent ordered that £1,400, part of the fund in court, should be paid to the defendant as administratrix of the lunatic, and that the residue should be carried over to the credit of this action.

Sheldon, for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs are entitled to arrears of maintenance in respect of the period of six years prior to the 1st of January, 1894, or at least for a period of six years prior to the 21st of November, 1895, when notice was given to the Master in Lunacy of their claims. Stedman v. Hart, 2 W. R. 462, Kay 607, covers the case, and shows that the Court in Lunacy would have applied the lunatic's property in payment of necessaries supplied to the lunatic without regard to the Statute of Limitations.

George Henderson, for the defendant.—The defendant relies on In re Newbegin, Eggleton v. Newbegin, 36 W. R. 69, 36 Ch. D. 477, as establishing first that the sums paid by the plaintiffs constitute a debt; and, secondly, that the lunatic might have pleaded the statute as a defence to an action brought by the guardians against her. Arrears can only be claimed in respect of six years prior to the commencement of this action. The defendant has offered to pay all that the plaintiffs are entitled to, and the plaintiffs ought to pay the defendant's costs as from the 20th of July, 1898, the date of her offer.

Sheldon replied.

The case of Brockwell v. Bullock, 37 W. R. 455, 22 Q. B. D. 567, was referred to in the judgment.

STIRLING, J.—The substantial question upon this summons is whether the plaintiffs are entitled to more than six years' arrears of maintenance of an intestate, who was a lunatic, from the date at which the summons was taken out. The defendant is the legal personal representative of the lunatic who, from a date not later than 1882, was maintained in the county lunatic asylum by the Guardians of the Stamford Union, who are the present plaintiffs. [His lordship stated the facts.]

The first question is, Do the sums expended by the guardians for the maintenance of the lunatic constitute a debt? The second is, Assuming that to be so, is the legal personal representative of the lunatic entitled to set up the Statute of Limitations? Both these questions were considered and decided by Chitty, J., in In re Newbegin's Estate. Upon the first point he came to the conclusion that there was a debt arising either by virtue of a pre-existing common law liability or by virtue of a new obligation created by statute. Upon the second point he says this: "If this is a debt apart from the statute"—he was there dealing with the Lunatic Asylums Act, 1853, which has now been replaced by the Lunacy Act, 1890—"then it follows as a matter of course that the lunatic, appearing as he does now by his guardian ad litem, is entitled to set up the Statute of Limitations, and there is no pretence, as was partly suggested in argument, for saying that this court is to administer the lunatic's estate in some such way as to pay all the debts without regard to the question of the Statute of Limitations. The lunatic is entitled to defend himself in this proceeding as if it was an action brought against him." Upon the alternative view, that the debt arose by virtue of a new obligation, he says, "the section is silent with regard to the Statute of Limitations, and it is competent for the lunatic to set it up," and he held that the guardians were not entitled to recover more than six years' arrears. That applies to the present case. The defendant is not the lunatic, but is the legal personal representative of the lunatic, and it appears to me that, no less than the lunatic herself, the legal personal representative is entitled to set up the Statute of Limitations. The only answer to the statute is that certain applications were made in Lunacy, and it is said that if the Lunacy authorities had had the fund in their control to be distributed by them they would have done what is just, and given the applicants six years' arrears from, at any rate, the 19th of November, 1895, when the letter to which I have referred was sent by the guardians to the Master in Lunacy. How that may be I do not know. I cannot say how they would have exercised their jurisdiction over that part of the estate which was in their custody. But the jurisdiction of the Lunacy authorities has ceased: the lunatic is dead, and if that is not enough, the fund has been partly paid to the legal personal representative, and partly paid into court to the credit of this action, and it appears to me that I am bound to administer it according to the law of which the Statute of Limitations forms part.

It is said that there is a decision which warrants me in holding that greater arrears can be given. That is the case of Stedman v. Hart. In that case an order was made in Lunacy by the Lord Chancellor, directing taxation of the costs of a firm of solicitors employed in prosecuting the commission in Lunacy, and subsequently as the solicitors of the committees. That order was made in 1842, but owing to the small amount of the lunatic's income the taxation was deferred, and in 1848, pending the proceedings for that purpose, the lunatic died. In 1852 a second order was made in the lunacy for taxation of the costs properly incurred by the solicitors in the lunacy to the committees, and in 1853 the solicitors filed a bill against the legal personal representatives of the lunatic for the amount found due on taxation. Wood, V.C., held that these costs constituted a debt for necessaries supplied to the lunatic, and that the Statute of Limitations was out of the way because it was a debt due to the solicitors in the lunacy who were subject to the jurisdiction of the Lord Chancellor, and would have been restrained if they had attempted to bring an action to recover these costs. The Vice-Chancellor says this: "I think that I must treat the costs incurred in this case as a debt for necessaries supplied to the lunatic, and imply a contract on the part of the lunatic for that purpose. It is argued for the defendants that in that case an action might have been brought against the lunatic, as no doubt it might, and that therefore as no proceedings have been taken for six years, nothing can prevent the operation of the Statute of Limitations to bar the claim. But I have considerable doubt whether that is the correct view in a case of this description. Suppose the lunatic had been placed in an asylum under the direction of the Lord Chancellor in Lunacy and there supplied with the necessaries of life, and that payment for these was not enforced for seven or eight years during the lunacy—would this court say that time had run against all the demands? I think that the court would take notice of these circumstances and of the certainty that the moment any action was brought the Lord Chancellor would deal with it on a petition in the matter of the lunacy. There might be some difference in the case of a common tradesman, but as regards these solicitors the Lord Chancellor in Lunacy would have perfect control over them and would not allow them to enforce their demand; and in this case he appears to have exercised his jurisdiction by ordering taxation of their costs. I think I must take judicial notice of what the Lord Chancellor would do under such circumstances." Does that reasoning apply here? I cannot see how it does. The Vice-Chancellor himself takes notice of the fact that there might be a difference in the case of a tradesman suing for goods supplied. It was established by the case of Brockwell v. Bullock that an action may be brought against a lunatic for the purpose of recovering a debt for necessaries and that a creditor is not compelled to have resort to proceedings in Lunacy. It seems to me, therefore, that as a matter of law six years' arrears only can be recovered from the date at which this summons was taken out.

On the 20th of July, 1898, an offer was made by the legal personal representative of the lunatic to pay that amount with the costs of the proceedings in the action down to that date, and I am asked to order the plaintiffs to pay the subsequent costs down to the present time. I do not think I ought to accede to that view. Undoubtedly it is a hard case, because according to the rules of simple honesty the guardians seem entitled to be recouped for the sum paid for the maintenance of the lunatic for the earlier period. But of course I am bound to decide the case according to the legal rights of the parties. At the same time, having regard to the decision of Wood, V.C., in Stedman v. Hart, I think that this was a proper case to bring before me. I do not see my way to give the plaintiffs any costs after the date of the defendant's offer, but, on the other hand, I do not think that they ought to be required to pay any costs.

THE LANCASHIRE ASYLUMS BOARD v. THE MANCHESTER CORPORATION. (a.)

Local government—Rating—Asylums board—Proportion between county and county boroughs—Assessable value—Rateable value—Principles of apportionment Agricultural Rates Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 16).

An asylums board in estimating the apportionment of the total amount necessary to be raised for the purposes of an asylums fund by contributions from the county and the county boroughs respectively, must do so in proportion to the assessable values of the county and county boroughs as ascertained by the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, and the regulations the Local Government Board issued under that Act; and not as formerly, in the proportion to the rateable value of the county and county boroughs as ascertained in accordance with section 33 (2) of the Local Government Act, 1888.

Special case stated by order, raising questions of law.

The plaintiffs claimed £359 9s. 5d. balance alleged to be due from the defendants in respect of a precept dated the 8th of November, 1897, sent by the chairman of the plaintiff board to the defendant corporation pursuant to section 26 of the Lancashire County (Lunatic Asylums and Other Powers) Act, 1891 (54 Vict. c. 20), and in accordance with the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896.

The questions for the opinion of the court were whether the asylums board, in dividing the total amount required by it to be raised by contributions for any year during the continuance of the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, was to divide that amount between the county and the county boroughs (1) in proportion to the assessable values of the county boroughs as ascertained by the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, and the regulations the Local Government Board issued under that Act; or (2) in proportion to the rateable value of the county and county boroughs, as ascertained by the Local Government Act, 1888, s. 33, sub-section 2.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the COURT was delivered by

RIDLEY, J.—The question raised by this case is whether during the continuance of the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, the Lancashire Asylums Board ought to divide the amount yearly required to be raised for their purposes in proportion to the rateable value of the county and the county boroughs as ascertained by the Local Government Act, 1888, s. 33, or in proportion to the assessable value of the same as ascertained by the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, and the regulations of the Local Government Board issued under that Act.

By the Lancashire County (Lunatic Asylums and Other Powers) Act, 1891, a board was constituted called the Lancashire Asylums Board, to which were transferred the lunatic asylums of that county; and it was provided that all expenses incurred by them in the execution of their duties should be paid out of a fund to be called the asylums fund. Section 24 deals with the raising of this fund, and is as follows: "The board shall before the first day of March in every year estimate the total amount required to be raised by contributions for the ensuing year, and shall divide that amount between the county and the county boroughs in proportion to the respective rateable values (as ascertained under section 33 of the Local Government Act, 1888) of the county and the county boroughs, and shall add to the amount apportioned to the county boroughs the sum of £4,000 or such other sum as may from time to time be fixed by agreement or by arbitration in manner provided by this Act (in this Act referred to as 'the added sum').

"The amount so apportioned, together with the added sum shall be the aggregate amount required to be contributed by the county boroughs and shall be contributed by them respectively in proportion to their respective rateable values ascertained as aforesaid."

The balance of the amount required to be raised by the Board shall be contributed by the county council. Section 33 (2) of the Local Government Act, 1888, which provides for the appointment of a joint committee appointed by the counties and the county boroughs for the ascertainment of the respective values and gives them certain powers, continues as follows: "Under these powers from 1891 to the passing of the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, the amounts required to be contributed were calculated upon the respective values of the county and the county boroughs as ascertained by this section; and the Lancashire Asylums Board under section 26 of their Act sent precepts to the county council and the borough councils for payment of the amount to be raised by each of them respectively."

It was not their duty to find the rateable values but to take them as found by the authorities and to divide the total amount required in accordance with those values.

But by the passing of the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, a different set of circumstances was constituted out of which has arisen the question now for decision. For the asylums board it is argued that it is now their duty to take as the basis of the division to be made by them "the assessable value" of the counties and county boroughs as specified by the Rating Act, 1896, in place of the rateable values as calculated under the Local Government Act, 1888. For the city of Manchester, on the other hand, it is contended that these "assessable values" have no operation except for the levying of rates, and that as the asylums board is not an authority levying rates, they ought to base their calculations on the "rateable values" found as they were before the passing of the Rating Act, 1896, which, as they contend, operates upon the amount so apportioned to each council after it is so apportioned, and not before. The difference brought about is considerable in effect; for if the contention of the asylums board is right the amount found as due from the borough councils must be largely increased in comparison with that left to be raised by the county; while, on the other hand, the boroughs, which for the most part contain little agricultural land, will receive but a small annual grant from the Local Government Board.

Since the Act of 1896 came into operation the county rate basis has been altered accordingly by the authorities, and the asylums board have, in fact, made their calculations upon this new basis instead of on the "rateable values" as they were ascertained before that Act.

We proceed to examine the provisions of the Rating Act, upon the effect of which the decision of this case depends.

By section 1 the occupier of agricultural land in England was liable to pay one-half only of the rate in the pound payable in respect of other hereditaments.

By section 2 in respect of the deficiency which will arise in the produce of rates made by the "spending authorities" there is to be paid by the Commissioner of Inland Revenue to the "local taxation account" an annual sum, and this sum is to be issued from such account in half-yearly payments of the amount certified under the provisions of the Act to each spending authority. The spending authorities are defined in a schedule to the Act to be divers bodies, such as county councils, councils of boroughs, and boards of guardians; but the term does not include the lunatic asylums board.

By section 3 any spending authority requiring to raise from two or more parishes a sum by rate is, in determining the amount to be raised, to deduct the sum issuable to them in respect of the rate on account of their share in the annual grant provided for in section 2 for the period of the rate, and to raise the net amount after making such deduction in proportion to the assessable value of these parishes. And such assessable value is to be the rateable value of each of the parishes reduced by an amount equal to one-half of the rateable value of the agricultural land in the parish.

It seems perfectly plain that the effect of this is to give the relief intended by the Act to be given to agricultural land by assessing it at half its value instead of assessing it at the full value and allowing the ratepayer to pay his rate at half the rate in the pound at which the rate is made. The same result is arrived at by one method as by the other.

Section 4 deals with the amount of the annual grant issuable as stated above, and it is not necessary to state the provisions relating to this except that it is (by the effect of this section and section 6) to be ascertained by returns made to the Local Government Board by the spending authorities of the sums received by them in the year next before the passing of the Act.

Section 5 deals with the preparation of valuation lists, and the basis or standard for any county rate, and with valuations made by borough councils for raising the borough or other rate; and it provides that where separate hereditaments are specified therein, the value of agricultural land is to be stated separately from that of any other hereditament; and that in every case the total rateable value of the agricultural land in each case shall be stated separately from the total rateable value of the other hereditaments in each parish.

It appears to us that this provision was necessary in order properly to carry out the enactments contained in section 3: for it would not be possible to get at the "assessable value" of a parish or a hereditament under the Act unless the value of the agricultural land contained in either were separately set out in the valuation list or in the county rate basis, as the case might be. That is to say, the portion of the whole value which is to be taken at half its value must be ascertained before it can be so treated, and, therefore, by this section it is provided that the valuation lists or the county rate basis is in future to contain separately the value of the agricultural land (if any) included in each hereditament or parish.

By section 6, sub-section 3, the Local Government Board has power to make regulations for carrying out the Act, to which allusion must be made; but it is desirable first to refer to the definition of "rate" contained in section 9 of the Act; and this is "a rate made during the continuance of this Act, and the proceeds of which are applicable to public purposes, and which is leviable on the basis of an assessment in respect of the yearly value of property, and includes any sum which, though obtained in the first instance by a precept certificate or other instrument requiring payment from some authority or officer, is or can be ultimately raised out of a rate as before defined."

Regulations were issued by the Local Government Board under the Act providing for the returns required, and various other matters of detail not material to this case. It is then ordered by way of carrying into effect the provision contained in section 5 of the Act, that the valuation list is to be made in a particular form shown in the schedules, with a separate column showing the rateable value of the agricultural land (if any) contained in any hereditaments and that the lists are to be in this form instead of in the form provided by the Union Assessment Committees Act, 1862, for every rate to be made hereafter.

Finally, as to the county rates, it is ordered that county councils and other councils, whose duty it is to make, for the purposes of any rate, a basis or standard of valuation, which will not contain particulars of separately-rated hereditaments, but only the total rateable value of each parish, shall cause a basis or standard or valuation to be prepared in the form set out in Schedule II.

It is further ordered that, notwithstanding anything contained in the County Rates Act, 1852, or in any other Act from the 31st of March, 1897, the values of the several parishes as shown in the column of such basis or standard or column headed "Assessable Value," &c., "shall, during the continuance of the Act, be the basis, standard, or valuation for the levying of the county rate or any other rate leviable by the council according to the assessable value of the several parishes on which the same is levied, unless or until the council shall make a new basis, standard, or valuation in manner provided by law."

It seems perfectly clear that this statute and the regulations carrying it out were intended to be comprehensive during the period of its continuance in operation. The new valuation lists and the new county rate basis are to take the place of the former ones in all respects. The Union Assessment Committees Act, 1862, the County Rate Act, 1852, and the Local Government Act, 1888, so far as they conflict with the new statute, are superseded. And it is equally clear that the rate in question is a rate within the scope of the statute.

But it was argued, as has been said, that, although this is perfectly true, the duty of the Lancashire Asylums Board still is, as it was, to divide the sum they require in proportion to the rateable value of the boroughs and county, and not according to their assessable value. That section 3 of the Rating Act, 1896, is the leading section of that Act and defines its scope, and that as the Lancashire Asylums Board is not a spending authority it has no application to them. Further, that the regulations which provide for the new county rate basis say that it is to be the basis for the levying of the rate; and that the Lancashire Asylums Board is not a levying authority, but performs a duty previous to, and quite distinct from, the levying of the rates, and that if this were held otherwise, the Act would apply twice over in relief of the agricultural ratepayer.

We do not think, however, that this argument is well founded. It is not correct to say that section 3 is the leading section of the Act or defines its application. Rather it prescribes the method by which the relief granted to the agricultural ratepayer is to be carried out. That relief is to be in respect of all rates, but by this action of the "spending authorities" it is to be obtained not by payment of half the rate, but by payment of the rate on half the value; and when the provisions of section 5 and the Local Government Board's regulations are considered it becomes clear that in all valuation lists the value of the agricultural land is to be separately stated; and, secondly, that in the county rate basis that separate value and the assessable value of the parish are to be stated, not as enacting the object of the Act, but as providing the method of carrying out that object. Reliance was placed on article 17, section 2, of the regulations because of the words which it contains, "for the levying of county rate or any other rate leviable by the council," and so forth; but we do not think that to those words can be given the effect of limiting the application of the Act.

To begin with, the regulations are "generally for carrying into effect this Act" (section 6, sub-section 3), and further, the words are contained in the same article which prescribes this assessable value or new basis to be the law, notwithstanding anything contained in any other Act. This is tantamount to saying that the new basis or assessable value is to be read in section 24 of the Lancashire Asylums Board Act, 1891; and we cannot place any more limited construction on the words without some precise indication in the Act of 1896 or the regulations that this ought to be done.

It is true that the precise position and duties of the Lancashire Asylums Board is not dealt with in the 1896 Act; but we cannot, therefore, exclude it from an Act of so general an intention. No doubt the construction so placed on the Act is favourable to agricultural land. Whether it amounts to applying the Act twice over, is a question of words, but we find in that circumstance no reason why it should not have its plain meaning. We therefore answer question 1 in the affirmative, and question 2 in the negative.

THE WEST LANCASHIRE RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL (Appellants) v. OGILVY (Respondent). (a.)

Local government—Water—Supply brought to reasonable distance from dwelling-house—Cost of communicating supply to house—Limit of cost—Liability of owner of house—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 62—Public Health (Water) Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 25), s. 3.

A rural sanitary authority brought a supply of water into a certain district and within a reasonable distance of a dwelling-house, and then required the owner of the house to make a communication of the supply to his house. The owner not complying, the local authority made the communication of the supply to the house at a cost exceeding the scale of charges which had been fixed by the Local Government Board under section 8 of the Public Health (Water) Act, 1878, for the compulsory supply of water within the district. The owner of the house having refused to pay to the authority in respect of the communication of the supply to his house more than the limit fixed by the Local Government Board,

Held, that the owner was bound to pay the whole of the cost, as the provisions of section 3 of the Public Health (Water) Act, 1878, applied only to the bringing of the supply to a reasonable distance from the house, but did not apply to the communication of the supply to the house, and that as to the latter there was no limit of cost.

Case stated by justices of the peace for the county of Lancaster.

The respondent was summoned by the West Lancashire Rural District Council, the appellants, to show cause why an order should not be made for payment by him to the appellants of the sum of £6 10s. 5d., the balance of expenses incurred by them in executing works for obtaining and furnishing a supply of water for premises situate at Holmeswood, Tarleton, in the West Lancashire Rural Sanitary District, of which premises the respondent was the owner.

The following facts were admitted:

The appellants are the local authority within the meaning of section 4 of the Public Health Act, 1875, for the rural sanitary district of West Lancashire, and the respondent is and was the owner of the dwelling-house, farm, and lands known as Shortwood Hall in that district.

In the year 1897 the appellants, acting under the powers conferred upon them by the Public Health Act, 1875, provided a supply of water for a portion of their district—namely, the township of Tarleton, in which the respondent's premises are situate, and laid down at a cost of about £340 a three-inch water main or pipe in a highway known as Marsh-lane for the supply of premises belonging to the respondent and known as Mere House, Holmeswood Hall, and Fells Farm, as well as Shortwood Hall. There was no invitation to the appellants on the part of the respondents to furnish such supply.

In order to provide a supply of water for the the respondent's premises known as Fells Farm and Shortwood Hall, the appellants laid in a public footpath leading from Marsh-lane to Fells Farm, to a point about 293 yards from Shortwood Hall, a branch main or pipe which was connected with a main or pipe in Marsh-lane. The footpath is upon land of which the respondent is the owner, and the land between such footpath and Shortwood Hall is also the property of the respondent. The mains so laid by the appellants are connected with other mains forming part of the appellants' water system to Marsh-lane, and by means of such mains water could have been furnished to Shortwood Hall had it been connected therewith by means of service pipes and the necessary fittings to such pipes.

By an order dated the 19th of June, 1897, the Local Government Board, in pursuance of section 8 of the Public Health (Water) Act, 1878, fixed a general scale of charges for the compulsory supply of water to houses within their area of that part of the West Lancashire Rural Sanitary District which comprises the township of Tarleton, and declared that the charge for a supply of water according to the scale so fixed shall be deemed to be a reasonable cost within the meaning of section 62 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and section 8 of the Public Health (Water) Act, 1878.

On the 5th October, 1897, the appellants' surveyor examined Shortwood Hall and found that it was without a proper supply of water, and he reported such fact to the appellants, and also that a proper supply of water could be furnished thereto at a cost not exceeding the scale of charges authorized by the order of the Local Government Board.

The appellants, being satisfied that Shortwood Hall was without a proper supply of water, and that such supply could be furnished thereto by them at a cost not exceeding the scale of charges authorized by the Local Government Board, resolved that notice be given to the respondent requiring him to obtain such supply, and accordingly a notice was given by them to the respondent requiring him within fourteen days to obtain a proper supply of water for his house and provide and lay a branch pipe from the appellant's main, and affix a tap thereto on his premises.

The respondent did not comply with this notice, and the appellants themselves executed the necessary works for obtaining a proper supply of water to Shortwood Hall from their main in the footpath, and in so doing they incurred expenses amounting to £19 10s. 5d. The respondent paid £13, but refused to pay the balance of £6 10s. 5d., stating that in his opinion the sum of £13 was the maximum an owner could be required to pay.

On behalf of the appellants it was contended that upon the foregoing facts they had power under section 62 of the Public Health Act, 1875, having first provided an available supply of wholesome water within about 293 yards of the respondent's premises, to require the respondent to obtain a proper supply of water to Shortwood Hall, and to execute the works necessary for that purpose, and upon his default, to execute such works themselves and recover the whole expenses incurred by them from the respondent; that with the exception of the provision that it was the appellants' duty under section 3 of the Public Health (Water) Act, 1878, to see that the respondent's house had, within a reasonable distance, an available supply of wholesome water sufficient for the consumption and use for domestic purposes of the inmates of the house, the provisions of such last-mentioned section did not apply; and that there was an available supply of such water within a reasonable distance of the respondent's house.

On behalf of the respondent it was contended that the appellants could not recover a greater sum for putting the water on the premises of the respondent than the sum of £13 paid by the respondent, being the maximum amount allowed to be charged under the provisions of the Public Health (Water) Act, 1878, and that the appellants could not in this case proceed under section 62 of the Public Health Act, 1875, but should have proceeded under section 3 of the Public Health (Water) Act, 1878.

The justices were of opinion that the effect of section 3 of the Public Health (Water) Act, 1878, was that the appellants were not entitled to recover from the respondent a greater amount than £13, and such sum having been paid by the respondent to the appellants, they dismissed the summons.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether or not the justices were right in their decision.

Section 62 of the Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), enacts: "Where on the report of the surveyor of a local authority it appears to such authority that any house within their district is without a proper supply of water, and that such a supply of water can be furnished thereto at a cost not exceeding the water rate authorized by any local Act in force within the district, . . . or at such other cost as the Local Government Board may, on the application of the local authority, determine under all the circumstances of the case to be reasonable, the local authority shall give notice in writing to the owner, requiring him within a time specified to obtain such supply, and to do all such works as may be necessary for that purpose. If such notice is not complied with within the time specified, the local authority may, if they think fit, do such works and obtain such supply, and any expenses incurred by the local authority in doing any such works may be recovered in a summary manner from the owner of the premises."

Section 3 of the Public Health (Water) Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 25), enacts: "It shall be the duty of every rural sanitary authority, regard being had to the provisions in this Act contained, to see that every occupied dwelling house within their district has within a reasonable distance an available supply of wholesome water sufficient for the consumption and use for domestic purposes of the inmates of the house. Where it appears to a rural sanitary authority, on the report of their inspector of nuisances . . . that any occupied dwelling house within their district has not such supply within a reasonable distance, and the authority are of opinion that such supply can be provided at a reasonable cost not exceeding a capital sum the interest on which . . . would amount to twopence per week, or at such other cost . . . as the Local Government Board may, on the application of the local authority, determine under all the circumstances of the case to be reasonable, and that the expense of providing the supply ought to be paid by the owner, or defrayed as private improvement expenses, proceedings may be taken as follows." The section then goes on to enact that notice may be served on the owner requiring him to provide such supply, and if he does not do so the local authority may provide the supply and recover the expenses from the owner; and section 8 enables the Local Government Board, on the application of the local authority under section 62 of the Public Health Act, 1875, to determine what is a reasonable cost within the meaning of that section.

R. Cunningham Glen, for the appellants.

Macmorran, Q.C., for the respondent.

LAWRANCE, J.—It seems to me that section 3 of the Act of 1878 does not apply in this case, because there was a supply of water within a reasonable distance, as the local authority thought. If the owner had been dissatisfied as to that his proper remedy would have been to the Local Government Board under section 268 of the Act of 1875. Section 3 does not apply, and therefore the appellants were not confined to the limit fixed by the Local Government Board. The appellants are therefore entitled to our judgment.

CHANNELL, J.—Section 62 of the Act of 1875 proceeds upon the assumption that there is already a water supply within a reasonable distance, and there being that supply within a reasonable distance, section 62 says that the owner shall make a communication from that supply to his own house and pay the cost of so doing. Section 3 of the Act of 1878 applies to a different state of things—namely, the bringing of the supply of water into the neighbourhood of the house and within a reasonable distance from the house. The cost of bringing the water within a reasonable distance of the house may be put upon the owner, as well as the cost of the communication from the mains to the house. As to the latter cost—namely, the cost of communicating the supply to the house, as in this case, there is no limit of cost. The only limit of cost in section 62 is the cost of the water, and the result is that if the local authority were to require the owner to lay on water to the house from an unreasonable distance such owner would have an appeal to the Local Government Board. We therefore say that the decision of the magistrates as to the £13 limit was wrong, and the case must go back to the magistrates for them to order the balance of the expenses to be paid.

Q. B. Div.
(Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J.) Nov. 23, 28.

WEIR & CO. v. GIRVIN & CO. (a.)

Ship — Charter-party — Advance freight — Destruction of part of cargo before sailing—Liability to pay advance freight on cargo destroyed.

By a charter-party it was provided that the charterers should load the ship with a full and complete cargo such as would load the vessel to her water-marks, and that the freight, which was to be at a certain rate per ton on the quantity delivered to the consignees, should be due and paid as follows: "Two-thirds in cash three days after sailing, ship lost or not lost, and the balance on unloading and right delivery of the cargo"; and that, "in the event of the charterers not loading vessel to her marks, the freight shall be paid on the basis of 4,350 tons, which the owners guarantee to be vessel's capacity of cargo for the voyage."

A portion of the cargo which had been loaded on board was destroyed by fire—which was a peril mutually excepted—before the sailing of the ship, and the ship sailed with other cargo on board. Three days after the sailing of the ship the shipowners claimed, but the charterers refused to pay, two-thirds advance freight on the whole cargo, including the part destroyed.

Held, that the shipowners were not entitled to the two-thirds advance freight on the part of the cargo which had been destroyed, but that they were entitled to the advance on the basis of the 4,350, less the part destroyed.

Commercial cause tried before Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., without a jury.

A charter-party dated the 31st of March, 1898, was made between the plaintiffs, as owners of a ship called The Olivebank, and the defendants, Messrs. Girvin, Roper, & Co., of London, "as agents for Girvin & Eyre, of San Francisco," the charterers; but although the defendants contracted as agents only for the charterers, they agreed to undertake responsibility in the present action.

Under this charter-party the ship was to proceed to a loading berth in the River Tyne or Tyne Dock, and there load a full and complete cargo (excluding certain specified kinds of cargo), and the cargo was to be of such a nature as would load the vessel to Lloyd's freeboard (subject to the provisions of side clause), and the vessel so loaded was to proceed therewith to San Francisco and deliver the cargo in the usual and customary manner as ordered by the consignees.

The charter-party contained the following clause: "Freight for the said cargo to be paid on final discharge at the rate of 16s., except on cargo shipped in Hull, as hereinafter provided, per ton of 2,240 lbs. on the quantity delivered to the consignees. The freight to be due and paid as follows: Two-thirds in cash, less 6 per cent. for all charges, three days after sailing from Tyne, ship lost or not lost, and the balance on unloading and right delivery of the cargo to be paid in United States gold coin at the exchange of 4 dols. 80 cents. per £ sterling"; and the peril of fire was one of the things mutually excepted.

In the margin or side of the charter-party was the following clause (referred to as the "side clause" in writing): "In event of charterers not loading vessel to her marks, it is agreed that freight shall be paid on the basis of 4,350 tons, which owners hereby guarantee to be vessel's capacity of cargo for the voyage, less pro ratâ freight on any quantity of cargo short delivered in San Francisco."

The charterers loaded on board at Hull 1,017 tons of cargo. The vessel then proceeded to the Tyne and loaded 461 tons more, when a fire broke out and the whole of the 1,478 tons of cargo already loaded was so damaged by the fire that for the purposes of this case it was treated as destroyed.

The charterers subsequently loaded 2,590 tons more, which, with the 1,478 tons destroyed, would not have brought the vessel down to her marks, though it exhausted the carrying capacity of the vessel.

The ship sailed for San Francisco, and three days after sailing the plaintiffs demanded two-thirds advance freight on the basis of the 4,350 tons, which was the basis on which freight was to be paid according to the charter-party.

The nature of the arguments appears sufficiently in the judgment; and for the defendants reference was made to the cases of Allison v. The Bristol Marine Insurance Co. (Limited). 24 W. R. 1039, 1 App. Cas. 209; Aitken, Lilburn, & Co. v. Ernsthausen & Co., [1894] 1 Q. B. 773.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 28.—Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—When this case was being discussed before me I formed rather a strong view against the contention of the plaintiffs, but the case was so strenuously argued for the plaintiffs that I thought it better to take time to consider my judgment. Having done so I still adhere to the view I formed during the argument, and I am clearly of opinion that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover.

The plaintiffs are the owners of a ship called The Olivebank, which they chartered on the 31st of March, 1898, to a firm of Girvin & Eyre, of San Francisco. I mention that in order to explain the position the defendants occupy in this case. The contract of charter-party was in fact executed by the defendants, Girvin, Roper, & Co., of London, but they are described both in the body of the charter-party and in their signatures in execution of the contract as agents for the San Francisco firm, and therefore they are not liable upon the contract at all, but the defendants have expressed that they were willing to litigate the question with which alone I have to deal in this case. That question is: Are the defendants liable to pay advance freight in respect of 1,478 tons of cargo loaded on board the chartered ship, but afterwards destroyed by a peril mutually excepted in the charter-party—namely, by fire? That is the short point. If the plaintiffs are entitled to advance freight on that 1,478 tons, then the defendants admit that they are liable to pay it. Are the defendants so liable? The charterers loaded on board this 1,478 tons; that quantity was destroyed by fire, the result being that the charterers, who were bound to supply the cargo conformably to the charter, had, quoad that 1,478 tons, fulfilled the obligations that were cast on them. The shipowners had, quoad that 1,478 tons, fulfilled the obligation cast upon the ship, because they had taken it on board intending to carry it. The result was that the charterers were under no obligation to substitute other 1,478 tons for that quantity when destroyed, nor, on the other hand, were the shipowners under any obligation to accept from the charterers that 1,478 tons, even if the charterers had been willing to supply it. The result in point of law on that state of facts is the same as if the charter had been a charter of the carrying capacity of the ship, less 1,478 tons, assuming that it was a charter, as it was in this case, of the whole capacity of the ship. The further result is, that the shipowners, not being obliged to take goods in substitution of that quantity, had that cargo space at their own disposal, and might use it in any way they chose consistent with their remaining obligations under the charter. The point, therefore, is this. Are the plaintiffs entitled to an advance of two-thirds of the freight on that 1,478 tons, although it is conceded that they never would be entitled to a single penny of freight on that part? Their claim is that they are entitled to an advance of two-thirds freight on that 1,478 tons, although ex concessis they never will earn, and therefore never will be entitled to receive, any freight at all in respect of that 1,478 tons. That contention for the plaintiffs must depend on the construction of the charter-party itself. Freight is a payment to be made to the ship for the carriage and safe delivery of the goods; and until there has been carriage and delivery, the ship is not entitled to demand or recover freight at all, in the absence of circumstances giving rise to an altered state of things out of which there may be implied obligations. The parties, however, may make for themselves any agreement they choose, and they may make a stipulation that the whole freight is to be payable the moment the cargo is put on board, or that the whole is to be paid the moment the ship sails, or to be paid in any proportion or at any time they choose; but if they do so they must do it in a way which makes it very clear that the obligation is altered from that which is the obligation in respect to freight on the principle I have mentioned. It is very common and often very convenient to stipulate in charter-parties for an advance of freight.

I now turn to the charter-party, which is a charter-party of The Olivebank, which is to load at Hull or in the Tyne, and then sail to San Francisco. After the enumeration of the different articles of which the cargo may consist, these words are introduced, which are important as showing the meaning of the clause on which this controversy mainly turns—namely, "subject to the provisions of side clause." Then there is the stipulation in the charter-party as to the freight, and if it stood there it is clear that the freight stipulated was to be paid on each ton weight of the quantity delivered to the consignees at San Francisco, and no right to any freight would accrue until those events had happened. Then follows the stipulation that the freight is to be due and paid as follows, "two-thirds in cash three days after sailing from Tyne, ship lost or not lost." There is here, therefore, an express stipulation that the freight as to two-thirds shall be paid, that is, that there shall be an advance of freight to the extent of two-thirds, less 6 per cent. charges, three days after the sailing of the ship, ship lost or not lost. Then finally there is this clause (written at the side): "In the event of charterers not loading vessel to her marks it is agreed that freight shall be paid on the basis of 4,350 tons, which owners hereby guarantee to be vessel's capacity of cargo for the voyage." What was the object to which that side clause was mainly directed? I have pointed out that the charterers might have loaded one or more commodities differing largely in weight, so that it might happen that unless some protection was given to the ship—the freight being per ton weight—the charterers might load the ship in a way that would not bring her down to her load lines, in which the cargo when delivered would work out at a comparative small number of tons weight, although the ship's space might be fully occupied by the cargo. The main object, therefore, of that clause is to protect the shipowners from having an unduly light cargo loaded on board, and to ensure that they shall have a cargo to the dead weight capacity of the ship. Accordingly a clause is introduced that the freight is to be paid on the basis of 4,350 tons. The plaintiffs say that although the

1,478 tons is gone out of the charter, and although they (the plaintiffs) can never earn a penny of freight in respect of that quantity, yet, under this clause, as it provides that freight is to be on the basis of 4,350 tons, they are entitled to have their advance calculated on that basis. The short answer to that contention is that by the events which have happened before the moment arrived when the plaintiffs were entitled to any advance at all, the 1,478 tons had dropped out of the charter, and there was a disturbance therefore of that basis, so that by causes for which neither party is responsible—namely, by fire, which was one of the mutual exceptions in the charter-party, and which applies to shipowners and charterers alike—causes which relieve the charterers, the basis is 4.350 tons, less that quantity of 1,478 tons. Advance freight is ordinarily calculated, where there are no more definite data for calculation, upon what the probable freight will be assuming the success of the adventure and the safe arrival of the cargo. Here in one event, and in one event only, is that mode of calculation displaced. That event is that, by the stipulation that the freight is to be paid three days after the ship sails, lost or not lost, the plaintiffs would be entitled to demand their two-thirds freight, although the ship having been lost they would otherwise not be entitled to any freight at all on the ship's arrival. It seems to me that the short answer to that is, that is a case so expressly provided for that effect must be given to it; but it does not at all affect the construction of the clause or the liabilities of the parties in the event which has happened in this case—namely, an event which has happened before the ship has sailed at all. I agree that we are to take as the original basis for calculation of advance freight the 4,350 tons; but, in my view, we are to deduct from that the 1,478 tons destroyed by an excepted cause, which would leave a balance of 2,872 tons to load. In my judgment the plaintiffs are entitled, and entitled only, to two-thirds of the freight on 2,872 tons. The defendants, who, as I have pointed out, were not under any obligation at all under the charter, had paid into court on the basis of 2,590 tons, and therefore they have paid in 282 tons short, because it is conceded that the quantity put on board—namely, 2,590 tons, which were loaded, together with the 1,478 tons which were destroyed, would not bring the ship down to her marks within the meaning of the clause. The defendants therefore ought to have increased their payment into court by two-thirds of the freight on 282 tons more; but as by the assent of both parties the sole question to be determined was whether the defendants were liable to pay two-thirds freight in respect of the 1,478 tons destroyed, and as I come to the conclusion that they were not, the defendants are in my opinion entitled to judgment in the ordinary way.

(Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., and Wills, Grantham, Day, Lawrance, and Wright, JJ.) — Dec. 10.

THE QUEEN v. SENIOR. (a.)

Criminal law—Manslaughter—Infant child—Neglect to provide medical aid—Religious belief that medical aid is wrong—Wilful neglect—Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 41), s. 1.

Section 1 of the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1894, enacts that "If any person over the age of sixteen years, who has the custody, charge, or care of any child under the age of sixteen years, wilfully . . . neglects . . . such child . . . in a manner likely to cause such child unnecessary suffering or injury to its health, . . . that person shall be guilty of a misdemeanour."

On the trial of an indictment for manslaughter it was proved that the prisoner was the father and had the custody of a child of the age of eight or nine months; that the child died of diarrhœa and pneumonia; that during its illness the prisoner, though aware of the gravity of its condition, had not provided it with any medical aid or medicine; that he had the means to do so; that he belonged to a sect called the "Peculiar People," who think it contrary to the teaching of the Bible to use medical aid or drugs for the sick; that the prisoner employed an experienced nurse, also a member of that sect, to nurse the child; that he was in other respects a kind father; and that the child's life would have been prolonged and probably saved if medical assistance had been procured. The prisoner was convicted.

Held, that there was evidence that the prisoner had "wilfully neglected" the child within the meaning of the above section, and that, death having ensued from such neglect, the prisoner was properly convicted of manslaughter.

Case stated by Wills, J., as follows:

The prisoner was indicted and tried before me at the Central Criminal Court on the 24th of November, 1898, for the manslaughter of his child—an infant of the age of eight or nine months.

The child had died of diarrhœa and pneumonia. The prisoner had not supplied it with any medical aid or medicine, though aware that the case was of great gravity and that the child would probably die. The medical evidence was that the child's life would certainly have been prolonged, and in all probability saved, if medical assistance had been procured. No question was raised as to the prisoner's ability to procure and pay for medical assistance, and it was shown that he earned about 35s. a week. He was shown to have been a good and kind father in all other respects, and he bore an excellent character for general good conduct. He had had twelve children, of whom seven were dead; and he had had before experiences of the same kind as those relating to the present inquiry, for the question he put to the inspector of police was "Except in regard to this case," and he then corrected himself, "Except in regard to these cases, have you ever known anything against me?"

The prisoner is a member of a sect called the "Peculiar People," whose religious doctrines as to the treatment of sick people are certainly to the ordinary apprehension remarkable. They base them upon the Epistle of St. James, chapter v., 14th and 15th verses: "Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord: and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him." They do not allege that medical aid is here expressly forbidden, but say that to make use of it is to indicate a want of faith in the Lord. I inquired if they held that any other parts of the Scriptures—the Gospels, for instance, were of divine authority, and was answered that the Gospels certainly were so recognized. I called attention to the fact that our Lord said: "They that are whole need not a physician, but they that are sick," and asked why they thought that it could be wrong to consult a physician if the sick man was pronounced on such authority to need a physician. The answer was that the sickness here alluded to was moral sickness or sin, and that the Physician meant our Lord himself.

I inquired further if they held that it was wrong to give extra food or wine or brandy to a sick person, or to put an extra blanket on his bed if the weather were cold or the nature of his sickness required him to be kept warm. The answer was, No; that they give the sick every species of comfort; and it appears that this child had had much attention paid to its food and diet, though the medical witnesses did not think the dietary altogether judicious; and that it had had brandy administered. I inquired also if they objected to experienced nursing. They said No, and that they resorted to it and did so in the case of this child, but that the nursing must be by one of their own people who would not use drugs.

It thus appears distinctly that they do not object to the use of many human appliances and efforts to save the sick, but that they draw the line at the doctors and drugs, and I think at doctors not so much on account of their superior knowledge of the human frame and its needs as because they are likely to use or prescribe drugs.

I told the jury that they must first of all be satisfied that the death of the child had been caused or accelerated by the want of medical assistance; and secondly, that medical aid and medicine were such essential things for the child that reasonably careful parents in general would have provided them; and thirdly, that the prisoner's means would have enabled him to do so without an expenditure such as could not be reasonably expected from him. I then directed them upon the more difficult part of the case, and told them that in order to make out a case of manslaughter by negligence of this kind purely at common law the negligence must be gross and wanton, so much so as to indicate something, at all events, of an evil mind, and that it was impossible to say that of the prisoner, who was shown to have spared neither expense nor care, and to have taken in all respects but one every precaution to do the best for the child. But I added that if he had done anything which was expressly forbidden by statute, and by so doing had caused or accelerated the child's death, he would be guilty of manslaughter, no matter what his motive or state of mind. I read to them the provisions of the statute 31 & 32 Vict. c. 122, s. 37 (Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868), which provided that "when any parent shall wilfully neglect to provide adequate food, clothing, medical aid, or lodging for his child, being in his custody under the age of fourteen years, whereby the health of the child shall have been or shall be likely to be seriously injured, he shall be guilty of an offence," and said that had that statute been in force the case would have admitted of no doubt; but I told them it had been repealed by the statute for the prevention of cruelty to and the better protection of children 52 & 53 Vict. c. 44, s. 18, and that the enactment now in force was contained in section 1 of the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 41), which provides that "If any person over the age of sixteen years who has the custody, charge, or care of any child under the age of sixteen years wilfully assaults, illtreats, neglects, abandons, or exposes such child . . . in a manner likely to cause such child unnecessary suffering or injury to its health . . . that person shall be guilty of a misdemeanour," and that therefore if the prisoner had brought himself within that statute and the child had died in consequence, he would have caused the death of the child by a course of conduct forbidden by statute and therefore unlawful, and would be guilty of manslaughter.

I said there could be no doubt that the prisoner had wilfully and deliberately abstained from calling in medical assistance, though he and those about the child were aware for some considerable period before its death that it was in a state of great danger, and that therefore the question was narrowed down to whether his failure to procure medical aid could be called "neglecting the child in a manner likely to cause injury to its health."

I pointed out that the language was very different to that of the repealed enactment, and said that neglect was not a word of art, but a word of ordinary English, that the standard of neglect varied as time went on, and that many things might be legitimately looked upon as evidences of neglect in one generation which would not have been thought so in a preceding generation, and that regard must be had to the habits and thoughts of the day. I told them that it was for the jury to say whether any particular state of things which might be established came up to the description of "neglecting," not to do a specific thing, as to supply medicine, in which case it would mean very little more than omitting or failing to do it, but to "neglecting a child," which is a very different thing, always bearing in mind that it must be to such a degree and in such a manner as to endanger its health.

The jury found the prisoner guilty, adding that they considered medical aid and medicine to have been necessary for the child, but that they were of opinion that the prisoner had done all that he could in the best interests of the child except in not providing medical aid and medicine.

I said nothing to the jury as to whether the prisoner was acting bonâ fide and according to his conceptions of duty because the learned counsel had in his opening speech said that it was not in question that he was so doing.

The prisoner was not represented by counsel. I had not the advantage of any argument on his behalf as to the meaning of "wilfully neglects" in the Act, and I therefore reserved the case for the opinion of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved.

The questions for the opinion of the court are whether my direction was right in law, and, if so, whether there was evidence upon which the jury could properly convict the prisoner. If both these questions are answered in the affirmative the conviction is to stand. If either is answered in the negative the conviction is to be quashed.

The prisoner was released on bail pending the decision of this court.

Henry Sutton, for the prisoner.—The prisoner having done all that his conscience permitted him to do for the child could not be guilty of neglect. He had provided a nurse for the child and everything except drugs and medical attendance; these he did not provide because of his religious belief. At common law the indictment would not lie, because a father was not obliged to provide medical attendance or drugs for his child: Reg. v. Hines, 80 C. C. Sessions Papers, per Pigott, B., at p. 312; Reg. v. Wagstaffe, 10 Cox C. C. 530; Reg. v. Hurry, 76 C. C. Sessions Papers 63. Nor was the prisoner guilty of the statutory offence of wilfully neglecting his child. Section 37 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868, which made it an offence to wilfully neglect to provide medical aid for a child to the injury of its health, was repealed by 52 & 53 Vict. c. 44, s. 18. The words "medical aid" are omitted from that statute and from the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1894, which repealed it and is now in force. In Reg. v. Downes, 24 W. R. 278, 1 Q. B. D. 25, a conviction was upheld because of the words of the now repealed enactment of 1868.

Horace Avory, for the Crown, was not called on to argue.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—In this case we have to deal with a case stated by my brother Wills, on the trial of the defendant on a charge framed with reference to the statute 57 & 58 Vict. c. 41. The first question is whether the learned judge was right in his direction to the jury as to what constitutes wilful neglect, and the second question is whether there was any evidence on which the jury could convict the defendant of wilful neglect. [His lordship read section 1 of 57 & 58 Vict. c. 41.] It is useful to refer to the history of the legislation upon the subject. By section 37 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 122, which is a statute dealing with the relief of the poor, it was enacted that any parent who wilfully neglected to provide adequate food, clothing, medical aid, or lodging for his child being in his custody under the age of fourteen years, whereby the health of such child was likely to be seriously injured, was guilty of an offence. Therefore it became under that statute the duty of a parent to provide medical aid, for his children. The statute was followed by a statute of 1889 with which it is not necessary to deal. It is important to remember that the statute of 1868 was passed after the judgment of Willes, J., in Reg. v. Wagstaffe, 10 Cox C. C. 530, that judgment having been given in January while the statute received the Royal Assent on the 31st of July. That statute was repealed by an Act of 1889, with which it is unnecessary to deal, for it was itself repealed by the statute of 1894. Now, there is a great difference in the wording of the Acts of 1868 and 1894, for in the latter Act the words "medical aid" are dropped. It is difficult to believe that the Legislature was taking a retrograde step, for the statute shows that it was passed in consequence of increased anxiety for the welfare of children. In the present case it is not disputed that the child was in a dangerous state to the knowledge of the parent. It is not disputed and the jury have found that its life might have been saved if medical assistance had been given; that the parent was in a position to provide medical aid; further, that the parent did not give medical aid because he believed that to do so would be a want of faith in the methods which he believed to be prescribed by the Bible; that otherwise he was an attentive parent; and lastly, that the child died. These being the facts, the learned judge charged the jury as follows: "I told the jury that they must first of all be satisfied that the death of the child had been caused or accelerated by the want of medical assistance. Secondly, that medical aid and medicine were such essential things for the child that reasonably careful parents in general would have provided them; and thirdly, that the prisoner's means would have enabled him to do so without an expenditure such as could not be reasonably expected from him." Was that direction substantially right? I think it was. The words are, if a person "wilfully neglects." It seems to me very clear what this phrase means: "wilfully" means deliberately, and not by inadvertence, and "neglect" means the omission to do something for the benefit of the child—in other words, intentional failure to take those steps which the experience of mankind shows to be generally necessary. In these days the resources of medical science are within the reach of the humblest and the poorest. It has been argued before us, that because the father was an affectionate parent and neglected to provide nothing for the child except the medical aid which its condition urgently required he could not be held to be guilty of wilful neglect. When a child breaks its thighbone and an operation is necessary, but in the highest degree dangerous while the child is in a state of consciousness, would the father be guilty of neglect if he refused to permit the administration of an anæsthetic drug? I think that in such a case the parent would properly be convicted. I dissent entirely from the view said to have been expressed by Pigott, B., in Reg. v. Hines, 80 C. C. Sessions Papers, p. 312, and I think that in this case an indictment for gross and culpable neglect could be supported at common law.

WILLS, J.—This is a case of a class which so frequently comes before the judges that I thought it well to state the case in order that an authoritative decision might be delivered on the point.

GRANTHAM, J.—I agree with the judgment of my lord. I think it would be well to break up the section, and to put to the jury a question founded on the last part of the section. Was something left undone which ought to have been done? Was there an action of the will brought to bear on his conduct by the father of the child as to whether or not he should do that thing? If his conduct was intentional it was wilful; if he wilfully left the thing undone how is it possible to say that he was not guilty of wilful neglect? For these reasons I think that the summing up of the learned judge was right.

DAY, LAWRANCE, and WRIGHT, JJ., concurred.

Conviction affirmed.

In re MILNER.
MILNER v. BRAY. (a.)

Power—Special power of appointment—Exercise by will—"Give, bequeath, and appoint"—Bequests to persons not objects of power.

In determining whether a testator has exercised by will a power of appointment, the court will look at the will to discover therefrom evidence of the testator's intention, and if it finds therein a general expression of intention to exercise the power, it will not infer a contrary intention from such circumstances as bequests to persons not objects of the power.

A testatrix had, under her father's will, a power of appointment in favour of her husband. By her will she bequeathed certain legacies out of "my separate estate or out of the estate and effects over which I have any disposing power," and gave, bequeathed, and appointed all the residue of her estate and effects to her husband.

Held, that the power was exercised.

This was a summons raising a question whether a testatrix had exercised by her will a special power of appointment.

Under the will of her father, Henry Milner, his daughter, Mrs. Bray, had power to appoint a life interest in certain funds to her husband. By her will dated the 16th of November, 1882, she bequeathed as follows: "I bequeath the following legacies out of my separate estate or out of the estate and effects over which I have any disposing power, all free from legacy duty." She then specified the legacies, and proceeded: "I give, bequeath, and appoint all the residue of my estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever unto my husband . . . absolutely."

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mrs. Bray died on the 20th of July, 1883, leaving her husband her surviving. The question was whether she has exercised in his favour the special power conferred on her by her father's will.

P. B. Lambert, for the summons.

Beaumont, for the husband.—The testatrix's will operates as an exercise of the power. It begins with a clear expression of intention to exercise every power. The general principle is that where a will purports to exercise powers of appointment without saying what powers, it is to be assumed that the intention was to execute special powers if the disposition of the property would thus be rendered effectual. The court ought not to be readily deterred from applying this principle. [Upjohn, Q.C., referred to In re Williams, Foulkes v. Williams, 42 Ch. D. 93, 37 W. R. Dig. 137, and also cited In re Huddleston, Bruno v. Eyston, 43 W. R. 139, [1894] 3 Ch. 595, as to the inadmissibility of evidence that the testatrix had no other power of appointment.] In re Williams, as well as the other cases relied on by the other side, was a case in which there was a general residuary devise and bequest, but here the testatrix has used the word "appoint."

He referred to Clogstoun v. Walcott, 13 Sim. 523; Ferrier v. Jay, 18 W. R. 1130, L. R. 10 Eq. 550; In re Teape's Trusts, 21 W. R. 780. L. R. 16 Eq. 442; Thornton v. Thornton. L. Upjohn, Q.C., and M. Romer, for the next-of-kin of the testatrix.—The power here is to appoint in favour of the husband. The bequests here are not in favour of the husband, and consequently are not in favour of objects of the power. In no case has the mere use of the word "appoint" been held enough to show an intention to exercise the power, and wherever the word "absolutely" has occurred, the court has been able to give effect to the disposition by saying that the word "absolutely" was used by the testator in referring to his own property. Here the word "appoint" is not enough in itself, and a contrary intention is shown by the use of the word "absolutely."

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 22.—STIRLING, J., stated the facts as above, and continued: It is stated, and for the present purpose I assume, that this power was the only testamentary power to which Mrs. Bray was entitled. This is a circumstance which has in many cases been held to afford evidence, of considerable cogency, of an intention to exercise such a power: see Pidgely v. Pidgely, 1 Coll. 255; Banks v. Banks, 1 W. R. 511, 17 Beav. 352; In re Teape's Trusts; In re Swinburne. It was contended that evidence of the fact was inadmissible, regard being had to the decisions in In re Mills, In re Williams, and In re Huddleston, but all of these cases are directed to a different point and were not intended, so far as I can see, to overrule the series of cases just referred to, not one of which is mentioned in the judgments of any one of the learned judges by whom those decisions were given. The rule applicable to cases of this sort is thus stated by Pearson, J., in Von Brockdorff v. Malcolm, 33 W. R. 934, 30 Ch. D. 172, in a passage cited with approval by North, J., in In re Cotton, Wood v. Cotton, 37 W. R. 232, 40 Ch. D. 41. [His lordship then read Pearson, J.'s, judgment on p. 179 of 30 Ch. D.: "The simple question is . . . except what you find in his will?" and continued:] In applying a rule of this kind little assistance is to be got from decisions on wills differing in form and expression. I may state, however, that where a will is found containing a general expression of intention to execute any disposing power to which the testator may be entitled, the court has repeatedly refused to infer the contrary intention from such circumstances as a direction to pay debts or personal expenses or legacies or bequests in favour of persons not objects of the power. As to this, in addition to the cases already mentioned, I may cite Cowx v. Foster, Ferrier v. Jay, Thornton v. Thornton, and Price v. Price, 46 L. T. Rep. 228, 30 W. R. Dig. 150. In re Cotton is the strongest case in which, in recent times at all events, the contrary intention has been held to be sufficiently indicated.

In the present case the circumstances relied on as showing an intention not to exercise the power are, first, that not one of the legatees is an object of the power; and, secondly, that all that is given to the husband is the residue of the testatrix's estate and effects. Still she does at the commencement of the will indicate an intention to exercise the power vested in her as well as dispose of her own estate, and by the use of the word "appoint" in addition to "give," "bequeath," she seems to me to show that that intention extended to what she describes as the residue of her estate and effects. On the whole, applying the rule stated as well as I can, I am of opinion that the power has been exercised.

Inclosure Act—Construction—Owner of mines—Owners of surface—Right to sink pits—Buildings affixed to surface.

Where, under an Inclosure Act, full enjoyment of the minerals under the common inclosed is reserved to the owner of the soil, it must be held that the intention of the Legislature was to confer on the owner all powers which are reasonably necessary for him to win, work, and carry away the minerals. The owner of mines is, therefore, entitled to sink pits and erect buildings for the purpose of working the pits on any part of the inclosed common, though he is not justified in destroying or using existing buildings which are the property of the surface owners.

Bell v. Love, 10 Q. B. D. 547, 31 W. R. Dig. 33, 32 W. R. 725, 9 App. Cas. 286, considered.

This was a special case stated for the opinion of the court under ord. 34, r. 1. It raised a question as to how far owners of minerals lying under a common were entitled to use the surface of the common for the purpose of working the minerals.

The facts were as follow: In 1764 one William Campbell was entitled, as owner of an ancient freehold estate called Dicken House, to rights of common over Crook and Billy-row Common, in the parish of Brancepeth, in the county of Durham.

By an Inclosure Act, 4 Geo. 3, c. 45, the common was inclosed and divided among one Farrer Wren, the owner of the soil and royalties of the common and the several persons entitled to rights of common, including William Campbell, who received an allotment of some forty-seven acres to be held by him, his heirs and assigns, as part and parcel of his ancient freehold estate.

The plaintiffs were the successors in title of William Campbell both as to his ancient freehold estate and the allotment.

The Inclosure Act, s. 15, provided that nothing therein contained "shall prejudice, lessen, or defeat the right, title, and interest of the said Farrer Wren of, in, or to the royalties incident or belonging to the said common of Crook and Billy-row aforesaid, but that the said Farrer Wren, his heirs and assigns, and all and every person and persons claiming under or in trust for him or them as owner or owners of the royalties of such common, and all succeeding owners thereof for the time being shall, and may at all times for ever hereafter, hold and enjoy all rents, perquisites, profits, mines, quarries, waifs, estrays, and other royalties and jurisdictions whatsoever to the owner of the royalties of the said common incident, appendant, and belonging or appertaining" (other than such common quarries, liberty of digging clay, and right of common as could or might be claimed by him or them respectively as owner or owners of the soil and inheritance of the said common or otherwise in and upon the said common so to be inclosed as aforesaid) in as full, ample, and beneficial manner to all intents and purposes as he or they could or might have held and enjoyed the same in case this Act had not been made."

Section 16.—"Provided always, and it is hereby further enacted and declared by the authority aforesaid, that in case the said Farrer Wren or the owner or owners for the time being of the royalties of the said vill, village, or township, or any person or persons claiming under him or them shall after such inclosure made as aforesaid work any mine or mines lying within or under any of the said allotments or inclosures, then and in such case such person or persons so working the same shall make reasonable satisfaction for the damage and spoil of ground occasioned thereby to the person or persons who shall be in possession of such ground at the time or times of such damage or spoil."

The defendants were lessees of the mines and minerals under the common by virtue of leases granted to them by the successors in title of Farrer Wren, and were entitled to exercise all rights reserved to Farrer Wren under the Inclosure Act in respect of such mines and minerals. By an agreement of the 12th of February, 1881, the plaintiffs leased to the defendants the coal under Dicken House with power for the defendants to use the surface of their allotment for winning, working, or leading away either the Dicken House minerals or the minerals out of any adjoining royalty. The defendants, or their predecessors in title, had sunk two pits on the allotment, and also erected thereon engine-houses, engines, shops, a reservoir, and other works for winning and working coal. The agreement of the 12th of February, 1881, came to an end on the 13th of May, 1896, and the defendants after that date made arrangements for working the coal underlying other parts of the common, not being a part of the plaintiffs' allotment. The defendants claimed by virtue of the Inclosure Act (s. 15) the right to go upon the surface of the allotment at all times for all purposes incidental to the using of and to use the pits and shafts and the works on the allotment to win, work, and carry away coal and other minerals lying and being under and within the allotment, and also lying and being under and within other parts of the common. The plaintiffs contended that the Inclosure Act did not give the defendants the right to use the surface of the allotment for any of such purposes, and that the right of the defendants (if any) to use the surface of the allotment for colliery purposes was limited to purposes connected with the winning, working, and carrying away of coals or other minerals lying under or within the allotment, and not for the purpose of winning, working, or carrying away coal or other minerals lying within or under land other than the allotment. The defendants, on the other hand, contended that they were entitled under the Inclosure Act to use the surface of the allotment for all purposes incidental to the winning, working, and carrying away of coal lying under the common. The court was asked to decide whether the defendants were entitled to use the surface of the allotment and the works thereon for any and, if so, what purposes.

Upjohn, Q.C., and Manisty, for the plaintiffs.—Primâ facie the surface owner has a right to the enjoyment of his property, and the burden is on the mine owner to show the contrary. The defendants are entitled to do only such acts as do not interfere with the enjoyment of the surface by the plaintiffs and their tenants. The right claimed is in the nature of an easement, and such an easement can only be established by express words of grant or right of necessity. Here the right claimed is under the words of reservation. The compensation clause does not increase the rights reserved by the reservation clause. The large quantity of land allotted to the lord by way of compensation for his interest in the soil shows that he was only to have surface access to the mines from land in his own possession.

They referred to Buccleugh (Duke) v. Wakefield, L. R. 4 H. L. 377, 18 W. R. H. L. Dig. 10; London and North-Western Railway v. Evans, 41 W. Grosvenor Woods, Q.C., and Meek, for the defendants.—Section 15 operates as a parliamentary conveyance of surface reserving to former owner full enjoyment of mines and minerals together with powers of working the same, subject only to giving reasonable satisfaction for the time being to the occupier of the surface damaged. Clause 16 is merely the usual compensation clause. We submit that power of working is not limited to way of necessity, but includes all reasonable powers.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 4.—STIRLING, J., after stating the facts, continued: It is to be observed that question 1 of the special case is directed to the use "of the surface of the allotment and the said works thereon," those works being existing works. Nothing is said in the special case as to the right to sink additional pits or the right of making spoil banks upon any parts of the property. It was admitted by the learned counsel for the defendants that the defendants intended to sink additional pits, and he was willing that the opinion of the court should be taken as to that right, but he did not consent to any amendment of the case or to giving the court power to decide any question as to the right to deposit the spoil. Under those circumstances I propose to discuss, as indeed I think I cannot avoid discussing, the question as to the right of sinking pits, but as to the right of depositing spoil I say nothing.

Now, the question turns on the conditions of the Inclosure Act, and it is necessary shortly to refer to those. [His lordship read the Act, and continued:] I may first notice a contention on behalf of the plaintiffs which was placed before me in a short and very forcible argument by Mr. Manisty, that section 15 operates as a mere reservation of the ownership without any grant of working rights, and that no working rights in consequence belonged to those in whose favour a reservation is made, except such as are necessary in a legal sense for the enjoyment of the mines. He pointed out that a return had been made of a considerable portion of the common to the lord of the manor, and that no case of necessity had been made out, and as to clause 16 the contention was that its object was to compel the owners of the minerals to make compensation in case such rights of necessity existed.

In my opinion this contention is not well founded. It appears to me to give too little effect to the strong words at the close of the section, and to be contrary to the opinion expressed, at all events by the majority of the learned judges who had to consider the case of Bell v. Love, which I shall presently have to deal with. As regards clause 16, it is to be remarked that it is unusual in Acts of Parliament of this description to provide compensation for the exercise of common law rights, such as rights of necessity would be, and for that I desire to refer to the observation to that effect of Lord Esher, the late Master of the Rolls, in the case Attorney-General v. The Welsh Granite Co.

The main further contention on the part of the plaintiffs was that these words were not sufficient on their true construction to confer on the defendants the rights claimed by them. Reference was made on both sides at very considerable length to the law laid down by the various courts before whom came the case of Bell v. Love. In that case the point to be decided was whether under somewhat similar words in another Inclosure Act the owner of the minerals was entitled to work so as to let down the surface. The effect of the clause was very much considered by all the judges who dealt with the case, and I do not propose to read very much of what was said, but I think it desirable I should refer to a few passages in each of the judgments which were given. In that case the Inclosure Act provided that the dean and chapter, who were owners of soil of a common inclosed, and their successors and so forth, might thereafter enjoy amongst certain other things all mines in as full, ample, and beneficial a manner as if to all intents and purposes the Act had not been made. Then it was provided "that in case the dean and chapter, or their successors, shall make use of or work any mines, and so forth, such persons so working the mines shall make satisfaction for any damage or spoil of ground occasioned thereby to the person or persons in possession of such ground, and such damage is to be ascertained with the limitation that it is not to exceed £5 yearly during the time of working of such mine, or continuing or using the ways for every acre of ground damaged or spoiled"; so that a limit was placed upon the amount of compensation in that case which does not exist in the present case, and that is referred to by some of the learned judges. At p. 566 (10 Q. B. D.) Baggallay, L.J., states the conclusion at which he arrives with regard to determining the rights of the parties. He says this: "Upon the whole I have come to the conclusion that the rights reserved by this proviso to the dean and chapter or other the owners for the time being of the royalties of the manor are the fullest and most ample rights of getting the minerals underlying the several allotments of portions of the moor which are consistent with the tenure by which such allotments are held, but that such rights do not extend to authorize them, in getting such minerals, to disturb or let down the surface of freehold allotments." At p. 570 the present Master of the Rolls, then Lindley, L.J., says: "Construing the statute by the light of former decisions I am of opinion that the short legal effect of the Act is to convert the commoners into owners of the surface, subject to such rights of interference as are clearly reserved to or conferred by the Act upon the lords of the manor. On the other hand the Act reserves to the lords the mines and the right to hold and enjoy them as owners, but with no additional rights except such as are clearly reserved or conferred by the Act itself, and I cannot find any right to let down the surface reserved or conferred in sufficiently clear language to justify the lords in so working their mines as to let the surface down." In the House of Lords at p. 291 of 9 App. Cas., Lord Selborne says this: "What is there in that clause of reservations which can possibly be relied on as depriving the freeholder to whom an allotment has been made of the right of support to his freehold? The only words which have been insisted upon as capable of having that effect are the words 'in as full, ample, and beneficial manner to all intents and purposes as they could or might have held and enjoyed the same' (which means, as I understand it, held and enjoyed those rights, titles, and interests which are reserved) "if this Act had not been made." Applying that to the mines, although it is not more applicable to the mines than to any other subject, I quite agree that it at least carries so much as this, that they were with the mines to have all usual powers and surface privileges for working them. Suppose that in the clause of reservation these words had been expressly inserted "reserving the mines and minerals with all usual powers and surface privileges for working them," would that have given a right to let down the surface? Would that have destroyed the freeholder's right of support? I apprehend that it clearly would not. At the bottom of p. 292 he expresses his agreement with what Baggallay, L.J., had said in the Court of Appeal. His lordship says: "I quite agree with what Baggallay, L.J., in the Court of Appeal, suggested on that subject—namely, that the substituted rights are not given with power to the lord to take them away, which he could not have done with regard to the original rights, and that this reservation if it stood alone must be construed subject to the surface rights of the person to whom the allotment had been made."

Then at p. 293 he deals with the words of the proviso, and continues: "It is contended, however, that the usual powers of working mines do involve some right of interference with the surface; and that is contemplated by this proviso. But why should more be contemplated? What word is there which shows more than this, that it is contemplated that in the working of mines as well as in the use of way-leaves, there may be some interference with the surface in respect of which compensation is to be made? That would necessarily follow from the usual powers of working; but this consequence which is now sought to be established would not follow from the usual powers of working. Why, therefore, should it be supposed to follow, because the effects on the surface which are contemplated are provided for by way of compensation? The whole proviso, in my opinion, is satisfied by ordinary surface damage, such as might arise from the exercise of usual working powers."

Lord Watson, at p. 298, in the course of his judgment, says: "No compensation is provided to the owner of the surface, who is not in the personal occupation of it during the time of working, though his property may be permanently injured; and, even if he does occupy himself, he is not to be compensated for any damage occurring (as, for instance, from subsidence) after the workings have ceased. A compensation clause in these terms, so far from suggesting or supporting the inference that the mine-owner was to have power to let down the surface, points to the very opposite conclusion." Then a little lower down he says: "I think it must always be presumed that a clause providing compensation was intended to cover the damage resulting to the landowner from the exercise of the powers previously reserved or granted to the owner of the mines. It is not the proper office, nor is it presumably the intention of such a clause, to define or extend the powers given to the mine-owner; and it is frequently ob magorem cautelam, and in the interest of the landowner, expressed in comprehensive terms, so as to include every species of damage which may result from operations which are consistent with giving support to the surface. The clause may, nevertheless, be so expressed as to explain the character and extent of these powers, as was the case in Aspden v. Seddon, 23 W. R. 580, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 394, where the power reserved to the mine-owner was to work the subjacent minerals without entering upon the surface of the lands." And Lord Bramwell at p. 300 says: "It is clear to me that that does not relate to working, but to property. The section begins that the title of the dean and chapter to the royalties incident or belonging to the manor shall not be prejudiced, lessened, or defeated by anything in the Act," but that "they as owners of the royalties shall hold and enjoy all rents, mines, &c., to the owners of the manor, incident, belonging, or appertaining. This relates to property. The power of working, so far as given, is in the next section." And on the next page he says: "I am of opinion, however, that the damage contemplated is temporary only, a damage to the person in possession, not to any reversioner or remainderman. The statute uses the present participles, 'working,' 'laying,' 'making,' 'using,' and says that satisfaction shall be made for the 'damage' and 'spoil of ground' occasioned thereby to the person in possession at the times of such damage and spoil, and the damage is to be paid yearly during the time of working or continuing or using such ways for every acre so damaged. This, I think, clearly contemplates temporary damage during the working from which the person in possession alone suffers." Then his lordship points out that there was no proviso for subsidence, and refers to an argument of the Solicitor-General, and says: "I am not insensible to the force of the argument of the Solicitor-General. He says if the argument for the respondents is right, inasmuch as the damage from a spoil bank or a shaft is permanent, either there is no right to sink a shaft or make a spoil bank, or the Legislature has thought that compensation to the person in possession was enough, and, if so, why is not the same true of subsidence, it being always the surface which is injured.

"This is a strong argument. It is singular that no express power is given to sink shafts or deposit spoil. Whether this matter was not thought of, or the right was supposed to be 'incident' to the manor, or it was thought that damage to the reversion from shafts and spoil was not of sufficient consequence to the reversioner to require compensation to be provided, I cannot guess. Perhaps there is no right to sink shafts and deposit spoil. I think there is. But it does not seem to me that because no provision is made for compensation to the reversioner for one permanent damage there is therefore a right to inflict on him another one which may damage him only, and not the person in possession during the working."

Now, the views of the authorities to which I have referred are not perhaps altogether in accord, but it appears to me the weight of authority is in favour of the view that clauses such as those with which I am dealing were meant to confer on the owner of the mines, as an incident to the enjoyment of them, some powers of working minerals, though the extent of those powers is left very far from being completely defined. It was urged before me that those powers ought not to be extended to anything which would operate as a destruction of the surface or the permanent exclusion of the owner from it, and it was pointed out that clause 16 gives no compensation to the owner of the ground, but only to the person or persons for the time being in possession of the ground. It was therefore contended that these powers ought not to be held to include the powers of sinking a pit for the purpose of winning the minerals. If so, the rights reserved to the owner of the mines would give little more than rights of way over the surface or rights of a similar kind. I cannot think that the construction is so limited. I think that the enjoyment spoken of in clause 15 is not meant to be a mere barren ownership of the minerals in the bowels of the earth, but includes the winning, carrying away, and disposing of them. I think the power to sink pits must be included in the "usual powers and surface privileges for working" spoken of by Lord Selborne in advising the House of Lords. Lord Bramwell expressly states his opinion to be, though not free from doubt, that under the Act in question a right to sink shafts was intended.

The omission of the Legislature to provide complete compensation for damage caused by sinking pits has not been considered a sufficient ground for holding that the right does not exist in other cases, as, for example, in Goold v. The Great Western Deep Coal Co. After all, it is to be borne in mind that the diameter of the pit is only a few feet at most, and that the amount of soil carried away in constructing it may not necessarily be very large or very important, and that after the pit has ceased to be used, it may be either filled up or arched over, and the surface restored so that it can be enjoyed by the surface owner

In my opinion therefore the Legislature has conferred on the mine owners all such powers as would be reasonably sufficient to enable them to dig and carry away the minerals, and it follows that the owners are entitled to dig pits and a fortiori to use existing pits. It appears to me also to follow that they are entitled to fix to the surface such machinery as may be reasonably sufficient to drain the mines and to draw the minerals to the surface, and to erect such buildings as may be reasonable for the protection and effectual working of such machinery.

But the case asks the opinion of the court whether the defendants are entitled to use certain existing works which includes "engine houses, engines, shop and other works for winning and working coal." These works were erected by the defendants while they were tenants of the plaintiffs under the agreement of the 12th of February, 1881. That agreement has now come to an end, and the works in question being affixed to the soil have become and are, as I understand, the property of the plaintiffs.

Now, the decision in Love v. Bell was that the mine owner was not entitled to work his mines so as to destroy or cause damage to the buildings erected on the surface. Still less then would he be entitled to destroy or damage such buildings in the exercise of the working privileges conferred on him by the Act. He could not, for example, pull down a house in order to sink a pit, nor could he take and use for the purpose of working the minerals existing buildings or fixed machinery belonging to another person. I am not aware of any case in which such a proposition has been laid down. Such a power would not be usual and could only, I think, be conferred by express words. I cannot see that it makes any difference in point of law that the buildings and machinery were originally erected by the mine owner under a different right if they had in fact ceased to be his property.

In my opinion the first question ought to be answered as follows: The defendants are entitled to use the surface of the allotment in the special case mentioned for the purpose of sinking and to sink pits or shafts thereon, and for all purposes incidental to the using, and to use such pits or shafts when sunk, and also the existing pits or shafts, to win, work, and carry away coal and other minerals lying and being under and within the allotment in the special case mentioned, and also lying and being under and within other parts of the common, and to take water from the reservoirs in the special case mentioned for the purpose of such winning and working, but not to use any of the engine houses, engines, or shops in special case mentioned being the property of the plaintiffs.

It follows from that that there ought to be an injunction as regards the user of the engine houses, engines, and shops, and as regards the costs I think each party ought to bear his own.

[NOTE.—This case was argued and judgment delivered on the understanding that the buildings referred to in the last part of the judgment were the property of the plaintiffs, as having been erected by the defendants as the plaintiffs' tenants. The fact was, however, that the defendants had erected them after their tenancy had expired in order to work the mines. The judgment was accordingly amended on application by the defendants by omitting the last sentence of the declaration.]

In re BIRKS.
KENYON v. BIRKS. (a.)

Will—Issue—Simple gift over of legacy to issue—Other gifts over restricting "issue" to children—Canon of construction.

A testator bequeathed twelve distinct legacies, with gifts over to the issue of the legatee dying in his lifetime. In the case of eleven of the legacies the gifts over contained words restricting, either expressly or by the application of the principle of Sibley v. Perry, 7 Ves. 522, the class of issue to children. The word "issue" in the gift over of the remaining legacy was not qualified by any such restriction.

Held, that, in the gift over of the remaining legacy, the word "issue" must be construed in its wider sense, on the following grounds: (1) That there was no expression of a general intention to limit the word "issue" to mean children throughout the will; (2) that no manifest inconsistency would arise from construing the word "issue" in its wider sense; and (3) that the court was not bound by the canons of construction laid down in Ridgeway v. Munkittrick, 1 Dr. & War. 84, and Rhodes v. Rhodes, 8 W. R. 204, 27 Beav. 413.

By his will, dated the 9th of July, 1895, William Birks, the testator, bequeathed (inter alia) the following legacies—namely, legacies to the sons and daughters of each of five named persons, and provided that "if any of them shall die in my lifetime leaving lawful issue such issue shall have and be entitled to his, her, or their deceased parent or parents' share." Then followed a legacy to each of the three sons of a named person, "and if any of them shall die in my lifetime leaving lawful issue such issue shall have and be entitled to the legacy to which his, her, or their deceased parent or parents would have been entitled if living at my decease." Then the testator bequeathed another legacy, and added, "but if" the legatee "shall die in my lifetime leaving lawful issue such issue shall have and be entitled to the said legacy in equal shares if more than one, and if only one the whole to such one child." Then followed three more legacies, with gifts over to the issue of such of the legatees as should die in the testator's lifetime leaving lawful issue, in words similar to those used in the gift over secondly above mentioned. Then came the following bequest: "I bequeath to my cousin John Birks Pigott the legacy or sum of £5,000, but in the event of his death in my lifetime leaving lawful issue, I direct that the said legacy shall not lapse, but such issue shall have and be entitled thereto in equal shares and proportions." Then followed a legacy to the son and daughter of a named person in equal shares, with a gift over in the event of either of them dying in the testator's lifetime leaving lawful issue in words similar to those used in the gift over first above mentioned. The testator died on the 17th of June, 1897, and his said will was duly proved.

John Birks Pigott died on the 1st of June, 1886, leaving nine children, six of whom predeceased the testator, four of them leaving children. The three surviving children were not married. This was a summons taken out by the executors and trustees of the will asking (inter alia) for the determination of the following question—namely, "Who upon the true construction of the said will, and in the events which have happened, is or are entitled to the sum of £5,000 primarily bequeathed to the testator's cousin John Birks Pigott."

P. O. Lawrence, Q.C., and J. G. Wood, for the plaintiffs.

Warrington, Q.C., and John Dixon, for Henry Pigott, one of the three children of John Birks Pigott surviving the testator.—The canon of construction which restricts issue to children is applicable in this case: Ridgeway v. Munkittrick, 1 Dr. & War. 84; Rhodes v. Rhodes, 8 W. R. 204, 27 Beav. 413; In re Harrison's Estate, 3 L. R. Ir. 114, 27 W. R. Dig. 238; Carter v. Bentall, 2 Beav. 551. In the other gifts the direction that the issue are to take their deceased parent's share restricts the meaning to "children": Sibley v. Perry, 7 Ves. 522.

S. Dickenson, for the defendant George Herbert Woodhouse, representing by order all the grandchildren of John Birks Pigott.—The fact that the testator has in one part of the will explained "issue" to mean "children" is not sufficient to restrict issue to children in another part of the will where there is no explanatory context. That has been held in many cases: Head v. Randall, 2 Yo. & Coll. Ch. 231; Hedges v. Harpur, 9 Beav. 479; Williams v. Teale, 6 Hare 239; In re Warren's Trusts, 32 W. R. 641, 26 Ch. D. 208; Waldron v. Boulter, 22 Beav. 284, 5 W. R. Ch. Dig. 116; Carter v. Bentall. The canon of construction was dealt with in Thompson v. Robinson, 8 W. R. 34, 27 Beav. 486, which was a later case than Rhodes v. Rhodes. The decision In re Corrie's Will, 32 B. 426, is not consistent with the canon of construction, and the weight of English authority is against the canon. J. B. Pigott had been dead nine years before the date of the will, and his children therefore must be taken to be the first legatees, and if Sibley v. Perry be applied, then the children of such of those first legatees as are dead will take a share.

Warrington, Q.C., replied, and referred to Turner v. Mullineux, 9 W. R. 252, 1 Joh. & Hem. 334, and In re Buckle, 42 W. R. 449, [1894] 1 Ch. 286, as showing that a testator must be taken to have used the same word in the same sense throughout his will.

H. Charlton Hawkins, Church, Dibdin, Micklem, Harman, Napier, E. F. Ball, and Sims, for other parties to the summons.

KEKEWICH, J.—The gift which I have to construe is short and simple; the gift is "I bequeath to my cousin John Birks Pigott the legacy or sum of £5,000, but in the event of his death in my lifetime leaving lawful issue I direct that the said legacy shall not lapse, but such issue shall have and be entitled thereto in equal shares and proportions." About the construction of that gift standing alone I think there would be no difficulty whatever. The testator has provided that in event of the death of John Birks Pigott in his lifetime the £5,000, which would strictly lapse, should go to the issue, so that however many generations there were they should all take. But it is said that I must not give the word "issue" such a wide interpretation because the testator has made himself his own dictionary or glossary, and has said in other parts of the will that "issue" is not to be considered as issue of any generation but as meaning children only. If I can find that on the face of the will I am bound to interpret the testator's language according to his own interpretation and construe the word "issue" in that way. One often has to do that, and there is no difficulty about it when once the intention is ascertained. The question is whether the testator has said that "issue" shall mean children, and Mr. Warrington's position is that the will clearly indicates that when the testator uses the word "issue" he means children only, and therefore he must be taken to have used that word to the exclusion of issue other than children. That is what Mr. Warrington has to establish, and if he does so I must construe the will according to that view. In eleven other different gifts the testator has restricted the word "issue" to mean children, either from language which has that effect according to Sibley v. Perry, or in some other way. And he has again and again used language in connection with the gifts over which shows that he meant children only. Is that enough? Let me venture to construe that first, apart from authority, if I am at liberty to do so. According to my inclination, I ought to hold that every generation should take. In one place the testator says in making the gift to "issue," "Here I mean children." Then in another case—the present case—he uses "issue" without that qualification. Am I then, apart from authority, to say that in the latter case he uses the word in that restricted sense? If I follow my own inclination I should say not. I should rather infer the exact contrary. That certainly would be my conclusion apart from authority. This case seems to me to differ from the general rule which I noticed just now. He has not said once for all that where he uses the word "issue" he means children; he has not made himself a dictionary with reference to the whole will but only to the particular gift with which he is dealing. That would be my conclusion, but it is said that I am bound by authority. The leading case is Ridgeway v. Munkittrick, decided by Lord St. Leonards, and apart from his judgment, on the facts it is singularly like this case and more like this case than the other cases which can be cited on the other side, because there he uses the word "issue" several times as restricted to children, and there are several instances of his use of the word, but Lord St. Leonards only notices one—namely, in the passage to which I refer, which is on p. 92, where, referring to the argument that the gift over in default of issue gave an absolute estate, he says: "But in this argument the parties have quite overlooked this, that the word issue cannot have the meaning which they would ascribe to it. The testator has over and over again translated 'issue' to mean 'children,' and this enables or rather compels me to put a particular construction on the word. It is a well-settled rule of construction, and one to which, from its soundness, I shall always strictly adhere, never to put a different construction on the same word where it occurs twice or oftener in the same instrument unless there appear a clear intention to the contrary." I do not criticize that language. It might be possible to express his rule in a different manner, and that has been done more than once. But I shall not attempt to criticize the language of the rule, the meaning of which is clear. Then there is the case of In re Harrison's Estate, which was decided also in Ireland thirty-eight years later. That is a case which, if it stood alone, would have a considerable bearing on this case, but if Ridgeway v. Munkittrick had not been before the court in that case they would have considered the question more open than they did. I cannot, therefore, regard the judgment in In re Harrison's Estate as adding to the authority, for if it binds me, so does Ridgeway v. Munkittrick, and if the latter does not, then I need not look at In re Harrison's Estate. Then there is the case of Rhodes v. Rhodes. In that case the Master of the Rolls found that on five separate occasions the testator used the word "issue" as equivalent to children, and there was a general use of the word. The judge says: "It is a canon of construction that where the testator has affixed a particular meaning to a word in one part of his will, it shall be construed as having the same meaning in all other parts of his will if it do not violate the sense." The language is different from that of Lord St. Leonards, and critically considered it might mean something different, but I think that the judge meant to say in effect what Lord St. Leonards had said before him. Before going to the other cases I shall notice those two cases which were cited in reply, and which in my opinion do not apply, for there the testator used a translation or interpretation clause, and he had thus explained himself. On the other hand I have had several cases cited by Mr. Dickenson, and I take it that, though there is a long list of cases which might have been cited here, Mr. Dickenson has selected the most useful. I shall not refer to all of them, because most of them differ from Ridgeway v. Munkittrick in this, that besides there being a special will to deal with with, there was only one of two gifts to be construed. For instance, in Carter v. Bentall, where there were only two gifts to be contrasted, the Master of the Rolls says expressly "the word 'issue' may and does often mean children, and more than children. The testator in one place accompanies the use of the word by expressions which signify that on that occasion he means children only; but it does not follow that in another place where the word is not accompanied by such expressions, the same limited meaning is intended." Here he is dealing only with a gift of two moieties, and the case is distinguishable at once from that of Lord St. Leonards. A similar remark may be applied to the other cases, and, in some of them it is somewhat difficult to see how the principle was applied.

Then there comes the case before Pearson, J., of In re Warren's Trusts. That judge did deal with the point after what was an elaborate argument, and Mr. Upjohn cited Ridgeway v. Munkittrick, Rhodes v. Rhodes, and Carter v. Bentall, together with other cases, and I take it, and I think that the judgment shows, that the learned counsel relied on Ridgeway v. Munkittrick and what was laid down by Lord St. Leonards. Pearson, J., sums up as follows: "Am I then bound by authority to construe the word 'issue' in the former clause as meaning children only merely because I find that it is expressly restricted to children in the latter clause? I think I am not. I think I am bound to look at the whole of the deed, and if I find that it was not intended to restrict the meaning of the word in the earlier clause, I must give the word in that clause its proper unrestricted meaning. I am not bound to restrict the meaning unless there would otherwise be a manifest inconsistency, or I should be defeating the plain intention of the parties." In this case there would be no inconsistency in giving the word "issue" its unrestricted meaning, nor is there any plain intention which would be defeated by so doing, unless I am bound to infer it, and to say that I am bound to infer it is rather in the nature of a circular argument. I must look at the whole of the will to see whether there is expressed a general intention to restrict the meaning of the word "issue" to children. If there is I am bound by it, but if there is not I need only consider this particular clause and not the other clauses in the will which restrict the meaning of the word "issue," that is, unless there would otherwise be a manifest inconsistency. So, then, I have that guide, and I must consider whether there is a manifest inconsistency. It seems to me that there is no manifest inconsistency in construing the word "issue" in its unrestricted sense in this particular gift, which is entirely different from the other gifts, and in which it may well be that the testator intended to provide for all the issue of John Birks Pigott, although in the other cases he only meant to provide for children.

The learned judge in In re Warren's Trusts said: "Am I then bound by authority?" He does not refer to Ridgeway v. Munkittrick, nor does he refer to the other cases, but seeing that they were brought before him, and by a good counsel, I must take it that he was applying his mind to the cases which had been brought before him. In that case, then, Pearson, J., I assume, did not think himself bound by Ridgeway v. Munkittrick, and he distinctly says he was not bound by authority, and I shall say the same. But there is one other point—Ridgeway v. Munkittrick is not only the decision of an eminent judge, but it was decided a great many years ago, and is in all text-books and in many of the reported cases, and Rhodes v. Rhodes, too, is a case of ancient history, and has also been cited in other cases. Even if I think I am not bound by authority, still I ought not to depart from that rule of construction if I think that it has been adopted by the profession, or if by departing from it I should occasion confusion. But Mr. Dickenson has cited many cases which do differ from the decision of Lord St. Leonards, and In re Warren's Trusts has been before the profession for fifteen years, and I think that the point must be taken as open to some doubt, and therefore I do not think that the decision which I am about to make will cause confusion. I therefore hold that the word "issue" must be taken in its larger sense.

ROBERTS v. GWYRFAI DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a.)

Local government—Public health—District council—Riparian owner—Water rights—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 51, 53, 327, 332.

The owner of a corn-mill sought to restrain a district council from interfering with the natural flow of the stream working his mill. The council owned land on one side of the lake from which the stream flowed, and proposed to construct a dam there so as to increase the storage of water to be supplied for their district, thereby diminishing the stream flowing down to the mill.

Held, that a riparian owner was entitled to an uninterrupted flow of water as in the past; Public Health Act, 1875, s. 332, did not enable the council to "injuriously affect" the plaintiff's right to an uninterrupted flow of water without his consent, nor was there a statutory power enabling them to interfere with the plaintiff's common law rights. Injunction granted.

Action.

Plaintiff, the owner of a corn-mill worked by a stream flowing from a lake situate at the foot of mountains some distance above the mill, sought for an injunction to restrain the defendants, a district council, from interfering with the natural flow of the stream. The defendants were the owners of land on one side of the lake. The plaintiff claimed a prescriptive right to put stones and sods in the pipe to regulate the flow of water and to go on the land for that purpose. The defendants were proposing to construct a dam across the end of the lake of which the stream was the outlet in order to increase the water storage for the supply of water to their district by regulating the outflow. They had offered to allow a sufficient outflow to work the plaintiff's mill, but he declined their offer.

T. R. Warrington, Q.C., and Bryn Roberts, for the plaintiff, contended that the plaintiff, so far from being at the defendants' mercy, was entitled to the free and uninterrupted flow of the water as it had always been, without diminution or alteration, subject only to the rights of other riparian owners; it was sufficient to prove violation of the right, and the law would presume damage: Embrey v. Owen, 6 Ex. Ch. 352 (where judgment was given for the defendant, because the use was reasonable, but see p. 369, where Parke, B., states the rights of upper riparian proprietors); Wilts and Berks Canal Navigation Co. v. Swindon Waterworks Co., 22 W. R. 444, 30 L. T. Rep. 443, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 451, 457; Swindon Waterworks Co. v. Wilts and Berks Canal Navigation Co., 24 W. R. 284, 33 L. T. Rep. 513, L. R. 7 H. L. 697—at p. 702 Cairns, L.J., points out the two different titles of the defendant company. The Public Health Act, 1875, ss. 51, 53, 327, 332, gave the defendants no right to take water, except by contract with the riparian proprietors or by special authority of the Act, which they had not got here. That Act is an enabling Act only, by which the council may supply water to their district, but it gives no compulsory powers; section 332 is in similar words to section 68 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. Upon section 73 of the Local Government Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98), there is the case of Reg. v. Darlington Local Board of Health, 13 W. R. 789, 35 L. J. Q. B. 45, where it was held that Acts of the board were in excess of the powers given them by statute, and that they had "injuriously affected" the river.

Cooper v. Crabtree, 30 W. R. 649, 20 Ch. D. 589, at p. 592, was also referred to.

W. C. Renshaw, Q.C., A. Macmorran, Q.C., and A. Glen, for the defendants, denied liability to an injunction and relied on plaintiff's admission that this was a quia timet action, there being no damage and no probability that the apprehended danger would ensue. The defendants are lessees of land all round the lake and licensees of the Crown under a grant of 1896 giving them authority to construct and maintain an embankment and other works. They have a right to take water so long as they do no damage to other riparian owners: Swindon Waterworks Co. v. Wilts and Berks Canal Navigation Co., per Cairns, L.J., at p. 705 of L. R. 7 H. L. By section 332 of the Public Health Act, 1875, it is the duty of the district council to supply water if they do not "injuriously affect": The Attorney-General v. The Corporation of Manchester, 41 W. R. 459, [1893] 2 Ch. 87. There seems to be no authority on the words "injuriously affect," but it is suggested they mean an injury which would give the plaintiff a right of action for damage done to his property. Such injury might arise from dealing with the river-bed or banks, and the Act says it is not to be done if the damage created by it could be restrained by injunction. In the case of Earl of Sandwich v. Great Northern Railway Co., 27 W. R. 616, 10 Ch. D. 707, the railway company was held to be entitled to subtract a reasonable amount of water for their station. Reg. v. Darlington Local Board of Health does not apply, because there the board took the whole supply of water. Here the defendants' act is not an illegal act, and so they cannot be said to be "injuriously affecting" the stream in the sense of section 332.

KEKEWICH, J.—So far as the plaintiff's claim to relief is founded upon the ground of prescription, I did not call upon counsel for the defendants. The plaintiff's claim in the second paragraph of his statement of claim is this: "The plaintiff's said mill is driven by the water of the said stream. The plaintiff whenever necessary for the purposes of the said mill, owing to the scarcity of water in the said stream through drought, is entitled by prescription to dam up the water of the said lake as a reservoir for the supply of water to his said mill." That was put by Mr. Warrington into this form. I asked him at the conclusion of his case what he claimed as a prescription, and he said he sought to place at his will and pleasure stones and other refuse so as to regulate the flow of the stream, and to go upon the land for that purpose. That is attempted to be supported by the evidence of two witnesses. The second witness had never any connection with the plaintiff's mill. What he had done was solely for the benefit of what has been conveniently called the other mill, which is on the other portion of the stream, and although he had on one or two occasions, perhaps three in all, assisted the son, or the survivor of the previous persons in possession, it was entirely in reference to the other mill and had nothing to do at all with the plaintiff's mill. Therefore I put the evidence of the second witness David Evans aside. Then I have the evidence of the plaintiff himself.

I do not wish to be too severe upon the plaintiff, especially as he was examined through an interpreter. There is then always some difficulty in getting exactly what the witness says, and what he means, but even if I gave full credit to his testimony, which I am bound to say I certainly do not, it would only come to this, that he "occasionally" made openings, although he says "frequently," and he dammed up this lake for purposes connected with his own mill with a view to increasing or diminishing the supply of water; as I understand, diminishing it in the first instance so as to obtain increased quantities afterwards.

Having regard to the authorities and the principles on which prescription is regulated, I am prepared to hold that his claim to a prescriptive right is not within the particulars he alleges. It is very difficult to know what he did in particular. It is difficult to say what he did, even supposing he has established a right to what is disputed.

I think it would be waste of time to criticize his claim, but I thought it right to say so much, and get rid of that part of the case.

So far as the costs have been increased by that, the plaintiff must pay those costs, whatever may be the result of the case generally, and those costs must, I suppose, be taxed as between solicitor and client.

With regard to the rest of the case it raises an entirely different question. The defendants in the exercise of what they conceived to be their duty and within their powers utilized the waters of this lake by constructing certain works which are admitted at present to be properly constructed, with a view of supplying the district with water. It is not suggested that the plaintiff would be any the worse off now than he was before. If I may venture to suggest from the way in which he was speaking with a knowledge of the facts, I should certainly hazard the conclusion that he would probably be better off in the future than he has been in the past. The supply may not be the same, but it will be sufficient, and if that is constant at all, it will be more constant than it has been before when, as we know from the evidence, it was of an intermittent character, and sometimes very much less than was required for the purposes of the mill. But the plaintiff says, "I am entitled to insist upon having what I had before. It is immaterial whether the water I had before is better or worse than what is now proposed to be given to me; it is for me to consider whether I shall derive any benefit from the alterations; I protest against any alterations at all." There are several cases which have been referred to, and I do not intend to refer to any of them with the exception of one, and there is only one passage to which Mr. Renshaw called my attention. The law on this subject has been thrashed out again and again, and I do not think that any advantage would be gained now by going through the authorities. A riparian proprietor or owner is entitled to say that the water which flows by his property, and which is used by him for ordinary, or it may be for extraordinary purposes shall flow in the future as it has done in the past. That seems to me to be the common law right, and unless that common law right has been affected by statute he is entitled to insist upon it; but then Mr. Renshaw says there is one passage in Lord Cairn's judgment in the House of Lords in the case of The Swindon Waterworks Co. v. The Proprietors of the Wilts and Berks Navigation Co. which, instead of being in the plaintiff's favour, is against him. I do not so read it. What Lord Cairns says is this: "Therefore, my lords, so far as regards the position of the respondents as riparian owners, it appears to me that they clearly have a right to complain of that which is done by the appellants, if what is so done by them is insisted upon as a thing which they have a right to do"—that is the qualification—"I put this qualification, because, if, when the attention of the appellants had been called to what they were doing, they had not insisted upon doing it as a matter of right, I can well understand that if the Court of Chancery found" (I will leave out the words in brackets, which are unnecessary for the present purpose) "that no sensible damage had accrued to them, it might not have thought it necessary to interfere with them by injunction or declaration." What I understand Lord Cairns to mean is that, there being no sensible damage, an injunction or declaration would not have been granted unless the appellants had insisted upon what they were doing as a matter of right; from which I should conclude also that as they did insist upon it as a matter of right, whether a variation did occur or not, the respondents were entitled to an injunction or declaration. That, as I understand, is the meaning of his lordship's observation, and what he means by the qualification and what he deduces from it. Therefore it seems to me that unless the defendants, prescription being out of the question, have some higher authority by statute to interfere with the flow of water, they have no right to alter the flow of water even although the alteration may not inflict any injury upon the plaintiff. He is entitled to have his water, and so far I am entirely in his favour. But then it is said that the defendants have a title to interfere under the Public Health Act of 1875. That is based entirely upon the 332nd section. It has been pointed out by Mr. Bryn Roberts that that section does not enable the local authority to do anything of the kind at all. All it says is that nothing in this Act shall be construed to authorize them to do certain things. It does not say that it shall enable them to do these things. It only says that the other part of the Act shall not enable them to do the things there mentioned without the consent in writing of the persons there described. That seems to me to be an extremely pertinent observation. But what are they not authorized to do? Section 332 provides that "nothing in this Act shall be construed to authorize any local authority to injuriously affect any reservoir, canal, river, or stream, or the feeders thereof, or the supply, quality, or fall of water contained in any reservoir, canal, river, stream, or in the feeders thereof, in the cases where any body of persons or person would, if this Act had not been passed, have been entitled by law to prevent or be relieved against the injuriously affecting such reservoir, canal, river, stream, feeders, or such supply, quality, or fall of water, unless the local authority first obtain the consent in writing of the body of persons or person so entitled as aforesaid." Adopting Mr. Bryn Roberts' argument on that section, I say that it does not enable the defendants to "injuriously affect" the plaintiff's right. It only says that they shall not be allowed to do it without the consent of the person who has the right to complain. What is the exact meaning of "injuriously affect"? There may be some difficulty in deciding. My attention has been called to the Local Government Act of 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98), which contains a similar section—namely, section 73, but I go back to the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act of 1845, where the words are to be found in section 68, and there is a very large body of authority upon that. In that Act the distinction is taken quite clearly, and in a number of authorities the distinction is drawn between taking lands and injuriously affecting them. The words are: "If any party shall be entitled to any compensation for injuriously affecting," &c. The taking of lands and the injuriously affecting are entirely separate things. Compensation in respect of either can only be awarded because the Act legalizes what otherwise would not be legal, and, therefore, as a result, the amount has to be found by a jury or by an arbitrator. When land is taken compulsorily, or when it is not taken, but is injuriously affected, it is more naturally called acquiring land by compensation, but the words injuriously affecting occur in both cases. The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act only provides for compensation for injuriously affecting, and although a man might make a claim on the ground that his land was injuriously affected, he would get no compensation unless he proved the injury, and so far it is difficult to apply that Act to a case of this sort, where the injury cannot be assessed in pounds, shillings, and pence.

It strikes me, therefore, that you cannot strictly apply the provisions of the authorities relating to the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and, more than that, we can only estimate the loss by the thing which may have been injuriously affected. In section 332 of the Public Health Act, 1875, it is injuriously affecting any reservoir, canal, river, stream, or the feeders thereof; or the supply, quality, or fall of water, and so on. That is quite different from injuriously affecting lands, and the cases referred to on injuriously affecting lands, although right enough, I think must be irrelevant in a great measure to injuriously affecting a reservoir, or the supply, quality, or fall of water. It is this they must not do—injuriously affect the supply of water, and if they do they must not obstruct it in a manner which is not authorized by the ordinary law. That is the meaning of the words, and I think I ought to take that view. They must not interfere with the supply of water in such a way that any body of persons or person shall be entitled by law to prevent it. I have already expressed my opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to be relieved from any alteration in the supply of water. If that be so, then the Public Health Act, 1875, comes in and says that there is nothing in it which will enable the defendants to do that without the consent of the plaintiff, which consent, of course, is not forthcoming. On that ground, so far from defendants being under the protection of the Act, the Act saves the plaintiff's rights. Beyond that there is the other point, which has been raised by the plaintiff's counsel, that there is no power under the Act to do the thing which the defendants are doing. The defendants are seeking to interfere with the plaintiff's common law right, and there is no statutory power which authorizes them to do that. The common law right seems to me to be unaffected by the statute.

The result is that in my opinion the plaintiff is entitled to the injunction which he asks for, and to the costs of the action, with the exception I have already mentioned. If I properly could (seeing that I can only give the plaintiff the costs of the whole action in the ordinary way as between party and party), I should wish to set off the costs taxable in the same way, but the Legislature has thought fit, and far be it from me to say unwisely, that when a public body is attacked then the costs shall not come out of the funds or other property which the public body holds for the public but that they shall come out of the unsuccessful parties' pockets.

The plaintiff, therefore, is entitled to an injunction and the costs of the action as between party and party, the defendants to have the costs as between solicitor and client on the question of prescription.

The injunction will be to restrain the defendants from causing a diminution in the flow of water of the stream by supplying water to their district.

In re DUNCAN.
TERRY v. SWEETING. (a.)

Executor — Action for testator's misrepresentations — Actio personalis moritur cum persona.

An action claiming unliquidated damages arising from the misrepresentations of a testator will not lie against his personal representatives, but only if that which it is sought to recover from his estate can be shown to be still the property of the plaintiff.

This was a claim by a Mr. Seddon in a creditors' action for the administration of the estate of a deceased testator who died in February, 1895. It was stated by Seddon that in October, 1895, he was induced by the testator to agree to purchase 500 £1 shares in a gold mining company by representations made by the testator that the company owned certain mines. In payment of the shares the testator drew upon Seddon, and Seddon accepted two bills of exchange for £250. One of such acceptances matured shortly after the testator's death and was met by Seddon. It appeared that the company never owned any property or any assets, and the shares were worthless. Seddon contended that the consideration for the bills wholly failed. He declined to meet the other bill, and the executors threatened to sue him thereon. No offer was made by Seddon to return the shares until December, 1898. Seddon claimed that the testator was at the time of his death, and that his estate was still, indebted to him for £250 money paid, and in the alternative he claimed £250 damages. The master had not allowed the claim on the ground that acceptance of the shares formed consideration, and that according to the authorities damages for misrepresentation would not lie after the wrongdoer's death.

Borthwick, for the claimant.—The maxim actio personalis moritur cum persona does not apply if it can be shown that the loss to my client arising from the misrepresentations of the testator has increased the testator's estate: Peek v. Gurney, 22 W. R. 29, L. R. 6 H. L. 377; Phillips v. Homfray, 32 W. R. 6, 24 Ch. D. 439.

Levett, Q.C., and F. Thompson, for the defendants.—The test to apply is, could the claimant have brought an action for assumpsit during the testator's lifetime? In this case he could not, and therefore he cannot now sue the executors: Archer v. Bamford, 3 Stark. 175. He cannot sue executors for unliquidated damages. His proper remedy was rescission.

ROMER, J.—It is important to bear in mind what is the nature of the claim before me. It is a claim for damages suffered by the claimant by reason of his being induced by misrepresentation of the testator to buy shares belonging to the testator in a limited company.

It is not a claim for rescission of the contract. The claimant has retained, and still retains, the shares, and so far as appears he has never repudiated the contract either during the lifetime of the testator or since. Notwithstanding the lapse of time and change of circumstances, it is conceivably possible, though not very probable, that even now the claimant would be in a position to repudiate the contract, and on that footing recover back the price. But I am satisfied that a claim of that kind was not the one made before the master, or adjourned to me for decision, or which the respondents were or are now asked to meet.

It is true that in the claimant's affidavit he speaks of the consideration for the payment of the purchase price having wholly failed. It is clear that what he means is that the shares eventually proved to be worthless, and certainly the respondents were never given to understand by the claimant that he claimed damages, but only to repudiate the contract, otherwise they would have had the opportunity of saying that through the delay of the purchaser in repudiating the contract or change of circumstances he is not now in a position to repudiate the contract.

I therefore proceed to deal with the case as being at present one only for damages, but should the claimant desire to make a claim on the other footing I will give him an opportunity of doing so, reserving all question of costs hitherto incurred. Dealing solely with the claim for damages it is one for unliquidated damages, and not less so because the claimant seeks to establish that the damage is the full amount of the contract price. Now, can such a claim be brought against the legal personal representatives of the testator. I think not. In my opinion the principle applies actio personalis moritur cum persona, the case not falling within any statutory or other exception to the rule. It was suggested that the case was excepted from the rule because the testator obtained from the claimant the price of the shares by reason of the fraudulent misrepresentation. But this suggestion is, in my judgment, based on a misapprehension of the principle on which the court acts in these cases. If the claimant was suing, or was entitled to sue, on the footing that the price paid for the shares was still the claimant's property, then I agree that the rule does not apply: see Phillips v. Homfray, 32 W. R. 6, 24 Ch. D. 439, where the limits of the rule are examined; on the other hand, if the claimant can only sue for unliquidated damages, then the rule applies: see Kirk v. Todd, 31 W. R. 69, 21 Ch. D. 484, at p. 488, where Jessel, M.R., observes: "As I understand the rule at common law it was this, you could not sue executors for a wrong committed by their testator, for which you could only recover unliquidated damages"; and see the judgment of the majority of the Court of Appeal as delivered by Bowen, L.J., in Phillips v. Homfray at p. 454, where he states: "The only cases in which apart from questions of breach of contract, express or implied, a remedy for a wrongful act can be pursued against the estate of a deceased person who has done the act appear to us to be those in which property, or the proceeds or value of property belonging to another, have been appropriated by the deceased person and added to his own estate or moneys. In such cases, whatever the original form of action, it is in substance brought to recover property or its proceeds or value, and by amendment could be made such in form as well as in substance. In such cases the action, though arising out of a wrongful act, does not die with the person. The property or the proceeds or value which in the lifetime of the wrongdoer could have been recovered from him can be traced after his death to his assets and recaptured by the rightful owner there. But it is not every wrongful act by which a wrongdoer indirectly benefits that falls under this head, if the benefit does not consist in the acquisition of property or its proceeds or value. Where there is nothing among the assets of the deceased that in law or in equity belongs to the plaintiff, and the damages which have been done to him are unliquidated and uncertain, the executors of a wrongdoer cannot be sued merely because it was worth the wrongdoer's while to commit the act which is complained of, and an indirect benefit may have been reaped thereby."

The question, then, that I have to consider in the case before me narrows itself to this: Can the claimant, while retaining the shares purchased, and while not in a position to insist upon repudiation of his contract under which he purchased the shares, sue for the purchase-money at law as remaining his own property by reason of the fraud which induced the contract? In my opinion clearly not; he can not so sue. See, for example, the judgments in Campbell v. Fleming, 1 A. & E. 40, where it is pointed out that in such a case the purchaser, to be able to sue for the purchase-money, must, at the time of discovering the fraud, elect to repudiate the transaction. If for any reason the purchaser is not entitled to insist on rescission of the contract he cannot sue for the purchase-money, and can only sue for damages in an action of deceit: see Clarke v. Dickson, E. B. & E., 148, 6 W. R. C. L. Dig. 21. In the case before me, as already pointed out, the claim has not to be treated as one for rescission. It is, in fact, at present a claim for damages for the deceit, and, as already pointed out, is legally one for unliquidated damages. It is a fallacy for the claimant to suppose that his claim becomes less one for unliquidated damages because he hopes to establish that the measure of his damages is the contract price he paid. Still less can he say if he is not in a position to insist on rescission of his contract that the purchase price he paid is his property because it equals the amount of damage he has sustained.

EDWARDS v. PURNALL AND OTHERS. (a.)

Weights and measures—Sale of coal—Weight ticket or note—Weights and Measures Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 21), s. 21.

Section 21, sub-section 1, of the Weights and Measures Act, 1889, enacts that, "where any quantity of coal exceeding two hundredweight is delivered by means of any vehicle to a purchaser, the seller of the coal shall therewith deliver or cause to be delivered . . . to the purchaser or his servant, before any of the coal is unloaded, a ticket or note according to the form in the third schedule to the Act . . ."

A penalty for non-compliance with the section is provided by sub-section 2.

Section 22, sub-section 1, enacts that, where such coal is conveyed for delivery in bulk, the seller shall cause the weight of the coal and the vehicle containing it to be previously ascertained by a weighing machine duly stamped, being on or near to the place from which the coal is brought.

A quantity of coal exceeding two hundredweight was conveyed for delivery on sale in bulk in a vehicle belonging to the seller. The coal and vehicle were weighed by the seller's servant and the purchaser's servant on a weighing machine on the purchaser's premises, and a ticket in the form given in the third schedule of the Act was filled in by the purchaser's servant at the request of the seller's servant.

Before delivery of the coal was accepted, or any part of it was unloaded, the ticket was delivered by the seller's servant to another servant of the purchaser.

Held, that the seller, having complied with the requirements of section 21, sub-section 1, was not liable to a penalty under sub-section 2.

Case stated by the justices of the county of Devon.

An information was preferred by the appellant against the respondents charging them with selling coal without complying with the requirements of section 21 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1889.

The respondents were coal merchants carrying on business at Exeter and had been in the habit of supplying coal to the Devon County Asylum at Exminster.

On the 14th of June, 1898, at the request of the committee of the asylum, the respondents sent to the asylum 1¾ tons of coal in bulk in one of their own vehicles in charge of one of their carters. On arriving at the asylum the coal and the vehicle were weighed by the respondents' carter and by the storekeeper of the asylum upon a weighbridge duly stamped and certified which belonged to the asylum. This was done in accordance with an arrangement previously made between the respondents and the committee of the asylum. The respondents' carter carried a book of forms prepared in accordance with the form in Schedule III. of the Act. At his request the storekeeper filled in one of the forms with the weight of the coal and vehicle and the tare weight of the vehicle and the net weight of the coal. The ticket was then torn out of the book and delivered by the carter to one of the servants of the asylum. Till this was done delivery of the coal was not accepted nor was any part of it unloaded.

The justices, holding that the ticket was in the form in Schedule III., dismissed the information.

Section 21 (1) of the Weights and Measures Act, 1889, is as follows: "Where any quantity of coal exceeding two hundredweight is delivered by means of any vehicle to a purchaser, the seller of the coal shall therewith deliver, or cause to be delivered or to be sent by post or otherwise, to the purchaser or to his servant, before any part of the coal is unloaded, a ticket or note according to the form in the third schedule to the Act, or according to a form to the like effect."

Sub-section 2 is as follows: "If default is made in complying with the requirements of this section with respect to the delivery or sending of a ticket or note for delivery to the purchaser, or if the quantity of coal delivered is less than the quantity expressed in the ticket or note, the seller of the coal shall be liable to a fine not exceeding five pounds."

Section 22, sub-section 1, provides: "Where any quantity of coal exceeding two hundredweight is conveyed for delivery on sale in a vehicle in bulk, the seller of the coal shall, unless the vehicle is provided by the purchaser, cause the weight of the vehicle, as well as of the coal contained therein, to be previously ascertained by a weighing instrument stamped by the inspector of weights and measures, and being on or near to the place from which the coal is brought, and shall from time to time cause the tare weight of the vehicle to be marked thereon in such manner as the local authority approve."

Duke, Q.C. (Kerly with him), for the appellant.—Section 22, sub-sections 1 and 2, ought to have been complied with. The particulars ought to have been entered on the ticket by the defendants or their servant, and the coal and vehicle ought to have been weighed on or near the place from which it was brought, not on the purchaser's premises. These requirements not having been complied with, the ticket was not such a ticket as was required by section 21. Knowles v. Sinclair, 46 W. R. 188, 77 L. T. Rep. 624, is in point.

Foote, Q.C., for the respondent.—The ticket handed by the respondent's carter to the servant of the purchaser is in the form given in Schedule III., and all the other requirements of section 21 have been complied with.

LAWRANCE, J.—The magistrates were right. In most cases it is the right thing to weigh the coal in the yard from which it is brought. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred it is weighed at the yard because there are no weighing machines elsewhere. In yards where there is no weighing machine it would be necessary to send the coal to be weighed at a public weighing machine. The object of the Act is to protect purchasers, and not to protect sellers against their servants.

CHANNELL, J.—I think that the magistrates were right. The proceedings were taken under section 21. All the requirements of that section have been complied with. But something is supposed to have been laid down in Knowles v. Sinclair which is said to be in point. It was argued in that case that the ticket must show the correct weight of the coal at the time of delivery and not at some previous time. But the court said that the ticket must contain a statement of the weight at some previous weighing. That case was decided under section 22.

In this case all the ticket had to show was the weight at the last place of weighing. That was, in the present instance, the weighing machine belonging to the purchasers. The prosecution was misconceived in consequence of a misunderstanding of Knowles v. Sinclair.

Appeal dismissed.

UNITED REALIZATION CO. (LIMITED) (Appellants) v. THE COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE (Respondents). (a.)

Inland revenue—Stamp duty—Mortgage—Covenant—Agreement under seal to execute mortgage when required—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 86, Schedule I.

By an instrument under seal a company agreed, in consideration of a sum of money then advanced to them by a building society, to execute, whenever called upon by the society, a mortgage or charge of the company's interest in certain lands in such form as the society should request, to secure the repayment of the sum so advanced and interest; and, by the same instrument, the company agreed to pay interest on the sum advanced until repayment, and appointed a person receiver of the rents and profits of the lands so long as any money remained due to the society, such receiver not to take possession until default had been made in payment after demand of the principal and interest.

Held, that the instrument was a "mortgage" or a "covenant" within the meaning of the Stamp Act, 1891, and was chargeable with ad valorem duty under the head "Mortgage, Bond, Debenture, Covenant," in the first schedule to that Act.

Case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue pursuant to section 13 of the Stamp Act, 1891, for the opinion of the court as to the amount of duty chargeable upon an instrument presented on behalf of the appellants to the commissioners under section 12 of the same Act for their opinion as to the duty with which it was chargeable.

The instrument was under seal and was expressed as follows:

"To the Liberator Permanent Benefit Building Society.—In consideration of the sum of £373,374 11s. 7d. this day advanced by the Liberator Permanent Building Society to J. W. Hobbs & Co. (Limited) (hereinafter called "the company"), the receipt whereof the company hereby acknowledge, the company hereby undertake and agree whenever called upon by the society to execute at the expense of the company a mortgage or charge of all their interest in the hereditaments and premises known as Albert Gate-mansions, Knightsbridge, Middlesex, and more particularly described in an indenture dated the 26th day of May, 1892, and made between the company of the one part and the Founders' Stock and Share Trust (Limited), of the other part, in such form as the society shall request to secure the repayment of the said sum of £373,374 15s. 7d. and interest at the rate of £7 10s. per cent. per annum payable by equal quarterly instalments, and the company hereby agree with the society that until payment of the said sum of £373,374 15s. 7d. they will pay interest on the same, or on so much thereof as shall be due at the rate aforesaid, and the company hereby appoints Joseph George Coldwells or such other person as the society may hereafter substitute for him the receiver of the rents and profits of the said hereditaments and premises so long as any money still remains due to society: Provided always that the said Joseph George Coldwells or such other person as may hereafter be appointed shall not enter possession of such rents and profits until default shall be made in payment of the principal moneys and interest herein referred to within fourteen days after the same shall have been demanded. In witness, &c."

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

At the date of the execution of the instrument there was a legal mortgage and also an equitable mortgage subsisting upon the Albert Gate property, the title deeds being held by the first mortgagee.

The commissioners were of opinion that the instrument was liable to duty under the head, "Mortgage, Bond, Debenture, Covenant" in the first schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891, and they assessed the duty at £466 15s., being at the rate of 2s. 6d. per cent. upon the sum of £373,374 15s. 7d. thereby secured.

By the first schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891, ad valorem duties are imposed upon a "mortgage, bond, debenture, covenant . . . being the only or principal or primary security (other than an equitable mortgage) for the payment or repayment of money," the rate of duty being where the sum secured exceeds £300 2s. 6d. for every £100 or fractional part of £100 of the amount secured. The schedule also contains the heading "Covenant for securing the payment or repayment of money, or the transfer or retransfer of stock."

The definitions of "mortgage" and "equitable mortgage" in section 86 were also referred to.

Pickford, Q.C. (H. S. Theobald with him), for the appellants.—The instrument is chargeable with a duty of 10s. only as a deed; it does not fall under the head of "Mortgage, &c." in the schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891. It creates no present charge on the property; it contains an agreement to execute such a charge if required, but until the charge is required to be executed the instrument does not itself operate as a charge: Ex parte Izard, 22 W. R. 342. L. R. 9 Ch. App. 271; Shaw v. Foster, 20 W. R. 907, L. R. 5 H. L. 321, per Lord Cairns at pp. 339, 340. The appointment of a receiver does not make the instrument a charge, for the receiver cannot act unless default is made in payment of principal or interest. The instrument contains no covenant to repay money; it is therefore not a "covenant for securing the payment or repayment of money" within the first schedule.

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G. (Danckwerts with him), for the respondents.—The instrument is a "mortgage" within the meaning of the Stamp Act, 1891. It falls within the definition in section 86 (1), as being "a security by way of mortgage for the payment of a definite and certain sum of money advanced." It is an agreement to execute a legal mortgage, and creates a present charge. If it were under hand only it would be an "equitable mortgage" within section 86 (2), and chargeable at the rate of 6d. per cent. only; but being under seal it falls within section 86 (1). There is no real distinction between a mortgage and a charge, except as to the modes of enforcing the lender's rights. The provision that the borrower shall execute a mortgage on demand does not prevent the instrument from creating a present charge, and here the intention to create a present charge is apparent. The following cases are authorities for the contention of the Crown: Hepworth v. Hill, 10 W. R. 477, 30 Beav. 476; Dighton v. Withers, 31 Beav. 423; Heath v. Pugh, 29 W. R. 904, 6 Q. B. D. 345, 30 W. R. 553, 7 App. Cas. 235; Cradock v. Scottish Provident Institution, 63 L. J. Ch. 15, 70 L. T. Rep. 718; In re Hurley's Estate, [1894] 1 Ir. R. 488; Attorney-General v. Worrall, 43 W. R. 118, [1895] 1 Q. B. 99; City of London Brewery Co. v. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue, ante p. 216, [1899] 1 Q. B. 121. In any case the instrument is a "covenant for securing the repayment of money," and is therefore, according to the first schedule, chargeable as a mortgage. It is also a debenture.

Pickford, Q.C., replied.

WILLS, J.—I think it is clear that the Crown is entitled to our judgment. I do not propose to go minutely through the series of cases which have been brought before us, because I think it is much more satisfactory that we should, if we can, extract a clear principle from the decisions rather than undertake the task of commenting upon each case and the expressions of individual judges in it. I agree that the real question here is whether the instrument in question was intended to give an immediate charge. With respect to the difference between "mortgage" and "charge," the cases cited by the Solicitor-General, and particularly that of Heath v. Pugh, have satisfied me that there is no distinction to be drawn between "mortgage" and "charge" except in respect to the machinery by which each is enforced. A "mortgage" is a charge enforceable by machinery more beneficial to the person who lends the money and is entitled to the benefit of the mortgage than the machinery by which a charge can be enforced. It is plain, I think, from the cases to which the Solicitor-General called our attention, that the introduction into an instrument of a provision that a demand or request shall be one of the preliminaries to the obligation to execute a deed, does not determine the question whether the instrument creates a present charge or not. That question is to be decided upon perfectly different considerations. If an intention to give a present charge can be collected from the instrument, the introduction of such a provision does not make it the less a present charge; it is only part of the machinery by which the obligation which effects that charge shall be carried out. If, on the other hand, no intention to constitute a present charge can be collected from the instrument itself—as none could in Shaw v. Foster—then the introduction of words requiring that there must be a demand or request to execute a deed is material, because until the demand has been made, upon which alone the obligation to create anything, or the fact of the creation of anything, in the nature of a charge must depend, the condition upon which a charge comes into existence is not satisfied. The question, therefore, in this case is whether the parties intended that the instrument should create a present charge. I think it cannot be entirely left out of consideration that the instrument here is the only security given for a sum of over £370,000. To begin with it is a startling proposition that such a sum was intended by the parties to be advanced without any present or immediate security being given—without any charge which would prevent the property from being misapplied, and the whole of the large sum advanced from being lost. Unless there is something to indicate that the words importing that the further instrument to be executed is only to be executed on demand are meant to postpone the creation of the charge, the natural inference, and especially so where a very large sum is advanced, would be that the parties intended that there should be a present, operative security given for the repayment of the money. It was argued for the appellants that the instrument before us was in effect only a covenant to give a charge, and that where there is a covenant simply to give a charge it is a strong proposition to say that a charge has already been created, because in that case the covenant would be to give that which had already been given. In my opinion that argument leaves out of consideration some very material words in the covenant. It is a covenant not merely to give a charge, but to give a charge "in such form as the society," who advanced the money, "shall request." Those words supply a reason why, there being a present charge created, the obligation to execute a deed should be imposed. It is imposed for the protection of the persons who have advanced the money, in order to enable them to perfect their charge, and make it more operative by inserting any further protective provisions which they may think necessary. I think, therefore, that the sting is taken out of the argument that this instrument is merely a covenant to create a charge. Further, looking at the whole of the instrument, I cannot help thinking that the provision for the immediate appointment of a receiver is important, and indicates the intention to create a present charge, although no doubt the provision—an ordinary one in a receivership deed—that the receiver shall not interfere unless the money has been demanded and not paid renders the argument of less strength than in a case where a receiver is appointed without that qualification, as in Cradock v. Scottish Provident Institution.

For these reasons I come to the conclusion that this instrument is a mortgage; it is an equitable mortgage, and one which does not fall within the definition in sub-section 2 of section 86. It is, therefore, subject to the duty which the commissioners have fixed.

But, if I am wrong in the view which I have stated, there is another view which appears to me equally, if not more, conclusive. This is certainly a covenant, and, to my mind, it is "a covenant for securing the payment or repayment of money." In this case it is for the repayment of the money advanced. There is no other security for the repayment except this document, and it would, I think, be an extravagant construction of the phraseology used if one were to narrow the meaning so as to make the expression a mere synonym for "a covenant to repay the money." The words are used for the purpose of creating a duty in aid of the revenue, and unless there is some obvious reason—such as was pointed out in the case of equitable mortgages by deposit of title-deeds—why a smaller duty, or no duty, should be imposed upon one description of subject-matter rather than another, I cannot conceive why, because the only security is a covenant to do something which will effectually protect the money, that covenant is not a covenant in the nature of a primary security for the repayment of the money just as much as if it were an actual covenant to repay. A covenant to repay would probably be valueless, or comparatively valueless, and it seems to me an extravagant proposition to say that a far more effectual security—namely, a covenant to assign property—is not a covenant or security for the repayment of money.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the instrument in question falls under the description both of "mortgage" and of "covenant" for the purpose of the Stamp Act, 1891, and as such is liable to the duty which has been demanded in respect of it.

BRUCE, J.—I am content to rest my opinion upon the single point that this instrument is a covenant, being a security for the repayment of money. That it is a covenant is beyond doubt, and it seems to me impossible to contend that it was not intended to be, and did not in fact operate as, a security for the repayment of money. It was contended by Mr. Pickford that it did not operate as a security, because it could not become operative as a charge until demand was made. But even assuming that he was well founded in that contention, still I think a covenant that gives me a right to a charge on my making a demand for the charge is still a security. The very circumstance that I have a covenant from my debtor to give me a charge if I demand it, even though it may not constitute a charge until the demand is made, yet does at once operate as a security. The right that I possess by virtue of the covenant to demand a charge does in itself, I think, constitute a security. Suppose a promissory note payable on demand, or payable fourteen days after demand, to be deposited for a loan, is it to be said that that promissory note would not constitute a security? I think that such a document as that—a mere promise to pay on demand, or fourteen days after demand—would constitue a security; and much more so would a covenant.

STYLES (SURVEYOR OF TAXES) (Appellant) v. THE SOCIETY OF THE MIDDLE TEMPLE (Respondents). (a.)

Inland Revenue — Inhabited house duty — Hall — Library — Liability to be assessed — 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, Schedule B., r. 5—House Tax Act, 1851 (14 & 15 Vict. c. 36), s. 1.

The dining hall and offices of the Middle Temple, which are used and occupied during the daytime only, in which no one sleeps or resides, and which have no communication with any premises in which anyone sleeps or resides, are liable to inhabited house duty, as coming within the words "hall or office" in rule 5 of Schedule B. of 48 Geo. 3, c. 55; but the library is not a "hall" within the meaning of that rule, and is not liable to inhabited house duty.

Case stated by the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax Acts for the Division of the Middle Temple in the County of Middlesex.

The treasurer of the Middle Temple appealed to the commissioners against an assessment for inhabited house duty of £1,150 (duty £43 2s. 6d.), made on the hall and offices of the Middle Temple and also against an assessment for inhabited house duty of £490 (duty £18 7s. 6d.), made on the library of the Middle Temple for the year ending the 5th of April, 1898.

The Middle Temple hall and offices consist of a dining hall and kitchen for the use of the members of the inn, with the usual offices, rooms for the use of the treasurer and benchers, and two rooms fitted up and used as lecture rooms for law students.

The premises are used and occupied during the daytime only and are closed and locked at night. No one sleeps or resides on the premises, and they are not used or furnished as a dwelling-house or provided with any sleeping accommodation, nor do they communicate in any way with any apartments or premises which are used as a dwelling-house. A fireman takes charge of the premises when they are closed at night.

The library is a separate building some distance from the hall and offices, and is used during the daytime by the members of the inn. A librarian and porters attend during the day, but at night the premises are always closed and the doors kept locked, and no one remains in the premises or in any room or building with which it has any communication.

The treasurer of the Middle Temple contended that, under the above circumstances, no part of the premises was an "inhabited dwelling-house," and that, as no one resided or dwelt or slept on or in any portion of them, none of the premises were assessable to the house duty imposed by the House Tax Act, 1851 (14 & 15 Vict. c. 36), on inhabited dwelling-houses; and he referred to the judgments of Kelly, C.B., in Riley v. Read, 27 W. R. 414, 4 Ex. D. 100, and Wright, J., in Clifton College v. Tompson, 44 W. R. 410, [1896] 1 Q. B. 432, and contended that the premises in question were used only for the purposes of "education and sustentation" under the Charter of James I., and were not in any sense "inhabited dwelling-houses."

The surveyor of taxes contended that the premises were liable under rule 5, Schedule B., of 48 Geo. 3, c. 55 (the House Tax Act, 1808), by which rule it is provided that: "Every hall or office whatever belonging to any person or persons, or to any body or bodies, politic or corporate, or to any company that are, or lawfully may be, charged with the payment of any other taxes or parish rates, shall be subject to the duties hereby made payable as inhabited houses," and he referred to the decision of the judges in Scotland in Free Church of Scotland v. Bain, 3 Tax Cas. 530, the premises being, as was admitted, chargeable to poor rate.

The commissioners were unanimously of opinion that the library was not assessable, and, by a majority of two to one, that the hall and offices were not assessable, and they relieved the treasurer in both cases.

The Surveyor of Taxes appealed.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G. (Danckwerts with him), for the appellant.—The assessment was made under rule 5 of 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, which rule is still in force, and our contention is that not only the hall and offices but the library also come within the words "hall or office" in that rule, and are liable to this tax. It is contended for the respondents that by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36, the duty is imposed upon "inhabited dwelling-houses," whereas the duty imposed by 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, was upon "inhabited houses" only, and that therefore rule 5 no longer applies. There is really no difference between the language used in the Act of 1851 and in the Act of 1808. In the Act of 1851 the duty is imposed on "inhabited dwelling-houses," and in the Act of 1808 the duty is imposed upon inhabited houses "as set forth in the schedule B.," and when we look at the words used in Schedule B. we see that the words used are "inhabited dwelling-house," so that the subject-matter of taxation in each case is the same—namely, inhabited dwelling-houses. To bring a case within the rule it is not necessary that any person should sleep therein: Free Church of Scotland v. Bain, 3 Tax Cas. 530. The surveyor of taxes was therefore right in assessing not only the hall and offices but the library also.

Balfour Browne, Q.C. (W. Graham with him), for the respondents.—By the House Tax Act, 1851 (14 & 15 Vict. c. 36), the duties are made payable upon "inhabited dwelling-houses" only, and by section 2 it is declared that the previous rules are to be in force only with regard to the duties "hereby granted"—that is, upon "inhabited dwelling-houses," and only in so far as they are "consistent with the express provisions of this Act"—that is, only with regard to "inhabited dwelling-houses." The duties imposed by the Act of Geo. 3 were duties upon "inhabited houses" only, and rule 5 must to that extent be taken to have been repealed by the Act of 1851. The contention of the Crown would require that the word "dwelling" should be read into the Act of Geo. 3. A house cannot be an inhabited dwelling-house unless someone sleeps or resides therein: Riley v. Read, Clifton College v. Tompson. With regard to the library, it is clearly not assessable, as it would be a great straining of language to call the library a "hall." The commissioners were therefore right in discharging the whole assessment.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., replied.

WILLS, J.—In my opinion the Inland Revenue authorities are right about the hall but wrong about the library. With regard to the hall the argument for the respondents divides itself into two branches. The first was intended to show that there is a distinction between the language used in 48 Geo. 3, c. 55 and that used in 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36, by which the then repealed tax upon inhabited dwelling-houses was revived. I think there is no distinction whatever that can be drawn between the two. The distinction attempted to be drawn was that in the enacting portion of the later Act the words "inhabited dwelling-house" are expressly used as defining the subject-matter of taxation. In the Act 48 Geo. 3 different language is used, which appears to me to have identically the same meaning, and I think it would be lamentable to give effect to so fine a distinction as that which has been drawn. The language used in section 1 of 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, is that the tax should be granted on "inhabited houses as set forth in the schedule marked B.," and when we turn to the schedule we find that the only duties which are imposed are upon "inhabited dwelling-houses." I cannot appreciate the distinction between the two things. It is a mere verbal distinction, and I think that the Act 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36 has really in respect of this matter exactly the same operation as the old Act 48 Geo. 3. Coming to the Act 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36, the powers, provisions, and rules with reference to the duties on inhabited dwelling-houses as set forth in Schedule B. to the Act 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, are incorporated, and become in full force for assessing, raising, and levying "the duties hereby granted"; and it was argued for the respondents that as the "duties hereby granted"—that is, granted by the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36—were by that Act 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36, limited specifically to "inhabited dwelling houses," therefore these clauses in Schedule B. of 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, could only be repeated so far as they are necessary for raising the duties upon inhabited dwelling-houses. In my opinion the duties were by the Act 48 Geo. 3 imposed just as specifically upon inhabited dwelling-houses as they are by this Act of 1851. No one can doubt that in the Act of 48 Geo. 3 Schedule B. must be taken in some way to operate upon the duties which were thereby granted, which were duties upon "inhabited dwelling-houses" only. When we come to rule 5 it is true that it says "every hall or office, &c., shall be subject to the duties hereby made payable as inhabited houses"—that is to say, as if they were inhabited houses, and it is true that the construction contended for by the Crown does require them to insert in the expression "inhabited house," the word "dwelling," and to say that "inhabited house" there means "inhabited dwelling-house." If it does not, then in my opinion there is not any "dwelling" here, and this could not in ordinary language be considered as a dwelling-house. But rule 5 must have been intended to have something more than the extraordinarily limited operation which it would have if the contention on behalf of the Middle Temple were correct. I cannot believe it was intended to have that limited operation, and I think it is obvious how the expression "inhabited house" came in. It is the expression used in section 1 of the Act, and the draughtsman of the rules repeated that without repeating the other expression "as herein set forth." For these reasons I think that the expression "inhabited house," where it occurs in rule 5, really means an "inhabited dwelling-house," which is that which is made the subject of taxation by the Act. Though I agree that every tax, if it is to be supported, must be found within the clear language of an Act of Parliament, I am disposed to repudiate the notion of there being an artificial distinction between the rules to be applied to a taxing Act and the rules to be applied to any other Act. It is abundantly clear that under rule 5 "inhabited house" really means "inhabited dwelling-house," and for these reasons I think the Crown are right with regard to the hall.

With regard to the library the matter stands on a very different footing. A library is a perfectly well known thing and is essentially different from a hall. A hall is generally a place which is used for some business purposes connected with the general objects of the society which possesses it, whereas a library is a place devoted to books, reading, and study, and I cannot think it is less a library because it happens to be structurally such a building as, if it stood without the books in it, would be naturally described as a "hall." I think, therefore, that the taxation of the library as a "hall" or "office" is erroneous, and that portion of the appeal of the Crown ought to fail. The other portion relating to the hall ought to succeed, and as each side has succeeded as to part there ought to be no costs on either side.

BRUCE, J.—I agree. The library is not an "inhabited house." It is not an "inhabited dwelling-house," and it is not taxable as such unless it is made liable by the words of rule 5 of the schedule of 48 Geo. 3, or in other words, unless it can be said to be a "hall." I think we ought not to extend the meaning of the word "hall" so as to include a building if such building is not strictly within the meaning of the words. Though I feel there is no great distinction between "hall" and "library," yet there is a distinction, and if "library" does not come within the word "hall" in its natural meaning, we ought not to extend the meaning of the word "hall" to it.

ELLIS AND OTHERS v. DUKE OF BEDFORD. (a.)

Practice—Parties—Joinder of plaintiffs—Class actions—Common ground of relief—Rights in market—R. S. C., ord. 16, rr. 1, 9.

Where certain preferential rights are alleged to have been conferred by statute upon an indefinite class, who claim such rights not as members of the general public, but as a section of and adverse to the general public, then the members of such a statutory class possess a common interest and common rights, and some members of the class can properly bring an action on behalf of themselves and all other members of the class to maintain such statutory interest and rights.

The Attorney-General is a proper party to such an action, but only as representing the public as a whole, and not the statutory class.

A statutory preferential right was claimed in respect of three classes of stands at Covent Garden Market, and it was sought to combine the three claims in one action.

Held, that this was a mere matter of convenience, and that there was nothing in the law to make it necessary that there should be three actions, each confined to one class of stands.

Decision of Romer, J. (ante, p. 170) (Vaughan Williams, L.J., dissentiente), reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Romer, J., (reported ante, p. 170).

The facts are fully stated in the report of the case in the court below and are also referred to in the judgment of Lindley, M.R.

It is enough to say here that by the Act for the regulation of Covent Garden Market (9 Geo. 4, c. cxiii.), certain stands were exclusively appropriated for the reception of wagons and carts belonging to growers of fruit, flowers, vegetables, roots, and herbs, at tolls or rent according to a schedule, and such growers were to be deemed to be persons having preferential rights to resort to such stands under the provisions of the Act.

The plaintiffs were six market gardeners who sued on behalf of themselves and all other such growers as aforesaid for a declaration that the defendant, who was the owner of Covent Garden Market, was not entitled to exclude them from the preferential rights conferred by the Act. They alleged that they had each been refused stands when unlet and that the reason of the refusal was not any objection to any of the plaintiffs as a proper tenant but that the defendant had stated it to be his practice not to let such stands and had denied that the growers as a class had preferential rights. They also claimed to be repaid certain overcharges.

The defendant took out a summons to set aside the writ and all proceedings in the action on the ground that the plaintiffs, as having separate and distinct causes of action, could not join, and that also they could not as private individuals sue on behalf of a class of the public in respect of statutory or other public rights. Romer, J., held that the growers as a class had not any proprietary rights in respect of the market under the provisions of the Act in their favour, and that such right which the growers as a class had thereunder was in the nature of a public right which must be enforced at the suit of the Attorney-General. He also held that the plaintiffs had not and did not claim any right to relief "in respect of or arising out of the same transaction or transactions," and that therefore the six several claims of the plaintiffs as individuals were not rightly joined under ord. 16, r. 1. An order was made in accordance with the summons.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Farwell, Q.C., and J. T. Prior, for the appellants.—The short point is—the growers say we have preferential rights under the Act of Parliament (9 Geo. 4, c. cxiii.), and the duke says you have no such rights. If the license were given even for a day that would be sufficient to support an action for trespass. Ord. 16, r. 1, must apply to such a case as this.

They referred to Temperton v. Russell, 41 W. R. 321, [1893] 1 Q. B. 435; Ellis v. Bridgnorth, 12 W. R. 56, 15 C. B. N. S. 52; Holford v. Bailey, 13 Q. B. 426; Stroud v. Lawson, 46 W. nom. Warrick v. Queen's College, Oxford, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 716.]

Levett, Q.C., and Gwynn James (Danckwerts with them), for the defendant.—It is plain from the preamble of this Act that the only object of the Act was re-arrangement, and it should not therefore be construed so as to effect any alteration of rights. The growers only have the rights which are given them by the Act, and these do not amount to more than a preferential right as against non-growers. They get no proprietary rights at all under the Act. We submit that if there is no proprietary right, but only a right in the nature of a public right, the action must fail. In all cases cited on behalf of the plaintiffs some right of property had been acquired. Then as to ord. 16, r. 1, we submit that it is not enough to show that there is one common question of law, but the relief claimed must arise out of one transaction or a series of transactions. We say that the plaintiffs have shown no connection whatever between these transactions. Here you have two distinct actions—one a common law action for a private wrong, and the other an equitable action for a declaration of rights. We submit, therefore, that they are not within ord. 16, r. 9, because the only reason that a man can bring a representative action is that he represents a large class, while the only reason that he can bring a private action is that he has a private wrong. They cannot join distinct claims to relief.

Farwell, Q.C., in reply, referred to Warrick v. Queen's College, Oxford.

LINDLEY, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of Romer, J., made upon a summons which runs thus: "That the writ and all other proceedings may be set aside on the ground that the action is improperly constituted and the writ not authorized by the rules of the court, and that several plaintiffs having separate and distinct causes of action not being in respect of or arising out of the same alleged transaction or series of transactions are joined in the writ and action. And on the ground that the plaintiffs cannot sue in respect of the alleged causes of action on behalf of themselves and all other members of the public being growers of fruit and so on, and that such action cannot be maintained by private individuals on behalf of such members of the public as answer the description alleged in respect of public statutory or other rights alleged. And alternatively that the plaintiffs be put to elect the name of a single plaintiff to continue the action, and that in respect of such plaintiffs' alleged personal causes of action only," and so on.

Now, the decision of Romer, J., is in substance in accordance with that summons, and this is the order he has made: "The court being of opinion that the plaintiffs are not entitled to sue on behalf of themselves and all others the growers of fruit," and so on, "within the meaning of the Act of Geo. 4, c. cxiii, and they are not entitled to sue together as co-plaintiffs in one action in respect of the alleged causes of action respectively alleged by them personally and otherwise in their capacity as representing themselves and all other growers as aforesaid, doth order that the action be stayed in respect of all matters and alleged causes of action alleged by the plaintiffs in their representative capacity on behalf of themselves and all other growers aforesaid, and that unless the plaintiffs shall within fourteen days from the entry of this order, or in the event of an appeal within fourteen days from the entry of the order of the Court of Appeal elect by agreement between themselves for one of them to proceed with this action as sole plaintiff, and so far only as he seeks relief as individual and in respect of his individual and personal cause or causes of action only, this action to stand dismissed out of this court with costs, and such dismissal is to be without prejudice to any further action by any of the plaintiffs with respect to his own individual and personal cause of action."

On looking at his judgment the ground on which Romer, J., made the order is plain, as he says, "I am unable to come to the conclusion that the growers as a class have any proprietary rights in respect of the market." Now, although the question is of the nature I have just mentioned, it raises an important principle, which is whether it is possible to have such an action as this. Romer, J., says it is not, and that the only remedy, if any, open to the plaintiffs is that each must sue for his own grievance, or the Attorney-General must sue on behalf of the public. In order to understand that it is necessary to say a few words about the object of this action, and the Act of Parliament which gives rise to it. The action is brought by six persons on behalf of themselves, and all others the growers of fruit, vegetables, and so on within the meaning of what I will call the Covent Garden Market Act (9 Geo. 4). Their grievance so alleged is this: They say that the growers of fruit have certain preferential rights in respect of certain stands, which are referred to in the Act as the "casual cart stands," and form block B on the plan to which we have been referred, the "yearly cart stands" which form block C on the plan, and the "yearly pitching stands" which form blocks F and G on the plan. Their contention is that under the Act the growers of fruit and vegetables have not, as individual members of the public, an ordinary right to resort to Covent Garden Market and have their wagons standing there, but that they have, as a section of the public, certain preferential rights available against all other sections of the public, and which have to be respected by the lord of the manor, who is the Duke of Bedford. Now, if this is true I cannot see why some of them should not be at liberty to test the question whether they have or have not these rights by an action framed as this is, so far as it is an action by some on behalf of themselves and others. I am not going to spell through the Act to ascertain exactly what the rights of any of the growers are in respect of these three classes of stands. I have looked through the Act very carefully, and I have studied it section by section. If I could come to the conclusion on a study of the Act that the action was frivolous, that these growers had not any rights at all, either against the public or against the lord of the market, it would follow that the action was altogether misconceived, and perhaps the sooner it was stopped the better. But I am bound to say I cannot come to that conclusion. I cannot come to the conclusion that there is nothing to try in respect of the controversy which the plaintiffs set up. Take the case of the casual cart stands. I take this case to show why I differ from Romer, J. With regard to these casual cart stands, I have come to the conclusion that there is an honest question to be tried which can be tried by some growers on behalf of themselves and others. I say no more than that at present. The question who the "growers" are may prove serious, because when this Act was passed we know that London was supplied with vegetables in a very different way to what it is now. In 1828, which was before railways or steamboats carried cargoes to any great extent, London was fed by the market gardeners round London, and depended for its supply on the growers round London, and the growers who actually fed London were the market gardeners of Brompton. Now the "growers" do not only live in the neighbourhood of London, the "growers" send things from Cornwall, from Scotland, from Ireland, from Africa, and what "growers" means now I do not pretend to say. I find the expression in the Act, and I find reason for contending—I am not going to decide it now—that the growers have certain rights as regards these stands in addition and adverse, as I understand it, to the rest of the public, and enforceable against the duke as lord of the market. Now, take the "casual cart stands." Section 7 of the Act is the principal, though not the only, section which refers to the casual cart stands. It says that the "casual cart stands" shall be exclusively appropriated to the reception of wagons, &c., in which fruit and so on shall be brought to the market for sale, and the growers are to have preferable rights to resort to such stands. I cannot say that that means nothing at all. Then section 17 contains a proviso for the use of the stands by others, but they are to remove if the persons having preferable rights have occasion to occupy them. Now observe how impossible it would be, in my judgment, for an action by any single grower to succeed either at law or in equity unless he can prove some definite grievance. It may be immediately checkmated by the lord of the market saying, "You as one individual have no right. I will give your stand to someone else." The lord could play one off against the other and defeat each in turn, and yet he might, as the plaintiffs say he does, deny that the growers have any preferential rights at all. How is that to be ascertained according to the ordinary rules of procedure? It cannot be properly done or adequately done in an action in which each grower is plaintiff. Besides, an action by one would not bind others in any shape or sense. I do not think it could be done on information or action by the Attorney-General, unless he made a party to his proceeding some of the growers on behalf of themselves and others, for this reason, that the claim of the growers is a claim against the public as well as against the lord. They do not allege that they as individual members of the public are impeded by the lord, but that they are a special part of the public and having preferential rights, or whatever the expression is, under the Act of Parliament are met by a denial of all preferential rights. It would be extremely difficult for any one man of them to show that he in particular has a right as distinguished from the others. I doubt whether it could be done. So as regards the yearly cart stands, the grievance or the right they allege is this, that they as growers have preferential rights to leases on the terms mentioned in the Act. I doubt very much whether any one could obtain specific performance for the grant of any lease. They would be all beaten in detail. I have been thinking it over very carefully, and I doubt whether such an action could succeed. There, again, the Attorney-General would not represent the growers. He would represent the public against the growers, and I do not think he would adequately represent the rights which are asserted. There, again, the grievance alleged is not that A., B., or C. being a grower cannot get a yearly cart stand, but that the duke, no doubt from his point of view for the better regulation of the market, says they have no right there at all, and has set them all at defiance. Similar observations apply to the other class of stands—the yearly pitching stands, as to which there is a greater difficulty about the right to any relief at all. There are some preferential rights apparently even there given to growers, but what they are is a matter to be ascertained when the case comes on to be tried. Now take any one of these dissociated from the others. I ask myself whether it would not be right to have the question, whether the preferential rights asserted exist or not, tried in an action brought by some of the growers on behalf of themselves and others. I cannot conceive why not. The growers, who are a statutory indefinite class, whether large or small I do not know, are a class on whom the statute has conferred certain preferential rights. There is a common right, there is a common interest according to the allegation in the statement of claim, because the allegations are that the duke ignores the right of the whole class. Now let us go back to the time before the Judicature Act. I cannot conceive why such an action as this would not lie. Mr. Levett has called attention to one or two cases which he thinks show the contrary. The only one of the slightest importance, to my mind, is the one of Weale v. West Middlesex Waterworks Co. The decision of Lord Eldon in that case was, I should have thought, extremely easy. In the first place it was not a bill by one on behalf of himself and others. That was carefully avoided, and the real object of the suit was to compel the Court of Chancery to settle the price to be paid for water. The judgment is of considerable importance because it is an extremely instructive one, and Lord Eldon refers to all sorts of cases in which a bill by one on behalf of himself and others would not lie, and the most important of all is that which Mr. Levett relied on. The answer to that case is this—that we have advanced a long way since Lord Eldon's time in suits of this description, and suits have been maintained by one on behalf of himself and others which perhaps Lord Eldon would not have sanctioned. Above all, now you can have under the Judicature Act actions to declare rights. I refer to ord. 25, r. 5, which says: [His lordship read the rule, and continued:] Having regard to that rule it does appear impossible to say now that one grower could not maintain such an action as this —that is to say, on behalf of himself and all othe growers of fruit—to assert the preferential rights which he says the whole class have. Mr. Levett referred to another case of Lord Eldon's, Jones v. Garcia del Rio in Turner & Russell, which was to the effect that persons who had lost their money in subscribing to the Peruvian Loan could not sue on behalf of themselves and others. But that has been reconsidered and to a certain extent modified in modern times. Beeching v. Lloyd, 3 W. R. 364, 3 Drew. 227, is an authority to that effect. [His lordship read the head-note to that case, and continued:] Whether that is an advance on Lord Eldon's doctrine or not I do not know. It is under diff-rent circumstances, because there the ground for rescission of the contract was a fraudulent prospectus. I understand that case as warranting an action by one on behalf of himself and others who have been defrauded by the prospectus to get the money back. Now, the principle on which the old Courts of Equity allowed suits by some on behalf of themselves and others was very much discussed in Warrick v. Queen's College, Oxford, in which there was a most instructive judgment on this particular point. That was a bill filed by two or three freeholders of a manor claiming commons. There was a very great deal of litigation about the frame of the suit, and in point of fact a great deal depended on it. Lord Hatherley held that an action in that form would lie, although broadly, if you go back to antiquity, each freeholder sued on his separate prescriptive right. Lord Hatherley held that they had such a common interest in the matter in dispute, the rights of the freeholders over the common, that he overruled the objection, and in a passage which I will read he appears to me to have stated the real doctrine as it was then understood and applied. [His lordship then read from the judgment L. R. 6 Ch. App. p. at 726, "It may be of course . . . in respect of that common right," and continued:]Then he goes on to give an instance in modern times of shareholders of a railway company. Now, if the allegations in this statement of claim are true, of which I know nothing, this case is, to my mind, brought within the principle of that case so far as I am at present discussing it—that is to say, I think that case is an authority to show, and apart from that case I should have so thought, that there would be no difficulty in maintaining a bill or an action by some of the growers on behalf of themselves and others to vindicate their rights against what I will call the common enemy, a person who says the class have no rights at all. I do not say this action is properly constituted. I do not think it is. I have already expressed my opinion that these plaintiffs are asserting as against the public rights which the Attorney-General ought to be here to protect. That difficulty can be got over in a way which I will mention presently. I am addressing my mind to the view of Romer, J., who said that, even if these folks have these rights, the action is wrong, because they cannot sue on behalf of themselves and others, but each must sue alone, or the Attorney-General must sue on their behalf. From that I respectfully differ. That applies not only to the first lot of stands, the casual cart stands, but it applies, and I need not repeat it, to the yearly cart stands and the yearly pitching stands; that is to say, I have got so far that in my judgment one grower could sue on behalf of himself and others in one action with reference to each of those stands.

I now pass to the question whether they can combine the three causes of action in one. That is a pure question of convenience, to my mind. The right of the classes of growers depend on the construction of, I may say, the same sections in the Act. That is not literally true, but it all turns not only on the construction of the whole Act, but on the 7th section as modified by the rest of the Act. The right the plaintiffs claim is a statutory preferable right, available over three classes of stands, and if, as they say, rights are ignored, I cannot see why the question should not be raised in one action instead of three. If the learned judge had thought it was inconvenient to mix up one class of stands with the others, and had said so, I do not suppose we should have interfered; but there is nothing that I know of in law and nothing that I know of in this case on the question of convenience which would be gained by saying that there must be three actions—one confined to casual cart stands, one confined to yearly cart stands, and one confined to yearly pitching stands. It strikes me it is eminently a case where, having regard to the scope of the Act, one action properly constituted may be maintained in respect of all three.

Another objection is, that if that is so, they cannot sue for the return of the overpayments which they allege they have made. I do not suppose that is material. It would not warrant striking out and setting aside the writ and all the proceedings under it. It might lead to an amendment or to a dismissal of so much of the action as related to that; but I do not go into that question at all. Looking at it as a mere matter of procedure, I doubt whether, after Beeching v. Lloyd, there is anything so radically wrong in it that the writ ought to be struck out. I am not prepared to go that length. Whether it will ultimately succeed or not I do not say.

Then as to paragraph 19 of the statement of claim, which I do not quite understand, I should have thought that was better out than in, but I will not discuss it now. We are not drafting or framing the action, we are discussing the question whether this action is so badly constituted that it ought to be summarily stopped. In my opinion it is not. I have given my reasons for saying that I do not think an action by the Attorney-General, in the absence of someone representing the growers, would be a proper form of procedure to raise the controversy which these growers want raised. The Attorney-General would represent the public, including the growers, but if you come to a question between classes of the public, I do not think he could; and Romer, J., felt that, and said the difficulty could be got over by having the Attorney-General to represent one class of the public, and the Solicitor-General to represent another class. I do not say it could not be done in that way. I doubt it; and I never heard of such a proceeding. According to my mind the proper mode of dealing with the difficulty is to make the Attorney-General a defendant to represent the public as against the alleged preferential rights of the smaller class—namely, the growers who allege rights separate and distinct from those of the public in general.

Then what is to be done? In my opinion the appeal must be allowed and the order below discharged, and the plaintiffs by their counsel undertaking to amend and make the Attorney-General a party as defendant give them leave to amend, and let the plaintiffs' costs both here and below be the plaintiffs' costs in the action. I think that will meet the justice of the case, because I am satisfied that there is a serious question to be tried. We cannot try it now, partly because the Attorney-General is not here, and partly because we have not the materials on which to decide it. As an academical question it appears to me that the plaintiffs are in the right, although the action is not properly constituted by reason of the absence of the Attorney-General.

RIGBY, L.J.—This is an action which in truth and form and substance is brought by six plaintiffs, all of them claiming to be growers within the meaning of the Act of 9 Geo. 4 on behalf of themselves and other growers, and it is brought against, as sole defendant, the Duke of Bedford, who is the lord of Covent Garden Market. The object of the action, as I view it, is to have discussed and determined the question whether any and what rights are given to the class which the six plaintiffs claim to represent under and by virtue of the Act of Geo. 4. Now, I propose to avoid giving an opinion upon any question of the construction of that Act of Parliament beyond this, that I have examined the Act sufficiently to satisfy myself that there are questions which ought to be determined—in which way I will not say—and that the action, therefore, cannot be looked upon as frivolous and vexatious, or an abuse of the practice of the court, or in any light which could authorize the court summarily to put an end to it. I think, therefore, the action ought to go on, and it appears to me that this class of growers which is created by the Act must be looked upon as a class which, as against the rest of the public, may have preferential rights under the Act. All questions of construction of the Act remain, and, though I have formed some opinion, I do not know how to indicate what it is at all, because it would be wrong to do so for this, if for no other, reason, that the setting up of these rights against the public make the public important parties to the discussion, and the public are not at the present moment represented at all. I consider that it is a wrong view to take that these alleged preferential rights could be set up without the presence of the Attorney-General. The Duke of Bedford—the only defendant—does not represent the public, and as the action is now constituted, no one represents the public. Therefore it would be wrong (and on other grounds it would be inadvisable) to determine those important questions—for I agree they are important questions—on the construction of the Act against the public; at any rate it would be wrong to determine them against the public in any degree in the absence of the Attorney-General, who would represent them.

The six plaintiffs do not represent different classes of growers, and do not claim to represent them. They represent the whole class of growers, and on behalf of that class they point to the Act and they indicate that they claim certain privileges. The Act does not split up the class of growers, and it nowhere, so far as I can see, talks about this class of growers and that class of growers, but it gives privileges to the whole class, and I cannot see why this is not a good way, if it is not the best way, of raising the question. The only other way in which it seems to me the question could be raised would be by an information by the Attorney-General against the growers, and then the growers would have to be represented as defendants. What advantage there is in that I do not know. He could not take their part and set up as a champion of the growers, because he represents the public at large, and he cannot as the public at large represent any growers. It appears to me that this is the only way, and if it is not a question improper to be tried it ought to tried in this action. I agree with all the Master of the Rolls has said, that this doctrine of representative action has been a progressive and growing one—fortunately, I think—since the time of Lord Eldon; and therefore I do not think it necessary to go into cases. I will, however, say this, that I do not know any case in which a bonâ fide claim on behalf of a class has been summarily disposed of by saying that the members of that class did not represent the whole. Here we have no difficulty, such as might arise if we were construing a grant from the lord of the market. It might be possible to see that certain grants in favour of certain people improperly described or not sufficiently ascertained would be, on the face of it, void. We are dealing with an Act of Parliament which does create, or sufficiently indicate, a class of persons to whom, it is not unreasonably suggested, the Act gives preferential rights.

Now, that being my view of the case, it is not in the least important from my point of view to split up what I may call the claims of the plaintiffs and to say this one relates to one question and this to another. They do not. They represent all the classes, and representing the whole class they desire to have their rights ascertained and declared. The main object and the substance of the suit is that they wish to have the rights of growers under the Act of Parliament declared. I do not think Romer, J., if he had allowed that they could act representatively, would have said that this must be split up into different questions. What he decided, as I understand his judgment, and I think it sufficiently plain, is that this is not a case in which a representative action will lie at all, therefore each of these plaintiffs must be treated as an individual, some coming under one allegation and some under another; and as he was not going to allow a representative action, he treated the plaintiffs as split up in that way, and asked whether (treating them as individuals) they could join these causes of action. Now, that is not the case at all. They are seeking to act as representatives of the whole class, and I cannot entertain a doubt that the convenient and proper thing is when they raise one question about the class to raise them all and put their claims on any grounds that they think they can, according to the provisions of the Act, maintain. Then I do not think that the question under order 16 comes in at all. I say it is one action for one main purpose—namely, to ascertain the rights of the growers under the Act of Parliament and that it is not a question whether advantage could be asked or given of the provision of the new order which permits, in certain cases, different plaintiffs having certain causes of action to have their causes of action tried together in one action. This is not this case at all.

I do not think it necessary to add anything further. I do not consider that it is a proper case for a representative action for one or more of the growers. Here there are six. There is no harm in having six plaintiffs. It only means a better security for costs. One, according to my view, would have done to raise the whole question.

That being so I think it is wrong to prevent the question from being raised in this way, and in fact it appears to me that practically if that be permitted it never can effectively be raised in any way whatsoever.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I have arrived at a different conclusion. I think the judgment of Romer, J., was perfectly right.

I am somewhat embarrassed in giving judgment in in this case by the consideration that the judgment of the court is that this question, which is really a question on the construction of an Act of Parliament, must be tried hereafter. That being so, it is obviously not desirable that I should take the Act of Parliament and, upon this occasion, put a construction upon it, because it may be inconvenient having regard to the action which has to be tried that I should do so. But on the other hand it is not easy to avoid doing so to a certain extent, because in my judgment the ground upon which this action ought to be dealt with—as Romer, J., did deal with it—is that according to the true construction of the Act of Parliament the plaintiffs' action is altogether wrongly constituted, and in my judgment that being the only question really which at any time will have to be tried in this action, it is very unfortunate if that question cannot be disposed of now and an expensive litigation got rid of, because when the action does come to trial, if the view which was taken by Romer, J., and which I am now taking, is the right view, there would be an end of the action. It seems to me that it would be much more convenient if that question could be solved now once for all—that is, the question whether or not these persons can properly bring an action at all in respect of the matters that they are complaining of. According to my view the decision of Romer, J., apart from ord. 16, r. 1, which I agree is quite a subsidiary question, is based upon this, that this is a case in which the plaintiffs cannot bring a representative action because they, the plaintiffs, are not members of a class having a common right. Of course, if according to the true construction of the Act, the Act is an Act for the regulation of the market, and is an Act which confers no private rights whatever, but is only an Act affecting a public right, an Act therefore creating rights in respect of which, by an old and well-established series of decisions, no member of the public can bring an action unless he is able to allege a particular injury to himself as distinguished from the other subjects of Her Majesty and bases his claim on the damage caused to him by that particular injury, as I have already pointed out, that being the ground upon which this action has been dealt with, it is extremely difficult to give the reasons for any decision without to a certain extent expressing my view as to the meaning of this Act of Parliament. On the other hand, I do not think it at all necessary for me to go through the Act of Parliament section by section to deal with the question whether one particular section or the whole of the sections, after they have separately been carefully regarded, create, or are intended to create, private rights. It will be sufficient for me to make the statement generally. I think perhaps the best mode for me to do this is for me to state what I consider to be the argument put forward on behalf of the defendant here, and then having done that in sufficient detail to make it clear what that argument is; to say that, in my judgment, that argument raises such a primâ facie case that we ought to dispose of it at once, and say whether, in our judgment, the action is or is not so improperly constituted that it ought not to be allowed to go on.

Before doing that I wish to make two observations which do not turn on any controverted question as to the construction of this Act. The first thing is this, and I am happy to see that I am in accord with the other members of the court when I express my opinions, that the questions raised in this action are so much questions of public right that it is perfectly impossible that the action should proceed without the presence of the Attorney-General as defendant or plaintiff. Speaking for myself, I have looked to see if I can find either at common law or in equity a single instance in which an individual member of the public has been allowed successfully to bring an action in respect of a matter which is so much a matter of public right that it cannot be disposed of without the presence of the Attorney-General without the plaintiff alleging particular damage to himself in that action. I can only say I find no such case. Then I want to make a further observation as to a matter in which I should have the greatest possible hesitation in entertaining any different opinion from that of the Master of the Rolls and Rigby, L.J., because it is on a subject on which it would be affectation on my part not to avow that their judgments must be much better than mine. That is this, that as their decision is to a certain extent based upon the equity practice of allowing one person to bring an action on behalf of himself and others, and it has been laid down by them that this is a case which falls within the principles which have governed that practice, if this was a mere question of what were the principles that govern that practice I really should not presume to arrive a different conclusion. But I do not think I have arrived at a different conclusion as to the principle. I have only arrived at a different conclusion as to the fact. I have looked at the case of Beeching v. Lloyd and also that of Warrick v. Queen's College, Oxford, and it seems to me that these cases entirely coincide with what I am now going to say, and indeed with what has been said by my brothers on this morning. The principle is that one may bring an action on behalf of himself and others where there is a community of interest, but I do not understand that any one of these cases decide that one may bring an action on behalf of himself and others where there is not some one interest in which all these persons have a common concern. In my view that is not true in the present case, because and according to the view I take of this case all the plaintiffs here are suing in respect of a private right, and inasmuch as they have not individually a private right irrespective of particular damage a fortiori they cannot have a community in some one private right.

Now I shall only say a word or two as to what I understand the defendant's argument to be, and in respect of which it is that I have come to the conclusion, not that that argument has been established, because if that argument were held to be established, there is an end of the action, and the court has decided that the action is to go on—but what I do say is that that argument does establish such a primâ facie proof of its truth that one ought now to go on and decide, one way or the other, as to the contentions raised thereby, so that in case the argument of the defendant is established there may be an end of this litigation; not, of course, an end of the rights of these people in so far as these people are interested in the public right. Qua the public right they can get the Attorney-General to bring his action, and an action in which it will be much more convenient to try these questions than in the present action, because it will be an action in which the non-growers (and I do not understand that even the plaintiffs' argument here suggested that one can treat the non-growers as a class separated from the public) will be represented, which certainly they will not be in the action as it is now constituted. Moreover, if any individual member of the public, whether grower or not, has sustained a particular injury, there is nothing for him in this action. Now, this is what I understand the contention of the defendant to be, and the contention in respect of which Romer, J., gave his decision. It is said by the defendant that the plaintiffs cannot avail themselves of ord. 16, r. 9, because the plaintiffs have not the same interest in any cause or matter. The interest alleged by the plaintiffs is an interest under an Act of Parliament for the improvement and good regulation of Covent Garden Market. That is the title of the Act. The plaintiffs allege that that Act gives them as growers, as a class, certain preferential rights constituting some sort of proprietary interest in them. They make no claim excepting under the Act of Parliament. The defendant contends that this Act of Parliament deals with public rights only, and creates no private rights whatever, and no rights in any section of the public, and derogates in no way from the rights of the defendant as they existed at the time of the commencement of the Act. The market, it is said, is a franchise, and could only be granted for the public good; the public must have free access to it subject only to a reasonable toll and to certain rights of stalling, &c., as shall not interfere with the enjoyment of the market; that order must be maintained in the market; that it is the duty and right of the lord to regulate the market; but that as questions had arisen as to the sufficiency of his power to regulate Covent Garden Market, this Act was passed for the regulation of the market; that the growers and the non-growers each of them had places assigned to them in the market, and that the growers had appropriated to them, or rather to their purposes, spaces in preference to non-growers, and that this is merely a regulation of the market and confers no right of property whatever, and that to say it does so is as though one should say that if an Act of Parliament or bye-law enacted that in the occupation of seats the rule seniores priores should apply, this would create a right of property in the seniores. It is further pointed out that this Act of Parliament is not like an Act of Parliament embodying a compact between persons or corporations capable of contracting; that the growers as such are not a sufficiently definite body to make a contract; that any member of the public may become a grower, and, as a member of the public, enjoy not only access to the market, but the particular access to the market accorded by the Act of Parliament to growers. I do not propose to say anything more about the Act of Parliament or how far the sections of it support that argument which I have tried to summarize as being the argument of the defendant. I only say that in my judgment that argument is of such a character as to entitle the defendant to have it decided now, on this application, whether or not this action is properly constituted or whether it ought not at once to be stayed for its obvious defects. Nothing that I have said in my judgment is intended to be any judgment upon the meaning of the Act of Parliament or the validity of the argument which I have summarized. I have only stated it sufficiently to account for my conclusion that the judgment of Romer, J., was perfectly right.

Bankruptcy—Married woman trading separately from her husband in firm name—Non-compliance with bankruptcy notice — Act of bankruptcy — Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 1 (5)—R. S. C., ord. 48a, rr. 4, 5, 8, 11.

Where a judgment has been obtained against a married woman trading separately from her husband in the name of a firm, even if in the form prescribed by Scott v. Morley, 36 W. R. 67, 20 Q. B. D. 120, as applicable to married women, she is not liable to be made a bankrupt upon a bankruptcy notice founded on that judgment. The judgment is merely a judgment against her separate estate.

Appeal from the registrar in bankruptcy.

In October, 1898, Messrs. Moore Bros. signed final judgment under order 14 for £52 4s. 10d. for goods supplied against the firm of Frances Handford & Co.

An appearance to the writ had been entered by Frances Handford, trading as Frances Handford & Co., but she did not appear to the proceedings under order 14.

After judgment the plaintiffs served Mrs. Handford with a bankruptcy notice, and on the 7th of December presented a petition in bankruptcy, when they discovered for the first time that Mrs. Handford was a married woman.

The petition was opposed on two grounds: (1) that Mrs. Handford was not trading separately from her husband, and (2) that having regard to the form of the judgment against a married woman in Scott v. Morley, 36 W. R. 67, 20 Q. B. D. 120 (at p. 132), a receiving order could not properly be made on a bankruptcy petition founded on a judgment obtained against a married woman.

Mr. Registrar Hope made a receiving order, holding that Mrs. Handford was trading separately from her husband, and that having allowed judgment to go against her by default she was estopped from opposing the petition.

Mrs. Handford appealed.

F. Cooper-Willis, for the appellant, was stopped by the court.

Hansell, for the respondent.—Dillon v. Cunningham, L. R. 8 Ex. 23, 21 W. R. Dig. 90, was decided upon the words of section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869; jurisdiction was given to order imprisonment or payment of the debt by instalments; such an order was held to apply to a married woman. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., referred to Lovell & Christmas v. Beauchamp, 43 W. R. 129, [1894] A. C. 607.] A married woman can be made bankrupt if she has committed an act of bankruptcy. He referred to the judgment of Bowen, L.J., in Scott v. Morley; The Alliance Deposit and Investment Co. v. Gardiner, 105 L. T. Journal 224; and In re Gardiner, Ex parte Coulson, 36 W. R. 142, 20 Q. B. D. 249.

LINDLEY, M.R.—This case raises a new and interesting point. The debtor is a married woman trading under the name or firm of Frances Handford & Co. Her husband was in trouble, and I shall assume for the purposes of this judgment that she carried on business separately from her husband within the legal meaning of those words. She appointed him her attorney to carry on the business in her name, and she gave him power to sign cheques per. proc. Some persons supplied the firm with goods in the ordinary way of business, and also I think in the ordinary way of business did not take the trouble to find out who were the persons constituting the firm with which they were dealing. That is common enough; then when you want payment you find out who owes you the money. The persons who supplied these goods did not even do that, but issued a writ under order 48*a* against the firm for the price of the goods. The lady entered an appearance under her own name, trading as Frances Handford & Co. The plaintiffs proceed quite regularly under order 14, and get judgment against Frances Handford & Co. What is the consequence of that? Upon that judgment they have issued a bankruptcy notice, and seek to have this lady made bankrupt. The view of the registrar was that she was trading separately from her husband, and that she was estopped by having allowed judgment in the name of the firm to go against her by default from saying that that was not a good personal judgment against her.

Upon the assumption on which I am proceeding, that this married woman was trading separately from her husband, it is plain that she was liable to be adjudicated a bankrupt under s. 1, sub-section 5, of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. That section provides that "Every woman carrying on a trade separately from her husband shall in respect of her separate property be subject to the bankruptcy laws in the same way as if she were a feme sole." The question is what is the legal effect of that. It has been decided that upon a judgment against a married woman in the form settled in Scott v. Morley she cannot be made a bankrupt, because there is no personal judgment on her to pay, but a judgment against her separate property not subject to restraint against anticipation. That form provides as follows: "It is adudged that the plaintiff do recover £ and costs (to be taxed) against the defendant (the married woman), such sum and costs to be payable out of her separate property as hereinafter mentioned, and not otherwise. And it is ordered that execution hereon be limited to the separate property of the defendant (the married woman), not subject to any restriction against anticipation, unless by reason of section 19 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, the property shall be liable to execution, notwithstanding such restriction." Where a judgment has been obtained in that form, which is a proper judgment against a married woman, it has been decided more than once that a married woman, though she may be made bankrupt for other causes, is not liable to be made a bankrupt upon a bankruptcy notice founded on that judgment. That brings us back to the question what is the legal effect of a judgment against a married woman in the name of the firm under which she is trading? Looking at ord. 48*a*, r. 11, coupled with rules 4, 5, and 8, I think it is not difficult to see what it is. The effect is that the form of the judgment conceals the truth, but does not alter it. When you have a rule which enables you for the sake of convenience to bring an action and to obtain judgment against a firm, you are in truth bringing an action against the persons who constitute the firm, and the judgment is really a judgment against the individuals. That is all that the rule means. Whether in enforcing that judgment in a case where the firm consists of a married woman you shall issue the ordinary fi. fa., or a special fi. fa. in the form prescribed in Scott v. Morley, I must leave the creditors to determine. I cannot think that the judgment will have any effect except as a judgment against her separate estate. In my opinion a married woman cannot be made a bankrupt upon a judgment in this form.

The appeal will therefore be allowed, and the receiving order rescinded, but there will be no costs.

RIGBY, L.J., concurred.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I also agree with all the reasons which have been given. I want to add, speaking for myself, that the proceeding by bankruptcy notice which by the present Bankruptcy Act is substituted for the former proceeding by way of debtor's summons is a bankruptcy proceeding, and although you may, on filing the petition, be allowed to use for convenience the collective name or the trade name as the name in which the proceeding shall be instituted, it is perfectly plain that in bankruptcy you must drop the use of that name, and take care that your proceedings are personally against the person whom you seek to make bankrupt. The result is ultimately that the adjudication is an adjudication against the individual.

Section* 27 provides that nothing in the Act shall affect the validity of any "right acquired" before the commencement of the Act.

Held, that a person who had been practising as a patent agent and describing himself as such prior to the passing of the Act is not protected by section 27 from the operation of section 1, nor from the liability to pay the fees imposed by the Register of Patent Agents Rules, 1889, made in pursuance of the Act.

Held, also, that the Register of Patent Agents Rules, 1889, are in force, because, assuming they were repealed by rule 81 of the Patent Rules, 1890, they were re-enacted by rule 1 of the Register of Patent Agents Rules, 1891.

Case stated by a metropolitan police magistrate under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

An information was preferred by the respondent against the appellant under the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1888, charging him with knowingly describing himself as a patent agent, he not being registered as such in pursuance of the Act.

It was proved that the appellant had since 1888 described himself as a patent agent and that he was not registered as such in the register of the Chartered Institute of Patent Agents.

It was further proved that for some years prior to 1888 the appellant had practised as a patent agent and had described himself as such. He held a certificate dated the 9th of October, 1894, issued by the Board of Trade, stating that he was entitled to be registered. He had also applied to be registered in pursuance of the Act, but as he did not pay the fee payable under rule 24 of the Register of Patent Agents Rules, 1889, his name was not entered on the register. The magistrate convicted the appellant.

The Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, s. 101, provides for the making of rules by the Board of Trade for, among other matters, regulating the practice of registration under that Act.

Sub-section 4 provides: "Any rules made in pursuance of this section shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament, if Parliament be in session at the time of making thereof, or, if not, then as soon as practicable after the beginning of the then next session in Parliament, and they shall be advertised twice in the official journal of the comptroller," and sub-section 5 provides that if within forty days either House of Parliament shall by resolution disapprove of such rules they shall be of no effect.

Section 1 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1888, sub-section 1, provides that after the 1st of July, 1889, no person shall be entitled to describe himself as a patent agent unless he is registered as a patent agent in pursuance of the Act. Sub-section 2 provides that the Board of Trade may, from time to time, make rules for the purpose of giving effect to the section, and that the provisions of section 101 of the Act of 1883 shall apply as to rules so made as if they were made in pursuance of that Act.

Sub-section 3 provides that "every person who proves to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade that prior to the passing of this Act he had been bonâ fide practising as a patent agent, shall be entitled to be registered as a patent agent in pursuance of this Act." Sub-section 4 imposes the penalty.

Section 27 provides as follows: "The principal Act shall, as from the commencement of this Act, take effect subject to the additions, omissions, and substitutions required by this Act, but nothing in this Act shall affect the validity of any act done, right acquired, or liability incurred before the commencement of this Act."

Rule 5 of the Register of Patent Agents Rules, 1889, made pursuant to the Act of 1888, provides that a person who is desirous of being registered as a patent agent on the ground that prior to the passing of the Act he had been bonâ fide practising as a patent agent shall produce to the Board of Trade a statutory declaration in the form therein provided, and that upon that being done, or upon further evidence if they shall require it, the Board of Trade shall issue a certificate that the person therein named is entitled to be registered, and the registrar shall on receipt of such certificate enter the name of such person in the register.

Rule 24 provides that a fee of five guineas shall be payable for the registration of the name of a patent agent who has been bonâ fide in practice prior to the passing of the Act.

Rule 81 of the Patent Rules, 1890, provides that "All general rules heretofore made by the Board of Trade under the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Acts, 1883 to 1888, shall be and they are hereby repealed. . . ."

The Register of Patent Agents Rules, 1891, provides (rule 1) as follows: "From and after the commencement of these rules all the duties and powers of the Institute of Patent Agents under the Register of Patent Agents Rules, 1889, . . . shall be transferred to and vested in the Chartered Institute of Patent Agents, and the rules of 1889 shall, where applicable, and save so far as they are altered by the present rules, have effect. . . ."

There was no proof that, after the enactment of the rules of 1891, the requirements of section 101 of the Act of 1883 had been complied with in respect to the rules of 1889.

Muir Mackenzie (Samuel Green with him), for the appellant.—Registration by a person who has been practising before the passing of the Act is optional. Moreover, the appellant is protected by section 27 of the Act of 1888.—That section means that no rights acquired before the Act was passed are to be affected or taken away by the Act. The appellant had before the Act was passed acquired a right to describe himself as a patent agent without being registered and without the payment of a fee. That was one of the rights saved by section 27: Hough v. Windus, 32 W. R. 452, 12 Q. B. D. 224. The Legislature did not intend to impose upon patent agents the penalty of five guineas for doing that which they had been in the habit of doing before the Act was passed. It was not intended to affect the position of such persons, except for the better. The rules of 1889 were repealed by the rules of 1890, and are therefore no longer in force, so that the fee provided for in those rules is now no longer payable. The rules of 1891, without specifically re-enacting those of 1889, treats them as if they were in force. Rules cannot be re-enacted by a mere reference to them in a later body of rules as if they were in force. If it was intended to re-enact them, a new body of rules should have been framed embodying the old ones, and these should have been laid upon the tables of both Houses of Parliament as prescribed by section 101 of the Act of 1883. [CHANNELL, J.—It cannot be necessary to prove that in every case.] On these grounds the conviction cannot be sustained.

H. Sutton and Corrie Grant, for the respondent, were not called on.

LAWRANCE, J.—There are two questions in this case. The first is whether the appellant is entitled to describe himself as a patent agent without being registered as such and without having paid the fee required by rule 24 of the rules of 1889.

It is said that he is so entitled because having practised as a patent agent before the Act of 1888 came into force he had acquired the right to so describe himself, such right being preserved to him by virtue of section 27 of the Act.

Before the passing of the Act anyone could describe himself as a patent agent without having gone through any examination and without having got himself registered as a patent agent. I think the right reserved by section 27 is a right which rendered it unnecessary for persons who had practised as patent agents before the Act to undergo an examination, and the section does not reserve to such persons the right to continue describing themselves as patent agents without being registered and without payment of the fee provided by the rules of 1889.

The second point is that the rules of 1889 are no longer in force. These rules appear to have been repealed, by inadvertence, by rules enacted in 1890. The question is whether they were re-enacted by the rules of 1891. In my opinion the effect of the rules of 1891 was to re-enact those of 1889 with one or two alterations.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. There is only one point of importance. The Act of 1888 for the first time imposes restrictions upon persons practising as patent agents. Section 1 provides that no one is to describe himself as a patent agent unless he is registered as a patent agent pursuant to the Act and certain privileges are given to persons who have before the passing of the Act been bonâ fide practising as patent agents. That is a very ordinary form of legislation. The Act has, further, a saving clause, also of a very ordinary kind. That clause preserves certain "rights." It is suggested that a construction should be placed upon the words "right acquired" which would nullify the provisions of the Act altogether in the case of persons who had been practising as patent agents prior to its commencement.

"Right acquired" means some special right acquired by an individual, not a right in the sense that every man has a right to do that which the law has not forbidden him to do. A person does not acquire a right by doing that which he is not expressly forbidden to do. A person does not, for example, by wearing them acquire a right to wear spectacles. That is not a "right acquired," therefore the term "right acquired" does not apply to persons who had practised as patent agents before the commencement of the Act.

It is said that the rules of 1889 have been repealed, and words were certainly used in the rules of 1890 which are wide enough to raise the point. But it is unnecessary to decide it. For, assuming that the rules of 1890 did repeal those of 1889—and if they did it was clearly by inadvertence—it seems to me that the thing is cured by another accident. It became necessary in 1891 to provide something further, and the rules of 1891 were made.

For my own part I doubt whether the provisions of section 101 of the Act of 1883 are more than directory, and all that is said against the rules is that they were not laid before Parliament in 1891. The rules of 1891 expressly say that the rules of 1889 shall have effect with certain modifications, so that though the rules of 1891 were framed on the assumption that the rules of 1889 existed, yet sufficient is said to re-enact them.

The only question is whether there is power to impose fees upon patent agents who practised as such before the commencement of the Act of 1888. If that point was ever in doubt, it was cleared up by the decision in Institute of Patent Agents v. Lockwood, [1894] A. C. 347.

HUNTER (Appellant) v. CLARE (Respondent). (a.)

Medical practitioner — Licentiate of the Society of Apothecaries — Title of physician — Wilfully and falsely taking and using the same—Conviction by justices—Medical Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 90), s. 40—Medical Act, 1886 (49 & 50 Vict. c. 41), s. 6.

A licentiate of the Society of Apothecaries of London registered since the coming into operation of the Medical Act, 1886, and therefore, by section 6 of that Act, entitled to practise medicine, surgery, and midwifery, is not entitled to describe himself as a physician.

Special case stated by justices sitting at the Caxton Petty Sessions for the county of Cambridge.

The question of law raised by this appeal was whether a licentiate of the Society of Apothecaries of London, registered since the coming into operation of the Medical Act, 1886, and therefore, by virtue of section 6 of that Act, entitled to practise medicine, surgery, and midwifery, could properly describe himself as a "physician."

The case set out the facts and contentions substantially as follows:

The appellant, Mr. H. K. Hunter, was a duly registered medical practitioner, entitled under the Medical Act, 1886, to practise medicine, surgery, and midwifery. In December, 1897, the appellant attended one William Hawkins, and on the 28th of December and the 23rd of March, 1898, made use of the name and title of physician by causing to be printed and delivered to William Hawkins and to one Elizabeth Shatton certain bill-heads bearing the following words: "To Kingsley Hunter, physician and surgeon, for professional attendance, &c."

An information and complaint was preferred by the respondent against the appellant under section 40 of 21 & 22 Vict. c. 90, for that he did, and continued wilfully and falsely to, pretend to be and to take and use the name and title of physician contrary to the provisions of the statute.

The justices convicted the appellant of the alleged offence, and adjudged him to pay a fine of £5 and £3 for costs.

The appellant thereupon applied for a case to be stated.

On the part of the appellant it was contended: That, being in possession of a diploma granted by the Society of Apothecaries of London, dated the 19th of October, 1893, in pursuance of which he was admitted a licentiate of that society and registered as such, and which diploma stated that the appellant possessed the knowledge and skill requisite for the efficient practice of medicine, surgery, and midwifery, and that he being so registered, and by virtue of section 6 of the Medical Act, 1886, he, the appellant, was (a) entitled to take and use the titles of "physician" and "surgeon" if he thought fit to do so; and (b) that notwithstanding the use of the name or title of physician there was nothing to show that the appellant wilfully and falsely used the same —on the contrary, that he did so in good faith; further, that he was authorized and justified in so doing in consequence of the note which was produced and admitted as purporting to be issued by the Society of Apothecaries of London as follows:

"The L.S.A. (1886) can call himself by any title or titles which he prefers to adopt denoting his right to practise medicine, surgery, and midwifery, provided that he does not directly or indirectly assume a title conferred by another licensing body or university."

In support of the foregoing contentions Ellis v. Kelly, 9 W. R. 56, 6 H. & N. 222, 30 L. J. M. C. 35, was cited.

On the part of the respondent it was contended: That the case was in all respects similar to that of Reg. v. Baker, 8 Times L. R. 123, 56 J. P. 406, 40 W. R. Dig. 146. In that instance one S., a licensed and registered apothecary, used on his door after his name the letters M.D., also the words Physician and Surgeon, though he was not registered as a physician or surgeon under the Medical Act, and the court held he was rightly convicted under 21 & 22 Vict. c. 90, s. 40, of falsely pretending to be a physician, surgeon, and doctor respectively.

The questions of law upon which the case was stated were: (a) Whether or not the appellant holding the title of "L.S.A." and being registered as such, was authorized to take and use the title of physician in the manner the appellant so used it; and (b) whether on the facts the magistrates were right in finding that the appellant so described himself wilfully and falsely within the meaning of 21 & 22 Vict. c. 90, s. 40.

After the case had been stated the appellant died, but the Society of Apothecaries determined to go on with the matter, and it was stated in court that the real respondents to these proceedings were the General Medical Council.

Haldane, Q.C. (Horace Condy with him), for the Society of Apothecaries, in support of the appeal to quash the conviction, said the society was incorporated by charter granted by James I., and mentioned as a curious fact that by an unrepealed statute medical men could not legally practise in Great Britain without the permission of the bishop of the diocese. By an Act passed in 1815 an apothecary's right to prescribe became recognized by statute. A druggist compounded according to the prescription and sold drugs, but an apothecary prescribed and dispensed his own prescription. By the Act of 1886 a L.S.A. became entitled to practise medicine, surgery, and midwifery, and he submitted that it followed that such a person, having by examination shown that he possessed the knowledge and skill requisite to practise in those three branches of the medical profession was entitled to call himself a "physician," the meaning of the word being a person qualified to practise physic—i.e., medicine, surgery, and midwifery. Before the Act of 1886 a man might have been prosecuted for calling himself a surgeon if he was only qualified as a physician, since before that date the titles were distinguishable and distinct. These titles, however, had ceased to be the particular properties of particular licensing bodies, and the medical Acts gave to no one licensing body the monopoly of the word "physician" to its members. [CHANNELL, J.—If the word "physician" in the section we are considering is used in a popular sense as equivalent merely to "doctor," then the conviction is wrong; but if in its technical sense as implying that the person using it holds a special qualification from a particular licensing body that entitles him to use the title of physician, then the conviction would stand.] No doubt otherwise that would be a test of whether the conviction should be quashed or stand if the title of physician was a registerable title. As a matter of fact no licensing body had power to grant the degree of "physician," and therefore the Society of Apothecaries resented the action of the General Medical Council, who desired to arrogate to themselves the exclusive use by members of the college of a word which was simply descriptive.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Muir Mackenzie, in support of the conviction, said that at one time apothecaries were a subordinate body to physicians, and quoted section 3 of 32 Hen. 8, c. 40, which contained a direct recognition that in 1540 the science of physic included the knowledge of surgery and embraced the general art of healing whether by drugs or surgery. At the close of the last century persons practising as physicians without the licence of the College of Physicians were prosecuted. There was a distinction between the practise of physic and the practise of medicine and contended that the former embraced the practise of surgery. The Act of 1886 contained no provisions which conferred on an L.S.A. the right to style himself physician.

During the argument the following cases were discussed: The Attorney-General v. Royal College of Physicians, 9 W. R. 590, 1 John. & Hem. 561; Reg. v. Baker, 66 L. T. Rep. 416, 40 W. R. Dig. 146 (also cited as Reg. v. JJ. of Aston, Birmingham, 8 Times L. R. 123); Davis v. Makuna, 33 W. R. 668, 29 Ch. D. 596; College of Physicians v. Harrison, Wilcock's Laws of the Medical Profession, p. 128; Ellis v. Kelly; Andrews v. Styrap, 26 L. T. Rep. 704, 20 W. R. Dig. 48; Blogg v. Pinkers, Ry. & Moo. 125; Royal College of Physicians v. General Medical Council, 68 L. T. Rep. 496, 41 W. R. Dig. 136; College of Physicians v. Rose, 3 Salk. 17, 6 Mod. 44.

THE COURT allowed the appeal.

LAWRANCE, J.—The question that we are called upon to decide in this case seems to me to be this: Whether a person who has a certificate from the Society of Apothecaries (by which certificate, I understand, at the present time he is entitled to practise both medicine and surgery, as well as act as an apothecary) is entitled to describe himself as a physician—in other words, whether in describing himself as a physician the appellant was contravening section 40 of the Act of 1858. In my judgment, if such a person was doing that falsely and wilfully, the justices would be quite right in convicting him. That is the short answer to the question.

As far as I understand the matter, up to 1886 the only certificate granted by the Society of Apothecaries was a certificate to practise as an apothecary, and after that the three bodies into which the medical profession was divided—namely, physicians, surgeons, and apothecaries, decided that nobody could have any certificate from any one of them who had not passed in surgery and medicine, and such an examination, if there is a separate examination, which may be required by the Society of Apothecaries.

Those were the state of matters in which the then defendant, the appellant in this case, considered he was entitled to describe himself first, I see, as "M.D." That was pointed out to him by some authority. I need not refer to it at greater length as being wrong. Then he modified that until he came at last to call himself a physician. The question is, in what way was the word "physician" used? Was it a mere general expression signifying the man was a medical man, a doctor, or was there a more definite meaning to be attached to it—namely, that he was a physician, which would import to most people that he was a doctor of medicine, and held a diploma entitling him to act as such? That, I think, was the real meaning of the word "physician" as used by him. And I have no doubt whatever that would be the meaning conveyed to the mind of anybody who saw on a brass plate "So-and-so, physician"; it would convey an idea to my mind, at all events, and I should think it would to the ordinary mind, that he was a doctor of medicine and a physician—something, in fact, which he really was not. Therefore I think he was contravening section 40 of the statute of 1858, and that his conviction was right upon that point.

Now, when we come to the other point—namely, whether he was doing it wilfully and falsely, I come to the conclusion after looking at the case of Ellis v. Kelly, in which Bramwell, B., gave judgment, and held that the defendant was not acting falsely and wilfully, and the case of Andrews v. Styrap, in which Martin, B., says: "There was ample evidence that this appellant wilfully (for he did it on purpose) and falsely (because he pretended thereby to be on an equal footing with any regular bred and registered physician or M.D. in England) took, assumed, and used the title of 'M.D.'" Of course that was a very much stronger case than the one we are now considering. Here from the evidence I think the appellant was determined to try his right. That is the position in which he placed himself. He said: "I have a certificate entitling me to practise both medicine and surgery, as well as whatever the certificate of the Apothecaries' Society may go to, and I have a right to say I am a doctor in the ordinary sense of the word—that is to say, I am a physician and I can practise medicine." I have already given my reasons for thinking he was wrong in that; but I think he was not doing it wilfully and falsely, but doing it in the assertion of a right for which I think there was no legal ratification at all.

I apprehend the object of those who have started these proceedings will be met by the judgment given upon the other part of the case. I think he was wrong there, and I think the magistrates were right in their law with regard to the first part of the case, but I think there is no evidence (which there must be before the conviction could be affirmed) that the appellant was doing what he did wilfully and falsely. The result is that in my judgment the conviction must be quashed, but the appellant not having succeeded upon the real point which came here for decision, the fair and proper thing to do would be that the conviction should be quashed, without costs.

CHANNELL, J.—I am, on the whole, of the same opinion. To begin with, I think—although I think it is a matter of some doubt—that this appellant falsely described himself as a physician. Counsel, during the argument, stated that they were, in fact, appearing for two societies, and that these societies desired to have the opinion of the court whether it be a true description now for a licentiate of the Society of Apothecaries to describe himself as a physician. It seems to me that depends entirely upon what is the sense in which the word "physician" is used in section 40 of the Act of 1858. If "physician" there means simply a person who is duly qualified in law to practise in physics, then it seems to me that this gentleman was a physician within that meaning of the word, because although it would not have been so at one time, he nevertheless, by being a licentiate of the Society of Apothecaries, became entitled to practise medicine and surgery. Now, if the word "physician" in section 40 is used in a popular sense, anyone would be bound to say that he was entitled to practise in physics, in a popular sense at anyrate; but even if there is any other sense—I am not quite sure I fully followed Mr. Muir Mackenzie's argument upon that point—but even if there is in any sense a distinction between "physic" and "medicine," I do not think there is any such distinction in the popular sense. It follows, therefore, that if "physician" in section 40 was merely a general word describing a person who is legally entitled to act as doctor—using again the word in its popular and not in its technical sense of doctor of medicine—if it means this, I think the gentleman, by reason of his qualification, would be entitled to call himself a physician. Having, however, regard to the fact that prior to the passing of the Act physician was commonly used to designate the highest grade of medical practitioners, I think it was so used in the Act, and I think if you look through the Act generally you will find confirmation of that view. In that special sense I think the word physician is used in the section, and I do not think it is correct to say that the licentiate of the Society of Apothecaries is, in fact, a physician. He certainly was not so before the licensing Act of 1886, because physician in that sense, as Mr. Muir Mackenzie has shown, included practice, not only in medicine, but in surgery, and before 1886 the licentiateship of the Society of Apothecaries did not give that. Consequently, before 1886 it would not have been a correct expression, and as that is the case I think we have really no binding authority upon this question. The case of Reg. v. Baker appeared at first sight to be in point, but in that case there were three summonses alleging different offences, and I do not think so now for two reasons. The reasons are first of all that was a motion for a certiorari, and any jurisdiction to consider the matter at all on the part of the magistrates would have prevented the certiorari being granted; and secondly, because that gentleman's qualification, being before 1886, did not authorize him to practise in surgery, and therefore it did not authorize him to be a physician in the sense in which Mr. Muir Mackenzie has pointed out the word is used in the section—namely, that it included practise in surgery. The result is we have got no authority binding upon us upon this point, and, having considered it, I come on the whole to the conclusion, though not altogether without doubt, that "physician" in section 40 is used in a technical sense, in which technical sense it was not true this gentleman was a physician.

The next question is, although he falsely described himself, did he wilfully and falsely so describe himself? Now, on this point, as I read it, the case of Ellis v. Kelly seems to be a distinct authority. We have the case quoted to us, and it is said that Bramwell, B., afterwards recanted to a certain extent what he has said in that case of Ellis v Kelly. It does not quite appear how much of his opinion in Ellis v. Kelly he thought was wrong, and, whatever he thought was wrong, there remains the decision; and, so far as I understand the decision, it was this: that in that case the man was not really an M.D. in the sense in which the court understood section 40 to mean, but that he had reasonable grounds for thinking that he was, and, having reasonable grounds for thinking that he was, the court said he could not be said to have wilfully and falsely described himself as such. If that is the meaning of that case, it governs the present one. The difference between Ellis v. Kelly and Andrews v. Styrap appears to be this: that in Ellis v. Kelly the qualification that the gentleman had was a foreign qualification; but it was, as I may say, a genuine one, a real qualification. In Andrews v. Styrap it was what one might call a bogus qualification—that is to say, he had not been examined in any way, but had written out and got that qualification by correspondence merely for the purpose of representing himself here as an M.D. That is what Martin, B., meant when he said "he did it on purpose." There being that difference, I do not think that Ellis v. Kelly is overruled, and it is a binding decision and goes to the effect of saying, as we say in this case: Although we think this gentleman incorrectly described himself as a physician, yet he did not wilfully and falsely describe himself as a physician by reason of the interpretation of the words in Ellis v. Kelly.

On those grounds I agree that the conviction should be quashed, but without costs. I see there are two questions put to us—The first question (a) is "Whether or not the appellant is authorized to take and use the name and title of physician?" As to that we say that he was not, but as to the next question (b), "Whether on the facts herein stated the magistrates were right in finding that the appellant so described himself wilfully and falsely?" On that point we say they were wrong, and we quash the conviction on the ground that he had here some colour or title to use the description which he used, especially having regard to the directions issued by the Society of Apothecaries — that he had such a reason to think he might so describe himself that we cannot say he did it wilfully or falsely.

Conviction quashed.

LANCASHIRE INSURANCE CO. (Appellants) v. THE COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE (Respondents).
VULCAN BOILER AND GENERAL INSURANCE CO. (Appellants) v. THE COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE (Respondents). (a.)

Inland revenue — Stamp duty — Policy of insurance against accident—Employer's liability policy—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 98.

A policy of insurance by which an insurance company agrees to pay for and on behalf of the assured such sums as the assured shall become liable to pay in respect of personal injury caused in his business to workmen in his employment is not a "policy of insurance against accident" within the meaning of section 48 of, and the schedule to, the Stamp Act, 1891, but requires to be stamped, if under seal, as a deed, and if under hand only, as an agreement.

Cases stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under section 13 of the Stamp Act, 1891.

Instruments were presented under section 12 of that Act by the appellants to the commissioners for their opinion as to the stamp duty with which such instruments respectively were chargeable. The following is a copy of the instrument so presented by the Lancashire Insurance Co.:

"Employer's Liability Policy.

"First premium to the 9th of August, 1899, 9s. 6d. Employer's Insurance Policy against the full liability under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, and the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and also against the liability at common law.	"Estimated amount of wages, &c., on which the undermentioned sum paid in respect of premium has been calculated, £127 8s. Sum paid in respect of premium, 9s. 6d.

"Whereas Messrs. Uren Rogers & Co., of Smithfield-street, Birmingham, carrying on the business of iron and metal merchants and no other for the purpose of the risk under this policy (and who and whose personal representatives or successors in the business are hereinafter called 'the employer'), has paid to the Lancashire Insurance Co. (hereinafter called 'the company') the sum mentioned above in respect of premium, and has delivered to the company a proposal in writing (which is hereby declared to be the basis of and to form part of this contract) for an indemnity against claims for compensation for personal injury sustained by workmen as hereinafter mentioned.

"Now these presents witness and it is hereby agreed as follows: The company shall pay for and on behalf of the employer such sums as the employer shall become liable to pay under or by virtue of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, or the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, or under or by virtue of the common law in respect of personal injury caused in the above-mentioned business during the continuance of this policy to any workmen in the employ of the employer, or of any sub-contractor for injury to whose workmen he may be answerable."

The instrument was under seal.

In the case of the Vulcan, &c., Co. the policy was under the hands of two directors; the operative words so far as material were as follows: "The company indemnifies the employer fully and completely against all liability under or by virtue of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, or the common law in respect of any injury which during the continuance of this policy shall happen to any workman whilst in his employ and engaged in the above-mentioned business."

The commissioners being of opinion in each case that the instrument was not "a policy of insurance for any payment agreed to be made upon the death of any person only from accident or violence, or otherwise than from a natural cause, or as compensation for personal injury," held that the instrument was not "a policy of insurance against accident" as defined in section 98 (1) of the Stamp Act, 1891, and was not chargeable by reference to the head of charge "Policy of insurance against accident and policy of insurance for any payment agreed to be made during the sickness of any person or his incapacity from personal injury" in the first schedule to the said Act. They consequently held that it was liable, in the case of the Lancashire Insurance Co., to the duty of 10s. as a deed, and in the case of the Vulcan, &c., Co., to the duty of sixpence as an agreement.

The appellants, being dissatisfied with the assessments of the commissioners, appealed, and cases were accordingly stated by the commissioners pursuant to section 13 of the Stamp Act, 1891.

Cohen, Q.C. (F. L. Wright with him), for th appellants the Lancashire Insurance Co., and Jelf Q.C. (J. E. Bankes with him), for the appellants the Vulcan Boiler, &c., Co.—These policies are policies of insurance against accident and are chargeable with a duty of one penny only. The definition of "policy of insurance against accident" in section 98 of the Stamp Act, 1891, is not confined to policies by which an accident to the assured himself only is insured against; under these policies the moneys can only become payable by the insurance companies upon the occurrence of a death otherwise than from a natural cause or personal injury, and this is sufficient to bring them within the definition if construed reasonably; and a statute must not be construed so as to impose a charge unless it does so in clear and unambiguous language: Partington v. Attorney-General, L. R. 4 H. L. 100, 17 W. R. H. L. Dig. 1; Colquhoun v. Brooks, 36 W. R. 657, 21 Q. B. D. 52, per Fry, L.J., at p. 62; Oriental Bank Corporation v. Wright, 5 App. Cas. 842, 29 W. R. Dig. 35.

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G. (Danckwerts with him), for the Crown.—The event upon which the companies have agreed to pay money is the arising of a legal liability of the employer to compensate his workmen. Such a liability does not arise in the case of every accident; the policy does not, therefore, contain an agreement to make a payment upon the happening of a death or personal injury; it is an agreement to indemnify against a legal liability, and is not a policy of insurance against accident.

They cited Dalby v. India and London Life Assurance Co., 3 W. R. 116, 15 C. B. 365; Theobald v. Railway Passengers' Assurance Co., 2 W. R. 528, 10 Ex. 45; Bradburn v. Great Western Railway Co., 23 W. R. 48, L. R. 10 Ex. 1; and Darrell v. Tibbits, 29 W. R. 66, 5 Q. B. D. 560.

BRUCE, J.—In these two cases the instruments are chargeable respectively with stamp duty in the one case as a deed, in the other case as an agreement, unless the instruments fall within the description of "policy of insurance against accident" given in section 98 of the Stamp Act, 1891. "Policy of insurance against accident" means, according to the section, a policy for any payment to be made upon the death of any person otherwise than from a natural cause, or as compensation for personal injury. In substance I think there is no distinction to be drawn between the two policies in point of form. But I will take the policy in the case of the Lancashire Insurance Co., the form of which is certainly quite as favourable to the appellants as the other policy. The proposal which is declared in the recital at the commencement of the policy to form the basis of the contract is described as a proposal for an indemnity against claims for compensation for personal injury sustained by workmen. [His lordship quoted the operative words of the policy, and continued:] It is quite clear upon the wording of the policy that the payment agreed to be made depends upon the liability of the assured to answer for the death of his workmen, or for the personal injury sustained by his workmen. The death of a workman in the employ of the assured might be caused by other than natural causes, or such workman might sustain personal injury, and yet no payment would become due under the policy unless the death were caused or the personal injury were caused in such circumstances as to render the assured liable to pay compensation. The payment, therefore, is not, I think, a payment agreed to be made upon the death of a person otherwise than from a natural cause, or as compensation for personal injury, but is a payment agreed to be made as an indemnity against claims for compensation for which the assured is answerable. Two things must happen. There must first be the death or personal injury of a workman; and secondly, there must be a liability on the part of the assured to make compensation for the death or personal injury.

It was argued by Mr. Cohen in the one case and by Mr. Jelf in the other that although the two conditions must exist before the policy could become operative, yet the payment stipulated for by the policy was not the less a payment to be made upon death or as compensation for personal injury merely because some other condition than death or personal injury must exist before the policy could be enforced. They instanced the case of life policies and accident policies which commonly contain various stipulations requiring certain notices to be given within a stipulated time of the happening of the death or accident, the strict observance of which is made a condition precedent to the right of action on the policy, and they contended that such policies did not cease to be life policies or accident policies by reason of the right of action on the policies depending upon some event other than the death or accident. But the answer to that argument is, I think, this—that the conditions in such cases are incidental to the subject-matter of the insurance. The governing event in those cases is the death or accident, and the ordinary stipulations to which reference was made by the learned counsel are stipulations made with a view to fence and protect the rights of the assurer so as to enable him to require satisfactory evidence of or to make inquiry concerning the facts upon which his liability depends. They do not alter the character of the risk upon which the assurance depends. Such conditions grow out of and are subsidiary to the subject-matter of the insurance. But it seems to me in the present case that the liability of the assured to compensate his workmen lies at the very root of the contract. It is the cardinal event upon which the liability of the assurer to pay the money under the policy depends. It is in truth and substance a contract of indemnity, and although the indemnity is against liability arising from death or personal injury, and the death or personal injury is a sine quâ non, and is one of the conditions of the liability of the assured, yet it is not the condition upon which the liability of the assurer depends. It is not the condition upon which, by the terms of the instrument, the payment agreed to be made depends.

WILLS, J.—I agree. I will only add that even if the first portion of the definition were satisfied, and that the policy could be said to be a policy by which the insurers agreed to make a payment upon the death of a person from accident or violence or otherwise than from a natural cause, the latter portion would still remain. An agreement to pay any sum which the employer should become liable to pay to his workman as compensation for personal injury cannot by any stretch of language be held to be an agreement to pay as compensation for personal injury. That portion of the definition cannot be applied to the policy in the present case.

"THE SNARK." (a.)

Ship—Damage—Collision caused by running foul of sunken barge—Negligence of owner of barge in not providing for proper lighting of wreck, where wreck not abandoned—Liability of owner of wreck if independent contractor employed to raise wreck for him.

The owner of a vessel sunk in the fairway of a navigable river who has not abandoned the wreck, but has agreed with an independent contractor to raise her for him, is answerable in damages for the loss sustained by the owners of another vessel running foul of the wreck without negligence, in consequence of the wreck being improperly lighted.

(a.) Reported by C. F. JEMMETT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an action of damage instituted on behalf of the owner of the steamship Vesta against the owners of the dumb-barge Snark to recover for the damage sustained by the former vessel in a collision with The Snark on the 3rd of August, 1897, in the fairway of the River Thames, when The Vesta came in contact with the submerged wreck of The Snark and thereby received the damages proceeded for in the circumstances stated in the judgment.

The fourth paragraph of the statement of claim was in terms as follows: The barge Snark was lying wholly submerged in a position obstructing the navigable channel, and the collision was caused by the neglect and default of the defendants or of their servants or agents, for which the defendants are liable in not taking proper and sufficient steps to indicate the position of the wreck or to warn passing vessels thereof, in placing and keeping the barge marking the wreck in an improper and misleading position, and failing to keep a proper watch on board such barge and leaving such barge untended without anybody on board her, and in neglecting to give proper or other warning from the said barge or otherwise to those on board The Vesta that The Vesta was approaching the wreck.

The defendants in their defence denied (inter alia) that the collision was caused by the negligence of the defendants or their servants or anyone for whose acts they were responsible, and after alleging that The Vesta improperly failed to keep clear of The Snark, pleaded in the alternative that The Snark sunk at about 2.15 a.m., 1st of August, 1897; that the defendants thereupon informed the Thames Conservancy and entered into a contract with William Forrest, an under-waterman and diving contractor, who verbally contracted to raise and remove the said sunken barge (The Snark) for a fixed sum; and that if there was any negligence in or about the lighting, marking, or watching of the said barge, such negligence was that of the said Forrest or his servants, and not that of the defendants or their servants.

Dec. 5 and 6.—On these days the action was heard before Barnes, J., assisted by two of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, and the court came to the conclusion that the collision had happened through the wreck of The Snark being insufficiently guarded, and that in consequence of this negligence The Vesta, whilst passing at a safe and proper distance from lights which had been placed by Forrest and persons employed by him to mark the position of the wreck, ran directly on to the wreck.

Dec. 13.—The question whether on the facts found by the court the defendants were to blame for the collision came on to be argued.

Carver, Q.C., and Stubbs, for the plaintiffs.—The owners of The Snark are liable for the damages arising out of the collision between the wreck of The Snark and The Vesta. The collision was solely caused by the wreck not having been properly guarded and lighted, and at the time of the collision the defendants had neither abandoned the wreck or transferred it to third parties. They wished for it to be raised so that they might use it again as a barge, and it is idle to suppose that by employing an independent contractor to raise the wreck for them they were able to shift their responsibility of guarding and lighting it away from themselves. There having been negligence in guarding and lighting the wreck, the defendants are equally liable whether or not they agreed that the guarding and lighting was to be attended to by the persons who were raising the barge: The Utopia, [1893] A. C. 482; Hardaker v. Idle District Council, 44 W. R. 323, [1896] 1 Q. B. 335; Tarry v. Ashton, 24 W. R. 581, 1 Q. B. D. 314; Pickard v. Smith, 10 C. B. N. S. 470, 9 W. R. C. L. Dig. 59; Penny v. Wimbledon Urban Council, [1898] 2 Q. B. 212, 46 W. R. Dig. 138; Dalton v. Angus, 6 App. Cas. 740, 29 W. R. Dig. 75.

Pyke, Q.C., and Batten, for the defendants, the owners of The Snark.—This is not a suit in rem, and the negligence which caused the accident was not the negligence of the defendants, but the negligence of an independent contractor to whom the defendants had transferred the control and possession of the wreck: R. v. Watts, 2 Esp. 675; White v. Crisp, 2 W. R. 624, 10 Exch. 312; Brown v. Mallett, 5 C. B. 599; Gray v. Pullen, 13 W. R. 257, 5 B. & S. 970; Ellis v. The Sheffield Gas Consumers' Co., 2 W. R. 19, 2 E. & B. 767. That contractor is therefore liable in personam—Blake v. Woolf, ante p. 8, [1898] 2 Q. B. 426—just as much as he would have been liable if he had agreed to manage and control The Snark when navigating the Thames and the collision had occurred before she had sunk: Milligan v. Wedge, 12 A. & E. 737; The Castlegate, 41 W. R. 349, [1893] A. C. 38; The Tasmania, 13 P. D. 110, 36 W. R. Dig. 184; Hill v. The Tottenham Local Board, 15 T. L. R. 53.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 26.—BARNES, J.—This is a case in which the plaintiffs seek to recover from the defendants for damages sustained by the plaintiffs owing to their steamship The Vesta running upon the defendants' barge The Snark, which was sunk in the fairway off Cuckolds Point in the River Thames. The Snark had been sunk by a collision with another steamer on the 1st of August, 1897, and a man named Forrest had been employed by the defendants to raise her. Before he had succeeded in doing so the plaintiffs' steamship, in coming up the Thames on the early morning of the 3rd of August, whilst on a voyage from Hamburg to St. Katharine's Docks, London, ran upon the sunken barge and was seriously damaged.

The case was heard before me during last sittings, when the plaintiffs alleged that the accident happened owing to the negligence of those in charge of the salvage operations in not properly placing lights so as to warn persons navigating the river of the danger occasioned by the sunken barge, while on the other hand the defendants alleged that it arose from the improper navigation of the plaintiffs' steamship. I found that there was no default in the navigation of the steamer, but that although a barge called The Rhoda had been placed by Forrest and his men with lights upon it with the object of warning persons in charge of other vessels of the spot where the wreck lay, it had in fact been negligently and improperly placed in, or allowed before and at the time of the accident to swing into, a position at some distance across the stream from the wreck, so that it did not properly guard the wreck and in consequence thereof the plaintiffs' vessel while passing at a safe and proper distance from the warning lights ran directly on to the sunken barge.

The question then arose whether or not the defendants are personally liable for the negligence of the person in charge of the salvage operations.

The facts necessary to be stated in order to deal with this question are these. The Snark was sunk without negligence on the part of the defendants or their servants. Upon hearing of the sinking the defendants' foreman saw Forrest, who is an underwaterman, and had been frequently employed to raise sunken barges, and was a proper person to employ for such purpose. An arrangement was made between the foreman and Forrest that the latter should raise the barge for £20 if it proved an easy job, and £25 if it proved troublesome, and that the defendants should provide a barge for Forrest to work with. Nothing was said about lighting the wreck.

The defendants accordingly supplied Forrest with the barge Rhoda, and he and his men went down to the place where The Snark was sunk, and then fastened The Rhoda. Forrest and his men said that they had an anchor fast in the wound made by the steamer which sank The Snark, and two anchors out. There is no doubt that they found The Snark, and were in charge of her, but there was great confusion in the evidence as to the way in which The Rhoda was fastened, and for reasons which it is unnecessary to repeat to-day I found them guilty of the negligence aforesaid. The officials of the Thames Conservancy were told by Forrest of the sunken barge, and for a short time before Forrest brought The Rhoda to the spot a boat of the Thames Conservancy with a flag in it was made fast to The Snark. For this service the defendants paid the Thames Conservancy. When Forrest brought The Rhoda and took charge the conservancy boat was taken away, and Forrest and his men alone remained. Forrest was ashore at the time of the accident, and only one man was then aboard The Rhoda, though two others were in a small boat in which they had been ashore, and they said that on the way back they were looking after some buoys attached to the anchors. After the accident Forrest raised The Snark, and was paid £25 by the defendants.

The argument on this question of the defendants' liability took place before me a few days after the trial on the merits, when the case was ably argued by counsel, and shortly put the plaintiffs' point was that this is a case where the maxim Respondeat superior applies, whereas the defendants' point was that they were not liable for the default of an independent contractor. A number of authorities were cited, including Brown v. Mallett, White v. Crisp, The Douglas, 7 P. D. 151; The Utopia.

The exact case does not appear to have been decided, though the principles to be applied in these cases of negligence committed by persons employed by, but not servants of, the employer have been much discussed in the cases aforesaid, and in a very large number of cases cited by Mr. Beven in his work on Negligence, one of the latest being Hardaker v. Idle District Council, where the Master of the Rolls and A. L. Smith and Rigby, L.JJ., gave elaborate judgments on the subject.

After considering the matter upon principle, and with the assistance of the decided cases, I am of opinion that the defendants are personally liable in this action.

The result of the first three cases above mentioned was stated in the judgment of the Privy Council, delivered by Sir Francis Jeune in The Utopia as follows: "The owner of a ship sunk, whether by his default or not (wilful misconduct probably giving rise to different considerations), has not, if he abandon the possession and control of her, any responsibility either to remove her or to protect other vessels from coming into collision with her. It is equally true that so long as and so far as possession, management, and control of the wreck be not abandoned or properly transferred there remains on the owners an obligation in regard to the protection of other vessels from receiving injury from her. But in order to fix the owners of a wreck with liability two things must be shown: first, that in regard to the particular matters in which default is alleged, the control of the vessel is in them—that is, has not been abandoned or legitimately transferred; and secondly, that they have, in discharge of their legal duty, been guilty of wilful misconduct or neglect." This statement of the law was relied on by both sides on the argument before me, but each took a different view as to meaning of the terms "abandonment" or "proper transfer" of the possession, management, and "control of the vessel."

This has to be considered. If a vessel has been sunk in a public navigable river, and becomes a dangerous obstruction to navigation, the wreck is a public nuisance. The owner in whose possession she was at the time of the sinking, and whether the sinking has occurred by his default or not (wilful misconduct, as stated in the above passage, probably giving rise to different considerations), may, however, abandon the wreck. He is not bound to remove it. As is pointed out in Rex. v. Watts and Brown v. Mallett, 5 C. B., at p. 619, to compel him to do so might involve him in an outlay wholly disproportionate to the benefit of the salved property to him. If he abandon, his liability ceases subject to a question which I need not enter upon as to whether or not he has a duty to give some public notice of the wreck.

If he does not abandon the vessel he either retains possession and control (by which I understand that he has and retains power by due care and exertion to remove the wreck altogether or to shift its position so as to prevent it from being a source of danger), or he is temporarily forced entirely away from the wreck. So long as he retains possession and exercises the dominion and control of an owner of the wreck he is under an obligation to use reasonable care to warn other vessels of her position and to remove the obstruction with reasonable diligence. If the owner be temporarily forced away from the vessel, but does not abandon and intends and has the power to salve the property, it would seem that his duty is the same though the circumstances will affect the manner of its discharge. The Douglas appears to have been a case of this kind, and to have been decided on the ground that in the circumstances the crew were unable to more than give notice to the harbour authorities, who had the powers conferred by the Removal of Wrecks Act, 1877, and obtain their undertaking to light the wreck in that case. See especially the judgment of Lord Coleridge, 7 P. D., at p. 158.

If actual possession and control be resumed the owners' obligation is of course the same as when he retains possession and control.

If the owner transfer the wreck to some other person who takes from him possession and control thereof, such person takes over the duties and liabilities: White v. Crisp. The owners' position is succinctly stated in Addison on Torts (6th ed.), at p. 618, and in Angel on Nuisances, p. 83. If, however, the owner having the possession and control in the sense above stated merely employ another person to raise and remove the wreck for him, there is no transfer of the wreck, and although the person employed may be placed in actual physical custody of the wreck the owner does not, in my opinion, discharge himself from the duty towards the public which rested upon him of using reasonable care to warn other vessels of the position of the wreck, which remains his property. Even if the other person be expressly employed on the terms that he shall light the wreck properly during the salvagé operations he is employed by the owner to discharge for the owner a duty which rested upon the latter. The owner does not get rid of his liability by employing someone to perform it for him. The case is not precisely the same but presents an analogy to the cases of which Hardaker v. The Idle District Council is one. The owner has a duty to perform—viz., to use reasonable care to warn other vessels of the position of the wreck, and cannot, in my judgment, escape from the responsibility attaching to him of seeing that duty performed by delegating it to a contractor.

The case of The Utopia, rightly understood, appears to me to support these views, and not to detract from them. There a vessel was wrecked in Gibraltar Bay, and the port authorities took from the owners and assumed the task of protecting other vessels from the wreck, and neglected that duty. It was held that the owners of a vessel colliding with the wreck could not proceed against the wreck for their damages. The ground of the decision, as I pointed out in The Ripon City, [1897] P. 226, at p. 239, 45 W. R. Dig. 153, was that the authorities had taken action within the apparent scope of their powers as port authority, and that the owners could not therefore be made liable, nor the wreck proceeded against for their default. It was in fact a case of vis major, and not a case where another person was voluntarily employed by the owners to perform their duty for them. The greater part of the reasoning of the judgment would have been unnecessary if the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council had thought that the owners could get rid of their liability by delegating their duty to an independent person. The argument forcibly addressed to me by Mr. Batten, that there is no difference between the case of an owner of a wreck sunk in and obstructing a navigable river and that of an owner who employs a contractor to navigate her in ordinary circumstances from one place to another as regards his duty to the public appears to me to be fallacious.

In the one case the wreck is a dangerous nuisance, and the owners' rights and liabilities are such as I have already stated. In the other case there is only an employment by the owner of a contractor to do work about which there is no danger if properly performed, and not an employment to discharge a duty which rests upon the owner: see the judgment in Hardaker v. The Idle District Council.

In the present case the defendants' men were temporarily driven off The Snark by her sinking, but the defendants afterwards employed Forrest to raise the wreck, and placed him in possession and control for that purpose.

Forrest neglected to discharge the defendants' duty to use reasonable care to warn other vessels, one of which was the plaintiffs', of the position of the wreck, and for this negligence the defendants are, in my opinion, liable.

Moreover, it is to be noticed that the defendants did not instruct Forrest to light the wreck. Nothing whatever was expressly arranged about this at any time. It was merely left to him to do what he considered necessary to raise and remove the wreck.

In conclusion, I desire to note that, as this is an action in personam, I have not entered upon any questions as to the right of the plaintiff against the res.

My judgment is for the plaintiff against the defendants for an amount of damages to be assessed by the registrar and merchants, and costs.

In re MOORE BROTHERS & CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Prospectus—Directors—Shares—Statement in prospectus that directors would take shares—Liability to take shares—List of contributories.

A prospectus of a company, approved by the directors at their first meeting, stated that the whole of the ordinary shares not taken by the vendors to the company would be taken by the directors. The register of shareholders did not contain the names of any of the directors, nor were any shares allotted to them. In the winding up of the company the liquidator applied for a balance-order against B., one of the directors, in respect of 367 unallotted ordinary shares.

Held, by the Court of Appeal (reversing Wright, J.), that there was no evidence of an agreement by B. to take any definite number of shares, and that therefore he was not liable to be put on the list of contributories.

Appeal from Wright, J.

The articles of association of the above-named company included the following articles:

"77. Until otherwise determined by a general meeting the number of the directors shall not be less than three nor more than six. The following gentlemen shall be the first directors of the company—viz., Alfred Watson, James Moore, William Moore, Henry Blatch Wells, Milton Bartholomew, Robert Colman.

"78. The qualification of every director shall be the holding of shares or stock of the company of the nominal value of £500."

At the first meeting of the directors, held on the 28th of October, 1893, and attended by all the directors, the following minute was passed: "The draft prospectus was approved and settled, and the secretary was instructed to place same in the printer's hands." The prospectus as printed gave the names and addresses of the six directors, and contained the following statements: The capital of the company was "1,500 ordinary shares of £20 each (the whole of which will be taken by the directors), 750 £6 per cent. preference shares of £20 each, and 300 £5 per cent. debentures of £50 each."

"The vendors, after discharging every liability up to the date of purchase, will reinvest the whole of the purchase-money in the company, principally in the ordinary stock, on which they will receive no dividend until the £5 per cent. interest on the debentures and the £6 per cent. dividend on the preference shares have been paid. Seeing that—with the other directors—they take the whole of the ordinary shares, investors have the best possible assurance that every effort will be made to ensure the prosperity of the company's business."

Applications from the public were invited for the preference shares and the debentures. Three of the directors, Messrs. Watson, Wells, and Colman, having been placed on the list of contributories in respect of ordinary shares by Romer, J., a question was afterwards raised in the liquidation of the company, on an application for a balance-order against Mr. Bartholomew, another director, whether he was liable, on the faith of the statements in the prospectus, to be placed on the list of ordinary shareholders. It appeared that none of the four directors named had ever had any shares allotted to them, nor had their names been placed on the register of members. The liquidator of the company applied to make Mr. Bartholomew liable for 367 ordinary shares, being the balance remaining after the vendors and others had taken up their shares.

Wright, J., held that the statement in the prospectus was evidence of an agreement by the directors to take all the ordinary shares not taken by the vendors, and that the four directors were jointly and severally liable for the 367 shares.

There had been no appeal from the decision of Romer, J., placing Messrs. Watson, Wells, and Colman on the list of contributories.

Mr. Bartholomew appealed.

Haldane, Q.C., and Gore Browne, for the appellant.—There is no express contract here by the directors to take shares. Even if there were an express contract, the company made it impossible for the directors to fulfil their contract by the allotment of shares to other applicants, and the company never regarded the directors as bound by their contract. [They were stopped by the court.]

Grosvenor Woods, Q.C., and Sheldon, for the liquidator.—The only case with a representation in the prospectus at all similar to this is In re Wood's Ships Woodite Protection Co., 2 Meg. 164, 38 W. R. Dig. 36. The meaning is that the directors will take all the ordinary shares other than those which by arrangement with the company the vendors will take. The directors are bound as between themselves and the company to take the shares. It certainly amounted to a contract by the directors to take the shares.

They referred to Isaacs' case, 40 W. R. 518, [1892] 2 Ch. 158; In re Hercynia Copper Co., 42 W. R. 593, [1894] 2 Ch. 403; and to Moore and De La Torre's case, 22 W. R. 873, L. R. 18 Eq. 661.

Whinney, for Mr. Watson.

T. L. Wilkinson, for Messrs. Wells and Colman.

LINDLEY, M.R.—It is not from any desire to get Mr. Bartholomew off any obligation which he may have contracted that I fail to agree with Wright, J., because one would like to put this director on the list of contributories if one could. That is my own personal view, but I feel we cannot do it unless we invent a contract, and we have no business to invent a contract in order to do what we think would be fair.

Mr. Bartholomew complains of an order which has put him on the list of contributories and made him pay calls on 367 shares in this company. We are told that he was one of the original directors of the company and one of the promoters. Before the company was wound up, and whilst the company was a going company, he was never registered in respect of any shares, and there is no trace of any agreement whatever between him and the company that he would take any definite number of shares, or that the company would give him any definite number of shares. Nor was there in truth any agreement at all between him and the company that he should have, or that the company should give him, any definite number of shares at all. But there is a very important document, to which I will allude presently, from which it is said that we must infer that there was an agreement between him and the company that he should have 367 shares. That document is the prospectus. The company was registered on the 4th of October, 1893, and Mr. Whinney has stated that the prospectus was framed before that, and was sent by Mr. Bartholomew to Mr. Watson and approved of by Mr. Watson as the prospectus for the then unformed company as early as September, 1893. Now, I pause there for a moment. What did the language of the prospectus mean, then, in September, 1893, when Mr. Bartholomew approved it? It meant this, that the directors would take the 1,500 ordinary shares of £20 each. You cannot turn that by any possibility into anything like an agreement with the company. At the outset it is an expression of an intention. "When the company is formed we will enter into an agreement with the company to take those shares." That is the very outside. Now, when the company was registered Mr. Bartholomew became a director, and he does not dispute that he did become a director. There may be some question hereafter whether he became liable to take his qualification shares. We have not considered that, and I say nothing more about it. I refer only to his obligation to take 367 shares. On the 28th of October, 1893, the directors met, and Mr. Bartholomew was present, and at that meeting the draft prospectus was approved and settled, and the secretary was instructed to place the same in the printer's hands. This was the prospectus which Mr. Bartholomew previously sent to Mr. Watson in September, 1893. It is headed "Moore Bros. & Co. (Limited)." "Capital 1,500 ordinary shares of £20 each, the whole of which will be taken by the directors." That comes to £30,000. Then we have a statement about the vendors, and there is this paragraph: "Seeing that with the other directors they"—the vendors—"take the whole of the ordinary shares, investors have the best possible assurance that every effort will be made to ensure the prosperity of the company's business." If we had to consider what effect that prospectus had upon any complaint made by a person who took shares in this company on the faith of that statement we might possibly come to some conclusion which would be advantageous to the person bringing such an action; but we have not to consider anything of the sort. We have to consider the question whether this statement in the prospectus amounts to satisfactory proof, not merely whether the document is admissible as evidence, but whether it is satisfactory proof that there was an agreement between Mr. Bartholomew and the company that he would take and that the company would allot to him 367 shares, that being the total amount of ordinary shares not allotted. Wright, J., has come to the conclusion that upon the true construction of this prospectus, and upon the fact that it was issued by the directors at that meeting on the 28th of October, 1893, all the directors are jointly liable for these 367 shares; that is to say, he treats it not only as evidence of an agreement, but as satisfactory proof of an agreement between them and the company that they were all of them bound to take these 367 shares. I cannot come to that conclusion at all. It appears to me, in the first place, that if it is evidence of any agreement between the directors and the company, the true construction is not that at all. I cannot possibly get out of this language a contract that all the directors shall take jointly all the shares which are unallotted. The true meaning of it, as I apprehend, is the same as the meaning before the company was formed, that is to say, that some arrangement will be made with the company by which, if other people do not take these shares, they, the directors, will take them in some proportions which they will settle amongst themselves. There is nothing definite about it at all. So far from its being an agreement with the company it is, at the very outside, evidence of an intention on the part of the directors that some agreement shall be entered into, which agreement has to be considered afterwards. One director might apply for some shares, and another director for others, but to spell out of this an agreement between the company and the directors that the company will allot, and that the directors will take jointly 367 shares—or in Mr. Bartholomew's case that he will take 367 shares—is in my judgment not to infer an agreement in conformity with the intention of the parties, but to invent an agreement in order to catch a man who is considered to have behaved shabbily. I cannot go that length.

I think that the agreement, which alone will justify us in putting Mr. Bartholomew on the list of contributories, or making a call upon him for the 367 shares, cannot be got at fairly from these materials. I think therefore that the appeal must be allowed with costs.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The contention must be carried to this extent—that the company were bound to allot these shares to the directors. I can find no evidence of that at all. We know, as a matter of fact, that outside this prospectus there was no agreement. When we are construing the prospectus it must be shown that the company is bound. I do not see any evidence of the company being bound. I agree in the construction that must be put upon it—that it is not an agreement that they will take all the shares. It is only a statement that the shares will be taken up by some or other of the directors. And you cannot fix them all with the whole 367 shares.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Two learned judges, Romer, J., and Wright, J., having apparently arrived at a conclusion that there is a liability on these directors to be placed upon the list of contributories, I think it is perhaps better for me to express my own reasons for a contrary view.

In my opinion it is plain that there is no membership by these directors of this company in respect of these shares. Indeed, it is not suggested that there is. I think that it is also plain that there is no contract by these directors to take these shares. What is said is, that a contract may somehow or other be spelt out of this prospectus. Now, the statements in the prospectus on which reliance is placed are these: "Capital 1,500 ordinary shares of £20 each, the whole of which will be taken by the directors." That is a passage in the statement of the items of the capital. Then the prospectus goes on to say that the vendors, after discharging every liability up to the date of purchase, will reinvest the whole of the purchase-money in the company, principally in the ordinary stock, on which they will receive no dividend until the £5 per cent. interest on the debentures and the £6 per cent. interest on the preference shares has been paid. It continues: "Seeing that, with the other directors, they" (which I suppose means the vendors) "take the whole of the ordinary shares, investors have the best possible assurance that every effort will be made to ensure the prosperity of the company's business."

Now, the first contention was, that you can find a contract there upon the principle of an estoppel. I can only say that I entirely agree with Wright, J., when he says that he cannot see how any contract can possibly be found here upon the principle of an estoppel. If there were an estoppel at all it would have to be an estoppel between the directors and the company, whose prospectus this was.

Then it is said, even if you cannot find a contract by estoppel, this statement in this prospectus is evidence of an agreement between these directors and the company. According to my understanding, it cannot be evidence of anything.

As I understand, the judgment of Wright, J., is based merely upon an application of the principle on which Isaacs' case was decided. But in Isaacs' case there was an offer by the company to persons who should become directors. There was a statement of the terms upon which persons could become directors, and the persons with those terms before them afterwards chose to become directors, and the decision only is that by becoming directors they accepted those terms, and therefore contracted to take the shares in accordance with those terms. There is nothing of the sort here, because there is no offer of any sort or kind by the company which could be said to be accepted by the directors by their becoming directors, because they were already directors at the moment when this prospectus was issued. I rather understand Wright, J., to suggest that the issuing of the prospectus itself is evidence of an offer by the company of these shares, and an acceptance by the directors of them uno flatu at the moment when the prospectus was issued on behalf of the company by these directors. It seems to me to be impossible to say that, because that involves saying really that the company on the one hand were bound to allot these shares, and that the directors on the other hand were bound to accept them. It was not even suggested to us in argument that that state of things existed. It was not and could not be suggested that the result of the issue of this prospectus was that the company ceased to be at liberty to deal with these shares. That being so, the suggestion made was, not that there was an immediate contract to take the shares, so that from that moment the directors either became shareholders or became compelled to take the shares, but that there was a contract by the issue of this prospectus that the directors would at some future time take so many of the shares as should remain unallotted after the vendors had taken as many of them as they chose to take—and that they were intended to take some is plain from the prospectus itself—and after the company had allotted as many of these shares to the outside public as they might think fit so to allot. I cannot find any evidence of any such contract from the words of this prospectus, nor have I any hesitation in coming to the conclusion that there is no evidence of such contract. But if I had any hesitation in the matter, it would go far to remove any such hesitation to find that you have a document here which is so obviously vague and uncertain that no court ought to set itself to try and see whether a contract can be spelt out it.

In my judgment Mr. Bartholomew is not liable to remain on the list of contributories; I think that he incurred no liability by reason of any estoppel; and I think there is no evidence whatsoever that he made any contract to take any number of shares.

AGIUS v. GREAT WESTERN COLLIERY CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Damages, Measure of—Contract for sale of coals to ship—Sub-contract by vendor with colliery owner—Costs of reasonably defending action by shipowner—Solicitor and client costs.

The plaintiff, a coal merchant, entered into a contract with a shipowner for the supply of bunker coals to ships over a certain period, and, in order to carry out this contract, the plaintiff entered into a contract with the defendants, who carried on business in the same place, for the supply of coals to the ships for the same period. The defendants having made default in the supply of coals, one of the ships was detained in dock, and the shipowner brought an action against the plaintiff to recover damages for the detention arising from the breach of contract. The plaintiff gave notice of the claim to the defendants, who repudiated liability. The plaintiff accordingly defended the action and paid a sum of money into court. At the trial it was held that the amount paid into court was sufficient to satisfy the shipowner's claim, and judgment was entered for the shipowner for the amount so paid into court, with costs up to the time of the payment into court, the plaintiff to have the costs of the action subsequent to that time. The plaintiff thereupon sued the defendants for breach of contract, claiming as damages (1) the sum recovered by the shipowner in the former action, (2) the costs paid to the shipowner, and (3) the difference between the plaintiff's costs of the action, taxed as between solicitor and client, and the party and party costs subsequent to the time of the payment into court which he had recovered from the shipowner.

Held, that, as the plaintiff had, in these circumstances, acted reasonably in defending the former action, he was entitled to recover, in addition to items (1) and (2), the difference between the solicitor and client costs of the action, taxed upon the footing that another person was going to pay them, and the party and party costs subsequent to the payment into court.

Appeal from the judgment of Channell, J., in favour of the plaintiff at the trial without a jury of an action to recover damages for breach of a contract for the sale of bunker coals.

The plaintiff was a coal merchant at Cardiff, and the defendants were the owners of a colliery in the neighbourhood. In May, 1896, the plaintiff entered into a contract with a firm of shipowners for the supply of a quantity of bunker coals for their steamers f.o.b. Cardiff, shipment there till the end of 1896. The plaintiff, in order to carry out this contract, on the same day made a contract with the defendants for the supply of a quantity of bunker coals f.o.b. Cardiff, for the shipowners' steamers, as required till the end of 1896. The defendants made default in the supply of coals to one of the steamers as required, and in consequence thereof the ship was detained in dock at Cardiff, and in respect of this breach of contract the shipowners made a claim against the present plaintiff for £150 damages for the detention of the ship. The plaintiff thereupon informed the present defendants of the claim against him, when the present defendants said that the claim was preposterous, and repudiated any liability. The shipowners then commenced an action against the plaintiff, and the latter paid £20 into court. At the trial before Bruce, J., it was held that the £20 was sufficient to satisfy the claim, and judgment was accordingly entered for the shipowners for that amount with costs up to the time of payment into court, the present plaintiff recovering from the shipowners his costs of the action subsequent to the payment into court.

The plaintiff then brought this action against the defendants to recover, as damages for their breach of contract, (1) the above-mentioned sum of £20, (2) the taxed costs which he had to pay to the shipowners, up to the time of payment into court, and (3) the difference between the plaintiff's costs of the action taxed as between solicitor and client, and the party and party costs which he had recovered from the shipowners.

At the trial Channell, J., held that the plaintiff had acted reasonably in defending the former action and paying the £20 into court, and he gave judgment for the plaintiff for the first two items; and as regards the third item, he directed that the plaintiff's costs of the former action should be taxed as between solicitor and client upon the footing that another person was going to pay them, according to the scale of taxation recognized for that purpose, and that the amount so ascertained by taxation, less the party and party costs received from the shipowners, should be paid by the defendants.

The defendants appealed.

S. T. Evans, for the defendants.—There having been a breach of contract the plaintiff is entitled to recover the £20. But the costs of the former action are not recoverable. Where there are two separate and independent contracts, in order that the costs may be recoverable there must be a contract of indemnity express or implied: Baxendale v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., 23 W. R. 167, L. R. 10 Ex. 35; Fisher v. Val de Travers Asphalte Co., 1 C. P. D. 511, 24 W. R. Dig. 72. Such costs are not damages which may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the parties when they made the contract within the rule in Hadley v. Baxendale, 2 W. R. 302, 9 Ex. 341. This is so even though the plaintiff may have reasonably defended the former action. The contracts being independent, the damages in each case are different. In Hammond v. Bussey, 20 Q. B. D. 79, 36 W. R. Dig. 65, the former cases are discussed, but they are still law. [He also referred to Mors le Blanch v. Wilson, 21 W. R. 109, L. R. 8 C. P. 227; Grébert Borgnis v. Nugent, 15 Q. B. D. 85, 33 W. R. Dig. 70.] Secondly, if the costs are recoverable, costs as between party and party, and not as between solicitor and client, are alone recoverable, there being no contract of indemnity: Mayne on Damages (5th ed.), pp. 84-86.

Bailhache, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff, in defending the action brought by the shipowners, acted reasonably, and therefore the costs of doing so are recoverable under the second branch of the rule in Hadley v. Baxendale. The plaintiff and defendants are in the habit of supplying coal to ships, and the defendants knew of the plaintiff's contract with the shipowners, and it must have been in the contemplation of the parties that if the contract was broken the ship would be detained, and an action involving costs might arise. Fisher v. Val de Travers Asphalte Co. was decided upon a wrong view of Baxendale v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co. —see Hammond v. Bussey, 20 Q. B. D., at p. 92—the decision in Baxendale's case being based upon the fact that the costs were unreasonably incurred. If that was not the ground of the decision, Hammond v. Bussey is inconsistent with it, and being later in date should be followed. Therefore all reasonable costs of defending the action and ascertaining the damages, and not merely party and party costs, are recoverable.

Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—In my opinion this appeal should be dismissed. The questions argued may be disposed of shortly. There was ample evidence of the breach of contract, and indeed this was very faintly contested at the trial. The breach being proved, the only question is as to the amount of the damages caused by that breach. The question to be determined is whether the costs of defending the former action can be recovered. Certainly in the circumstances of this case, if the plaintiff cannot recover those costs from the defendants, it would be a most unreasonable state of the law, because he succeeded in the former action in reducing the damages claimed, £150, and recovered from the shipowners the taxed costs of the action subsequent to the payment into court. Therefore his defending that action enured to the benefit of the present defendants. Nevertheless, the defendants now contend that they are not liable for the loss which the plaintiff has thus sustained by reason of the breach of contract on their part. I am glad to say that such is not the law. The principle laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale has been always treated as the guiding principle upon the question of the measure of damages—namely, that if the particular damages are such as may be fairly and reasonably considered as arising naturally from the breach of contract, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties at the time they made the contract, as the probable result of the breach of it, then those damages can be recovered. We must apply that principle to the present case. The parties live in the same place and are familiar with the coal business, both of them being in the habit of supplying coals to steamships in a tidal harbour. It was clear to both that a breach of the contract might give rise to a claim in the nature of damages. If a claim was made it would be reasonable for the party sued to take steps to show either that a breach of contract had not been committed or that the damages claimed were extravagant; and indeed he would be guilty of bad conduct towards the other if he did not take steps to prove that extravagant damages should not be awarded. Then the question arises, can he recover the costs of doing so as being reasonably incident to the breach of contract? But for the case of Baxendale v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., I should have thought that it was reasonable that he should recover those costs. I can see no distinction in such a case between the costs reasonably incurred in reducing the damages and ascertaining their amount, and the expenses of a surgeon attending upon a person who has been injured by a negligent act. Undoubtedly the case of Baxendale v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co. raises a difficulty. The facts in that case raise no question of difficulty, because the defence in the former action was unsuccessful and was held to be unreasonable. That case shows that the costs of defending such an action are not recoverable. But unfortunately the judges thought it right, in dealing with the case of Mors-le-Blanch v. Wilson, to use certain expressions with which I feel a certain difficulty in agreeing. But there is a later judgment in Hammond v. Bussey in which those expressions are commented upon, and, as it seems to me, the judges felt some difficulty in understanding them or agreeing with them. I prefer the last decision, which I think right, and the earlier decision can be well supported on the first ground upon which it was decided. In my opinion the judgment of Channell, J., was right and must be affirmed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The plaintiff entered into a contract with certain shipowners to supply bunker coal to a ship, and not having the coal himself he entered into a contract with the defendants that they should supply the coal. It is clear that the defendants knew of the contract with the shipowners. What was in the contemplation of the parties at the time they made the contract as the probable result of a breach of it? The principle is laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale. Obviously the defendants knew that the plaintiff wanted the coal for the ship's bunkers, and they knew that the shipowners would have a claim against the plaintiff if he broke his contract, and that that claim would have to be defended or admitted. The plaintiff in fact broke his contract with the shipowners, and the shipowners, brought an action against him for not having supplied the coal in time. The plaintiff went to the defendants and told them that an action had been brought against him owing to their breach of contract with him. The defendants said that the action was preposterous and that the shipowners had not a leg to stand upon. The meaning of that was that the plaintiff was not to sit down under the action. The learned judge held that he had acted reasonably in defending the action. He paid £20 into court, which was held sufficient to satisfy the shipowners' claim against him. The present defendants now admit that they must pay those damages, but they contend that they are not liable to pay the costs which he necessarily incurred in ease of the defendants. I cannot see the dividing line. I cannot see why the defendants should not pay them. In Baxendale v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co. the court came to the conclusion that the defence was an unreasonable one, and upon that basis the decision was clearly right, whatever other reasons the court may have given. Then came the decision in Fisher v. Val de Travers Asphalte Co., which merely followed what the court supposed was the decision in Baxendale v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co. Lastly, those cases were discussed in Hammond v. Bussey. Bowen, L.J., at anyrate felt a difficulty in understanding the other grounds, if they were grounds, for the decision in Baxendale v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co. The case of Hammond v. Bussey, in my opinion, covers this case entirely, and the law is now placed upon a proper footing by the judgments delivered in that case.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. According to the second branch of the rule in Hadley v. Baxendale the damages recoverable must be such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties at the time they made the contract as the probable result of the breach of it. The plaintiff and the defendants lived in the same place. Upon the face of the contract the coal was sold to be put on board particular steamers. Therefore the defendants knew that the coal was intended for certain ships. In my opinion the case as regards the damages falls within the rule laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale. Then as regards the costs. The course the plaintiff pursued in contesting the shipowners' claim was reasonable, and resulted in benefit to the defendants in the present action, because the claim was for £150 damages, and the sum actually did not exceed £20, and as he had paid £20 into court he got the costs of the action subsequent thereto. Therefore the action was defended, not simply for the benefit of the present plaintiff, but for the benefit of the present defendants also. As regards the authorities, I need only say this, that the decision in Hammond v. Bussey is well founded, and whatever difference there may be between it and the other cases, we must follow Hammond v. Bussey. It was contended that the plaintiff was only entitled to recover party and party costs. I think that the decision of Channell, J., was right. He has given the plaintiff the costs reasonably incurred by him; not all the costs he has had to pay his own solicitor, but such costs as would reasonably have been paid by another person.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. RUFFORD & Co. (a.)

Local government — "New street" — Towns Improvement Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 34), s. 63— —Public Health Act, 1875, s. 157.

The decisions under section 157 of the Public Health Act, 1875, as to what is a new street apply in considering what constitutes a "new street" in section 63 of the Towns Improvement Clauses Act, 1847.

Elements constituting a "street" considered.

Motion.

The plaintiff, the Attorney-General, on the relation of the Urban District Council of Stourbridge, claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants from erecting any buildings adjoining or abutting on Brick Kiln-lane so as to make or lay out that lane as a new street less than 30 ft. wide. Brick Kiln-lane was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large and varied in width from 19 ft. to 29 ft.

On one side of the lane there already stood the defendants' factory, which covered some 480 ft. out of the total length of the lane of 580 ft. There were two small cottages on the same side but lower down the lane; on the other side of the lane there were also two cottages, but no other buildings, and the defendants proposed to erect there, opposite their factory, a building some 240 ft. in length. The lane was bounded by hedges except in front of the cottages and the plaintiff's factory.

The proceedings were taken under section 63 of the Towns Improvement Clauses Act, 1847, which applied to Stourbridge by incorporation in a local Act. That section enacts: "It shall not be lawful to make or lay out any new street unless the same be of the prescribed width, or, where no width is prescribed, unless the same, being a carriage road, be at least 30 ft. wide, or, not being a carriage road, be at least 20 ft. wide."

Farwell, Q.C., and R. Cunningham Glen, for plaintiff. —There is no case under section 63 of the Towns Clauses Act, 1847, as to what is a street within the meaning of that section, but we submit that the decisions on the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 157, apply, and this is a new street within those decisions: see Robinson v. Barton Local Board, 32 W. R. 249, 8 App. Cas. 798; Hendon Local Board v. Pounce, 33 W. R. 377, 42 Ch. D. 602.

Neville, Q.C., and R. E. Moore, for the defendants.— This is not "street" and the cases cannot make it so; it is a question of fact, and here there is no continuity of buildings, but merely isolated buildings.

NORTH, J.—I think I must hold that this is a new street within the meaning of the decisions on the Public Health Act, 1875. There is a difficulty no doubt in saying when some country lane has become a street, as is pointed out by the Master of the Rolls in Robinson v. Barton Local Board, when he says: "Now, there are two ways in which a street may come into existence where there was no street before. A person may take a grass field or a country lane (for in my opinion it makes no difference whether or not there was a public highway or lane or a footpath existing before which is thrown into the street and is utilized, or whether there was nothing but a mere plot of grass land out of which a new highway is made), he may take it and build continuous lines of houses so as to form what is commonly known as a street. When I say continuous lines, I do not mean that there are to be no breaks or intervals, but there must be a certain degree of continuity." Then he points out another way in which a street may arise and says that is, "where it is not from the first laid out as a street in a formal manner but may be considered to grow up, so to say, of itself. This often happens when there is an existing highway and people build houses along the sides of the highway, so that without any intention of laying out a street, the street grows. When does it become a street? This question cannot be answered until you know the locality." No doubt there may be great difficulty in saying in such a case as the latter when it does become a street. He points out that when you have continuous lines of buildings on both sides, that is one way in which the property becomes a street. He also points put that a new street does not mean necessarily a street between continuous lines of houses without any break or interval but that there must be a certain degree of continuity.

In this case, there being buildings extending on the one side for 400 ft., it is now proposed to put up a building which will extend about 230 ft. or 240 ft. along the other side opposite to them. Suppose that, instead of putting up a continuous building there, a row of cottages of that length had been put up—perhaps twelve to twenty cottages—could it be said that that was not a new street? Counsel for the defendants did not suggest that that would not be so, but he said there was a difference between that case and this. In a certain sense there is. What they are doing here is defining the line of the road—I do not use that in a technical sense, but a general sense—defining the road on which people are to pass by fixing walls and by altering the state of things so that there will be walls on each side limiting the road to that particular space. I must say I think that what will be the line of road between those walls will be a new street within the meaning of the Act. I think that I am justified in coming to that conclusion, not only by the views expressed by Lord Selborne in the case cited (Robinson v. Barton Local Board, but also because I am conforming to the views of Sir George Jessel in the same case.

In re BENNETT.
CLARKE v. WHITE. (a.)

Mortgage—Public-house—Goodwill—Locke King's Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 113).

On a mortgage of a public-house the goodwill is not included unless expressly mentioned.

The plaintiff in this case was entitled to the proceeds of the sale of the goodwill of the testator's business, and the defendants were entitled to the proceeds of sale of the freehold where such business had been carried on.

The testator in 1871 mortgaged the public-house the "Buck's Head," at which he carried on the business of licensed victualler. The testator was then the freeholder of the "Buck's Head," having previously been in as lessee. The mortgage was a mortgage in fee, and nothing was said about the goodwill. The testator died in 1873, having by his will bequeathed, inter alia, the goodwill of his business to his trustees on trust for sale, and in the events which happened the plaintiff became absolutely entitled to the proceeds of the sale of the same. The testator also devised his real estate to his trustees on trust for sale and conversion, and the defendants were now entitled to the proceeds of the sale of the said real estate. The trustees of the will had paid off the mortgage debt, and taken a reconveyance of the "Buck's Head" to the uses of the will. The mortgagees had never entered into possession. The "Buck's Head" had been sold by the trustees for £11,550, including the goodwill.

In some earlier proceedings relating to the testator's estate an order had been made by consent admitting that the value of the goodwill of the business of the testator, as distinct from the value of the freehold, ought to be paid to the plaintiff in this action, and referring it to a valuer to assess the same. The valuer had found the value of the goodwill to be £2,617. The question now was whether the goodwill, as represented by the sum of £2,617, ought to bear any portion of the mortgage debt, or whether the mortgage debt ought to fall entirely on the sum realized on the sale of the "Buck's Head," deduction being made of the value of the goodwill.

Methold and Rowden, for plaintiff.—The goodwill did not pass to the mortgagees: Whitley v. Challis, 40 W. R. 291, [1892] 1 Ch. 64. The goodwill of a public-house is separable from the building: West London Syndicate v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, ante p. 125, [1898] 1 Q. B. 226, [1898] 2 Q. B. 507. The mortgage debt must be paid out of the value of the freehold alone.

W. M. Cann, for defendants.—The mortgage included the goodwill which attaches to the public-house; such a goodwill is not a personal goodwill. The mortgagees would have been entitled to the goodwill on taking possession: Booth v. Curtis, 17 W. R. 393; King v. Midland Railway Co., 17 W. R. 113; Pile v. Pile, 24 W. R. 100, 3 Ch. D. 36; Ex parte Punnett, 29 W. R. 129, 16 Ch. D. 226; Cooper v. Metropolitan Board of Works, 32 W. R. 709, 25 Ch. D. 472; and see West London Syndicate v. Inland Revenue Commissioners.

Rowden in reply.

NORTH, J.—I think in this case the mortgage does not include the goodwill. Bennett, down to the time of his death had been in possession of the property. The mortgagees were never in possession. After Bennett died the property was from time to time let by the tenant for life, and ultimately by the trustee to a person for a term which expired only when the tenant for life died in April, 1897. During the whole of that time down to April, 1897, the mortgagees were never in possession of the property at all; they never had any goodwill conveyed to them in terms, and they never had any de facto goodwill from being in actual enjoyment of the property and being known to be carrying on business on those premises. In May, 1897, the mortgage debt of £1,500 was paid off by the trustee out of the estate of Bennett, and the property was sold. The property was sold for £11,500, and a question then arose between the devisees of the property itself and the legatee of the goodwill as to what their interests were in the purchase-money. That they settled for themselves by means of an order which was made by consent.

But then a point is raised which I quite admit is not precluded by the order made in the former proceedings. That order settles that the assessed value of the goodwill is the plaintiff's; but the question is left open in what way the money paid out of the personal estate by the trustee to pay off the mortgage, is to be made good. It is to be made good out of the property mortgaged, but then the question is whether it was the house only that was comprised in the mortgage, or the goodwill also. Now, there has never been any reference to goodwill as property conveyed by the mortgage, and there has never been anything in the shape of de facto acquisition of goodwill by occupation by the mortgagees. They never entered into possession; the possession was first of all in the mortgagor, and after his death in the persons who claimed under him. In those circumstances I do not find anything to show that in this case the goodwill ever did pass to the mortgagee. In those circumstances the cases that have been cited and relied upon by the persons interested in the real estate do not seem to me to apply. The mortgage debt must be borne by the property comprised in the mortgage, and there must be a declaration that the plaintiff is entitled to receive so much of the proceeds of sale as represents the value the goodwill without any deduction therefrom on account of the mortgage debt.

In re CLEMENT ET CIE.'S TRADE-MARK. (a.)

Trade-mark — Registration — "St. Raphael" — Geographical name—Descriptive name—Fancy word—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), ss. 64 (1) (c) (2), 74 (a).

The company had registered under the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, as their trade-mark a label upon which the words "St. Raphael" appeared several times. On the application by a rival company to have this mark removed from the register unless a disclaimer of the said words was entered,

Held, that, upon the evidence, the words were not "geographical words"; and that no disclaimer was required; and, further, that the words, being contained in a distinctive label, registered as a whole under the Act of 1883, need not be disclaimed under section 74, inasmuch as they formed a part of the label, and were not additions to it.

The applicants, the Societé Anonyme du St. Raphaël Quinquina, dealers in a specially prepared tonic wine sold under the name of "St. Raphaël-Quinquina," had applied for the registration in the United Kingdom of a trade-mark consisting of a label bearing the said name prominently and variously printed. The comptroller replied that the mark was incapable of registration owing to the existence on the register of the trade-mark No. 76,176 of the respondents, registered in the class in which the applicants sought to have their mark registered, for "Saint-Raphael Tannin Wine," the words "St. Raphael" also appearing four times on the two parts of the label so registered. The respondents appeared to have applied for the registration of their mark on the 11th of May, 1888. The name and French address of the firm, "Compagnie du Vin de St. Raphael, Valence, Drôme, France," appeared twice on the label as registered. Their firm traded as Clement et Cie. Before 1872 no wine had been sold under the name of St. Raphael. In that year the respondents began to sell their wine at Valence in the Drôme (which has always been their central place of business) under the name of "Vin de Baynals St. Raphael," Baynals or Banyuls (in the Pyrénées Orientales) being the place where their wine has always been grown. About 1873 the insertion of the name "Baynals" was discontinued, and the wine continued to be commonly known as "Vin de St. Raphael" or "St. Raphael's Wine." The evidence was conflicting as to the possible association of the respondents' wine with any place of the name of "St. Raphael." The applicants allege that, besides a town of 5,000 inhabitants near Toulon called St. Raphael, that name belonged to places, at or near each of which there were vineyards, in the several departments of the Alpes Maritimes, Drôme, and the Gironde, and they therefore contended that the name used by the respondents was a geographical name. The respondents, on the other hand, denied that the existence of any place with the name was known to their firm when their wine was named, and further alleged that there was no place with the name in the department either of the Drôme or of the Pyrénées Orientales, nor any place with the name which had a reputation for wine. The applicants asked for the rectification of the register of trade-marks by the removal of the respondents' trade-mark, or alternatively, by adding thereto a disclaimer as to the words "St. Raphael." The question was whether the words were capable of being on the register on the 11th of May, 1888 (date of respondents' application), without a disclaimer, and had therefore to be dealt with under the Act of 1883.

T. R. Warrington, Q.C. (G. F. Hart with him), for the applicants.—At that date "St. Raphael" was not a word which could form an essential part of the trade-mark under section 74, and should only have appeared on the register by way of disclaimer under section 64. It should only appear on the register under section 64 if it was a fancy word having no connection with the goods sold under it and not being geographical: In re Laing, L. Jour. N. of Cas. (1887), p. 102 ("Glengowrie"); In re Van Duzer's Trade-mark, 35 W. R. 294, 34 Ch. D. 623 ("Melrose"); Great Tower Street Tea Co. v. Smith, 6 Rep. Pat. Cas. 165 ("Tower Tea"). It is submitted, that the name of a mythical person, or even that of an archangel, is no more a fancy word than "Romulus," "Britannia," or "John Bull." Again, "St. Raphael" was common to the trade in the sense of being "open to the trade," according to the applicants' evidence; it was distinctive and was not a word by which "any ordinary person would understand that the name could not be intended to designate the place where this was produced." In re Magnolia Metal Co.'s Trade-Marks, 45 W. R. 406, [1897] 2 Ch. 371 (under the 1888 Act), is distinguishable because, Magnolia not being primarily a geographical term, its genesis was ascertained as representing the flower, which itself had been previously a trade-mark: Burland & Co. v. Broxburn Oil Co. (Limited), 38 W. R. 89, 42 Ch. D. 274 ("Washerine"); In re Sir Titus Salt, Bart., Sons, & Co.'s Application, 42 W. R. 666 [1894] 3 Ch. 166 ("Eboline"). Not being a fancy word not in common use, it can only appear on the register under section 64—i.e., with a disclaimer.

Ingle Joyce, for the comptroller, awaited the decision of the court.

L. B. Sebastian, for the respondents, said that the case was really covered by the opening words of

(a.) Reported by W. H. DRAPER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lindley, L.J., in In re Trade-Mark No. 58,405, 'Bovril," 45 W. R. 150, [1896] 2 Ch. 600, at p. 604. The case must be looked at as at date of registration, and with reference to this country and Englishmen. In May, 1888, when respondents' business was old-established and was, as always, utterly unconnected with any place St. Raphael, their mark was rightly registered as it stood. No Englishmen knew of the Baynals part of the name. The word "de" was in the name of the company. The onus of proof of geographical name was not discharged by the applicants. In the Magnolia case there were three or four people in this country who said they were aware of the existence of a place of that name. In re Van Duzer it may also be distinguished. The words "St. Raphael" are an integral part of the trade-mark itself, and not an addition. There was no need of a disclaimer, the name of the healing saint having been chosen as an attractive fancy name, with no geographical reference: In re Smokeless Powder Co.'s Trade-Mark, 40 W. R. 507, [1892] 1 Ch. 590, 9 Rep. Pat. Cas. 109, In re Heaton's Trade-mark, 32 W. R. 951, 27 Ch. D. 570.

T. R. Warrington, Q.C., in reply.—"Distinctive" means "distinguishing the goods of a particular trader from the goods of any other trader," and in cases like the present must be primâ facie distinctive. Even if "St. Raphael" is not geographical, then it is not a "fancy" word of its own inherent strength, but is the name of a person, either historical or mythical: In re Thompson's Trade-Mark, 13 Rep. Pat. Cas. 35 ("Roadster").

KEKEWICH, J.—So much was made by Mr. Warrington of the distinctive character of the words "St. Raphael" on the respondents' label that I thought it right again to study the evidence which was read in the opening of the case, and before, perhaps, I had appreciated the full weight intended to be given to it. A further perusal of the affidavits has confirmed the impression that the applicants do not establish the geographical character of the words. I do not think that on a comparison of the applicants' and the respondents' affidavits it can properly be held that the respondents adopted those words as intending to refer to any one of the French towns called St. Raphael, and my opinion is that they adopted them for a different reason. It by no means follows that they are not distinctive words, and inasmuch as they were common—that is, open to the trade on the 11th of May, 1888, the date of the respondents' application, it may be held that the provision for the disclaimer extends to them on that ground. I have found great difficulty in ascertaining any rule by which the court is guided in deciding what is a fancy word within the meaning of the 64th section of the Act, 1883, sub-section 1 (c). And if the words "St. Raphael" are not fancy words, then the applicants' argument based on the settled construction of the section and sub-section just mentioned deserves much consideration. I do not propose to say more on that point. The respondents take the point that these words St. Raphael, which occur twice on their registered trade-mark, are not added words within the meaning of the 64th section of the Act of 1883, sub-section 2. The Act allows the addition of any letters, words, or figures to the distinctive device, mark, brand, heading, or label sanctioned by the preceding part of the section. And it is obvious that in order thoroughly to understand what is a permitted addition you must first understand the meaning of the language describing the thing to which the addition may be made. Notwithstanding the many cases which have been discussed and decided on this part of the Act, I have not succeeded in discovering any rule laid down for my guidance on this point. I doubt whether there can be found, and I certainly have not found, any explanatory definition by which I could bring to the test a proposed device or label, or an addition thereto, and say whether what is proposed falls within the meaning of the Act. The nearest approach to a guide is to be in the judgment of Chitty, J., in the Smokeless Powder Co.'s case, or perhaps I should more properly say in the judgments of Fry, L.J., and Lord Esher, which he there quotes. When studying the respondents' registered trade-mark, and of course it has been my duty to do this with some curiosity, I asked myself which is the device or label and what are the added words. It seems to me that if I strike out the words "St. Raphael" I alter the whole character of the label, and it becomes something quite different from what it is now. Or, to use the language of Lord Esher quoted by Mr. Justice Chitty, the truth is that the label does not consist of each particular part of it, but consists of the combination of them all including the words "St. Raphael." It is noticeable that on the upper part of the label the respondents describe themselves as "Compagnie du Vin de St. Raphael," to which words the applicant does not seek to extend the disclaimer for which they ask. It would be a strange result if the respondents were compelled to disclaim the exclusive use of the words written across the label or standing as a signature on the lower part of it and yet were allowed to retain as part of their trade-mark their description above noticed, and it is also difficult, to my mind, to say why these latter words are not an addition to the distinctive device or label if the words "St. Raphael" standing alone fall within that category.

In my opinion the respondents are entitled to the judgment of the court on this ground, and the summons must be refused with costs.

MIALL v. PEARCE AND STREETER. (a.)

Trustee—Building society—Dissolution deed—Absconding trustee—Liability of the inactive co-trustee—Judicial Trustees Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 35), s. 3.

P., the active trustee of the two trustees of the dissolution deed of a building society, who had been required to give an account of moneys received and expended by them, had absconded. Where the cestuis que trustent asked, by summons, for the payment by the remaining trustee of the costs of the action which had ensued,

Held, that S., the remaining trustee, had acted dishonestly—within the meaning of section 3 of the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896 — in permitting his co-trustee to manage the affairs without check or inquiry, and was therefore liable to pay all the costs of the action.

Summons.

The facts are largely set out in the judgment.

T. Eustace Smith, for the plaintiff G. C. Miall, who, on behalf of himself and all other cestuis que trustent under a deed of dissolution dated the 1st of May, 1891, asked by summons that the defendant Streeter should be ordered to pay the costs of the action. On the 11th of November, 1898, an order had been made against Streeter to pay the sum of £391 16s. 4d. found due from Pearce as trustee of the deed of dissolution, of which Streeter was co-trustee. Streeter paid the money into court. He was a small tradesman and trusted entirely to Pearce, who was experienced in the affairs of building societies. Pearce absconded, and it was now contended that Streeter was liable to pay all costs.

T. H. Carson, for the defendant, contended that Streeter, who had been pressed to accept this charitable trusteeship but had left the management entirely in the hands of Pearce, ought not to be made to pay the costs, which no misconduct of his had incurred, and liability for which, would mean his bankruptcy.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 12.—KEKEWICH, J.—It is with the utmost reluctance that the court orders a trustee of this kind to pay costs not only because it is settled practice, but because of the natural and proper sympathy with a trustee who gratuitously undertakes duties in a charitable trust which are often very irksome, so that no one desires to judge his conduct by too rigid lines. Therefore, when I was pressed to make the defendant Streeter pay the costs of the action, I desired an opportunity for reflection, all the more because, although the order would go against both defendants, the burden would fall upon Streeter. Having taken that opportunity, I will now give my decision, and will first go into the history of the case so far as is necessary. This action was commenced so long ago as 1893 by an originating summons, dated the 7th of November in that year. The defendants Pearce and Streeter were the trustees of a deed of dissolution winding-up the affairs of the Second East Dulwich 745th Starr-Bowkett Building Society. The summons merely asked for an account of the moneys received and expended by them under the deed. One would have expected that a common order would be made, so that the matter might be worked out in chambers, but on the 11th of December it was ordered that an account should be taken of all moneys received and expended by the defendants as trustees under the deed of dissolution, and, further, that the rest of the application, so far as it asked that all moneys in the hands of Pearce and Streeter as trustees of the deed be paid into court, and that a receiver might be appointed, should stand over, and the costs were reserved. The certificate reached me in reasonable time on the 4th of June, 1894, the defendant Pearce attending in person; but Streeter not having appeared in the action, judgment went against him by default, the certificate having been made on a joint affidavit. A balance of £100 10s. 2d. was then found due from the trustees and a further order was made. A summons was issued to vary the certificate by surcharging the defendants' account, and by an order dated the 19th of November, 1894, it was ordered that the following inquiries be made—namely, an inquiry what are the consolidated shares of the defendants Pearce and Streeter, and how, when, and under what circumstances such consolidated shares were taken by the defendants, and what became of the shares. The history of the consolidated shares is important. Then there was a further inquiry, What assets are now in the hands or under the control of the defendants Pearce and Streeter as trustees of the deed of dissolution? and it was ordered that the account directed by the order of the 11th of December, 1893, be continued, and the rest of the summons was adjourned. That order was made on the 19th of November, 1894, and the inquiries were much longer. The certificate was not made until the 26th of June, 1896, eighteen months after. That certificate was extremely important; the master had to go into the question of the consolidated shares, and pointed out that large sums were due in respect thereof, and that the dealings in the shares were irregular. A considerable sum was found due from them in respect of those shares, together with a balance of £98 11s. 6d. due on the general account irrespective of those shares. Upon the further consideration in court on the 11th of December, 1895, when Pearce still defended in person, and Streeter appeared before the court by his solicitor, it was ordered that the trustees should pay these sums due on the general account into court; Streeter, by consent, to pay by instalments as arranged. £391 16s. 4d. was the total amount (I will observe that this is about four times the amount originally found due). A receiver was appointed, and the costs were reserved. After all this time the trustees, who ought to have had their accounts ready, are found to be liable for about £400. By a further order of the 20th of December, 1897, inquiries were directed as to the parties entitled, but that does not touch the matter now in hand. The certificate was made, and Pearce has absconded. Now, what is Streeter's own account of himself? He was a director of the society, and on the dissolution, urged by his co-directors, he joined with Pearce in the trusteeship of the deed of dissolution. He undertook to be trustee and by his own confession he has not performed those duties in any respect. He has discharged his duty by paying the £391 16s. 4d., but on his own confession he has not performed his duty as trustee. In his affidavit, dated the 8th of January, 1896, he states that, being co-trustee with Pearce, he knew nothing of the books, he trusted to Pearce and never inquired how matters went on. He signed document after document without inquiry as Pearce told him, and swore an affidavit which he did not understand. The Legislature has passed the Judicial Trustee Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 35), excusing trustees for certain breaches of trust, but that Act does not apply here. Under section 3, sub-section 1 of that Act, conduct to excuse a trustee must be "honest and reasonable." The word "honest" is used in many senses. A trustee is honest if he has not done anything dishonest. Now, there is nothing against Streeter, there is no suggestion that he has done anything dishonest; he has paid the £391 16s. 4d. which was found to be due to the society from Pearce, and is so far acquitted of dishonesty in the usual sense of the word. But in another sense he is not honest. It seems to me that a man who accepts such a trusteeship and does nothing, swallows wholesale what is said by his co-trustee, and never asks for explanation, and accepts flimsy explanations, is dishonest. He poses here before me as a poor man, the victim of his co-trustee. No doubt Pearce imposed upon him, but he suffered himself to be imposed upon. He brought himself into the difficulty, and I could not allow him to have costs that would diminish the sum recovered. But should I make him pay the costs? If I did, then the fund in court would be intact for those entitled to it; if I allowed him costs, the costs would come out of the fund, costs incurred by Streeter's own conduct. He ought to have insisted on accounts being filed in a reasonable time after the order, and it was quite unnecessary to pursue the inquiries and incur all these costs. If Streeter does not pay the costs, then the parties entitled will get less than they ought. So, having regard to Streeter's conduct, I should not be doing justice to the plaintiffs if I did not make him pay the costs. It is hard on the trustee, but I must consider the parties entitled. If I decided in favour of Streeter, the parties would suffer. Of course Streeter is entitled as trustee to his costs, charges, and expenses out of the fund properly incurred by him as trustee other than the costs of the action, which he must pay as between party and party down to the present time.

REG. v. JUSTICES OF MANCHESTER. (a.)

Licensing Law—Licence to sell beer—Certificate of residence and occupation—Jurisdiction of justices— Certiorari—Mandamus—Beerhouse Act, 1840 (3 & 4 Vict. c. 61), s. 1.

The licensing justices have no power to grant a certificate, under section 2 of the Beerhouse Act, 1840, for a licence to sell beer or cider by retail, unless the applicant sleeps upon the premises in respect of which he applies to be licensed.

Reg. v. Allmey, 35 J. P. 534, approved.

Though certiorari will not lie against the licensing justices who grant the certificate, it will lie against the justices at the general annual licensing meeting, or an adjournment thereof, who confirm it.

A mandamus was granted also to hear and determine the application for a certificate according to law.

Rule nisi for a certiorari to quash a certificate for a licence to sell beer by retail, and a rule nisi for a mandamus to justices to hear and determine the application of John Robinson for such certificate according to law.

An application for a certificate under section 2 of the Beerhouse Act, 1840, was made to the licensing justices of Manchester by John Robinson to enable him to obtain a licence to sell beer by retail upon the premises, No. 60, Cannon-street, within the borough.

It was proved or admitted that John Robinson occupied the premises, No. 60, Cannon-street, but that he did not sleep there. He used them as a restaurant, and was present upon them from 8 a.m. to 8 p.m. on every day on which they were open, conducting and managing the business. At other times the premises were closed and uninhabited.

The licensing justices granted the certificate applied for, holding that sleeping upon the premises was not requisite to constitute the applicant the "real resident holder and occupier" of the premises within section 1 of the Beerhouse Act, 1840. The certificate was confirmed by the whole body of the justices of the borough at an adjourned meeting of the general licensing meeting.

Section 1 of the Beerhouse Act, 1840, provides that "no licence to sell beer or cider by retail," under the Beerhouse Act, "shall be granted to any person who shall not be the real resident holder and occupier of the dwelling-house in which he shall apply to be licensed." Section 2 provides that persons applying for a licence to sell beer or cider by retail shall produce to the excise officer a certificate from an overseer of the township, parish, or place in which he resides certifying that he is the real resident holder and occupier of the house.

The Wine and Beerhouses Act, 1869, s. 5, substitutes for the overseer the licensing justices assembled at the general annual licensing meeting or some adjournment of the same.

Section 43 of the Licensing Act, 1872, provides: "Any person who appears before the licensing justices and opposes the grant of a new licence, and no other person, may appear and oppose the confirmation of such grant by the confirming authority in counties or boroughs; and the confirming authority may award such costs as they shall deem just to the party who shall succeed in the proceedings before them. . . ."

Travers Humphreys (C. W. Mathews with him) showed cause.—Certiorari does not lie, because the justices sitting to grant licences are not a court: Boulter v. Justices of Kent, 46 W. R. 114, [1897] A. C. 556; Reg. v. Cotham, 46 W. R. 512, [1898] 1 Q. B. 808; and Reg. v. Sharman, 46 W. R. 367, [1898] 1 Q. B. 578. Assuming that the justices are a court, there is no power to quash a certificate granted by them as distinguished from a licence. The certificate having been granted, there can be no mandamus to hear and determine.

Avory (Llewelyn Williams with him), in support of the rule.—If there is no remedy either by certiorari or by mandamus there is no remedy at all, for there is none by special case or by appeal. [CHANNELL, J.—The holder of the certificate could be prosecuted, and his certificate, being void, would not protect him.] That would not be a convenient mode of testing the validity of the certificate. The justices, in this instance, have resolved to grant these certificates to persons who personally conduct the business during the day, notwithstanding they do not reside on the premises. That is a usurpation of jurisdiction on their part. The applicant here did not sleep on the premises. He did not, therefore, reside there. Assuming that certiorari does not lie against the licensing justices, it lies, at anyrate, against the confirming authority, for section 43 of the Licensing Act, 1872, gives that authority power to award costs and to hear "parties." Those circumstances give a judicial character to the proceedings which make certiorari applicable. Mandamus also lies because, though the justices have heard and determined the application, they have not done so according to law: Reg. v. De Rutzen, 24 W. R. 343, 1 Q. B. D. 55.

LAWRANCE, J.—Both rules must be made absolute. The statute is imperative that the person who seeks for a licence to sell beer or cider under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61 must be the real resident holder and occupier of the dwelling-house, and, according to the case of Reg. v. Allmey, 35 J. P. 534, he must also sleep upon the premises. It is obvious that the respondent did not do that.

It is not clear what the object of the provision was, but whatever it was it seems to have disappeared at the present time. Although it is useless to talk of convenience in the face of the words of a statute, yet there is a great deal in what the magistrates say with regard to carrying on of businesses of this class in towns like Manchester.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. The first question is whether or not Robinson was, in the circumstances, a person who was entitled to have a licence to sell beer and cider. For that purpose he must be the resident occupier of the dwelling-house in respect of which he solicits the licence. Now, for some time I was inclined to think that the words "resident occupier" meant that the applicant must be the person who, if any, was the resident occupier; that is to say, that he must not be the servant or any one of that sort where there is a master, but that he must be the person who out of several was the resident occupier. If that view were the correct one, this applicant might come within the term resident occupier; for if you assume that the house was a dwelling-house there certainly was no one else who was the resident occupier. He was there as much as anybody else, and after business was over the place was shut up and nobody slept there, so that it might appear that he came within the provisions of the Act, and if the magistrates had decided that, there would have been a good deal of doubt as to how far they could have been interfered with. But when one looks further, and especially when one considers the case of Reg. v. Allmey, it appears that the premises in respect of which the licence is sought must be a dwelling-house, and that has been interpreted to mean a place where somebody sleeps. Thus the expression "resident occupier of a dwelling-house" gets a slightly different meaning.

It is obvious, therefore, as it seems to me, that a person who does not sleep on the premises is not a person entitled to have a licence, always assuming that Reg. v. Allmey is good law, and there is no reason to suppose that it is not, as it has stood for a considerable period and has been quoted as an authority. That being so, it seems to me that Robinson was not a person who could have a licence.

Now, the magistrates considered Robinson's application and they came to the conclusion that they would grant him a certificate. What were their powers? It seems to me quite clear that they had to consider whether or not he was a person who was qualified to hold the licence, and that they had no jurisdiction to give a certificate to anybody who was not qualified to hold the licence. In giving the certificate, therefore, they exceeded their jurisdiction, and even assuming there was a question of fact which they decided in the applicant's favour, it is clear that a tribunal cannot give itself jurisdiction which it has not got by an erroneous decision of fact, and I suppose it is equally clear that they cannot give themselves jurisdiction by an erroneous decision of law. That being so, it is a matter of course to bring up the certificate upon certiorari unless it is a matter in which certiorari will not lie—that is to say, if it is not a judicial proceeding or a quasi-judicial proceeding. It is obviously most convenient that licences should be brought up upon certiorari, because that is a convenient way of ascertaining whether the grant of them is within the jurisdiction of the authority granting them.

If these licences cannot be brought up in any way it seems to me to follow inevitably that the person who acts under one of them is, or may be, liable to a penalty all the time he is acting under it. If the matter is one which can be brought up upon certiorari, until it is so brought up it might be an answer to proceedings for a penalty—I do not say it would be—to say that the licence is effective and valid until it is set aside. Therefore it is most convenient that these licences should be tested by certiorari. Of course we are bound not only by Boulter v. Justices of Kent, but also by the case of Reg. v. Sharman, and if the matter were analogous to those two cases we could not grant a certiorari, because it would not be a judicial proceeding. But I think Mr. Avory has pointed out a section which sufficiently alters the matter. The real point in Boulter v. Justices of Kent was that there was no lis and no controversy inter partes. Lord Herschell says ([1897] A. C.), at p. 569: "It is, I think, a fallacy to treat the refusal as necessarily induced by a particular objector. Every member of the local community might object, would they all then become 'the other party'? There is in truth no lis, no controversy inter partes, and no decision in favour of one of them and against the other, unless indeed the entire public are regarded as the other party." By section 43 of the Licensing Act, 1872, which deals with the powers of the confirming authority, the objector below is expressly made a party, the case is treated as being one inter partes, and there is an express power to give costs.

It seems to me that that is sufficient to enable us to hold that this is a proceeding in which we may grant a certiorari, and, accordingly, I think it is right to make the rule for a certiorari absolute.

Then as to the rule for a mandamus, I personally have very considerable difficulty about it, which has not been altogether removed. It seems to me that to grant the rule is practically to mandamus the justices to refuse the application, and except in the case of Reg. v. Cotham I do not know of a case in which that has been done. That case proceeded very much upon Reg. v. De Rutzen, which to my mind is entirely different. Having given our decision upon the other point, as this point of the mandamus is not seriously opposed, I grant it upon the authority of Reg. v. Cotham; otherwise I should have had considerable doubt whether we ought to grant it.

Rules for certiorari and mandamus made absolute.

LYNES v. SNAITH. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Tenant at will—Determination of tenancy—Entry by landlord in order to repair—Real Property Limitation Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27), s. 7—Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 57), s. 1.

Where a tenant at will remains in possession of a house rent-free for more than twelve years after the expiration of the first year of the tenancy, the fact that the landlord enters from time to time in order to effect repairs, if it is not against the will of the tenant, does not operate as a taking possession so as to determine the tenancy at will, and therefore the tenant acquires a statutory title to the house by virtue of section 7 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, and section 1 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874.

Per Channell, J.—After a final judgment has been delivered, but before it has been entered, new plaintiffs may be added by the judge under ord. 16, rr. 2, 11.

Appeal by the defendant from the County Court of Leicester.

The action was one of ejectment against the defendant Mary Ann Snaith, who had been tenant at will of a house, 27, Walnut-street, Leicester, for more than twelve years. The defendant entered into possession of the said house, of which John Snaith, her father-in-law, was owner in fee, on the 19th of April, 1884, by the leave and license of the said John Snaith. There was no agreement in writing. The defendant remained in continuous possession rent free. She was rated as occupier. She paid the poor rate and district rate, and at her own expense caused several internal repairs to be done to the premises. John Snaith, who was also the owner of the adjoining houses, did the external repairs to No. 27 at the same time that he repaired the other houses, and for this purpose he on several dates entered by his agent on the premises with the knowledge of the defendant. On one occasion he also did some internal repairs. There was no evidence that on any of these occasions the defendant's consent was asked, or that the repairs were done against her will. He also paid the water rates, the property tax, and the water premiums.

On the 30th of July, 1897, the said John Snaith died, leaving by his will his houses in Walnut-street to trustees in trust for the plaintiff, his step-daughter, for life, with remainders over. The trustees applied to the defendant for rent in respect of No. 27, which she refused to pay.

The plaintiff thereupon brought the present action. The defendant pleaded a statutory title to the premises. The learned county court judge found as follows:

(1) That the relation of landlord and tenant did not exist between John Snaith and the defendant; that John Snaith was at times in actual and at all other times in constructive possession of the house throughout the period in question, and that the defendant's occupation was not exclusive, and was that of a licensee and not of a tenant; that the fact that she was rated as being the person in apparent occupation and paid the occupier's rates was not conclusive that she occupied as tenant, and that the present case was in principle similar to that of Peakin v. Peakin, [1895] 2 Ir. Rep. 359, 43 W. R. Dig. 99.

(2) That, assuming that the defendant occupied the house as tenant at will, such tenancy was determined every time the landlord entered the premises to do repairs, as he was not under any contract to repair and did not ask or obtain permission from the defendant to enter the premises for the purpose, but entered by his agents and workmen of his own motion and in exercise of his right to resume possession whenever he thought proper; that sending workmen on to the premises and doing repairs thereon was more than a "mere entry," such as is referred to in section 10 of the Act of Will. 4. That during the occupation by the landlord's workmen the defendant had no exclusive possession; and that on each withdrawal of the landlord's agents a new tenancy at will or on sufferance commenced by implied grant.

(3) That the defendant, by allowing John Snaith to enter and lay out money on the premises as his property without protest, and by requesting him (on at least one occasion) to do repairs to the house as owner thereof, is estopped from setting up that at those times the Statute of Limitations was running in her favour.

The learned judge therefore gave judgment for the plaintiff for possession and mesne profits.

After judgment had been given, but before it was entered, the judge, upon application by the plaintiff, amended the parties by adding the trustees of John Snaith's will, in whom was vested the legal estate in the premises, as plaintiffs, under ord. 16, rr. 2, 11, of the Rules of the Supreme Court.

The defendant appealed.

The Real Property Limitation Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27), provides as follows:

Section 7.—"Where any person shall be in possession . . . of any land . . . as tenant at will, the right of the person entitled subject thereto or of the person through whom he claims . . . to bring an action to recover such land . . . shall be deemed to have first accrued either at the determination of such tenancy or at the expiration of one year next after the commencement of such tenancy, at which time such tenancy shall be deemed to have determined."

Section 10.—"No person shall be deemed to have been in possession of any land within the meaning of this Act merely by reason of having made an entry thereon."

By section 1 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 57), the entry must be made, or the action brought, within twelve years after the right first accrues.

Montague Lush, for the appellant.—The learned county court judge was wrong. The case of Peakin v. Peakin, on which he relied, is not on all fours with this case. The defendant here has acquired a statutory title under section 7 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833. Doe d. Dayman v. Moore, 9 Q. B. 555, which was similar to the present case, is an authority on this point. In order to prevent the statute from operating the landlord must enter, asserting his right to enter: Turner v. Bennett, 9 M. & W. 643; in the present case he entered for the benefit of the occupier and with her license. She has here become by the operation of the Real Property Limitation Acts of 1833 and 1874 the owner of the premises. As to the question raised upon the joining of the trustees as plaintiffs after judgment had been delivered the learned judge was wrong. He had no longer jurisdiction to do so under ord. 16, r. 11, as the judgment was final and the matter had become res judicata: The Duke of Buccleuch, 40 W. R. 455, [1892] P. 201.

Corner, for the respondent.—The decision of the learned judge was right. His findings are conclusive. There was no evidence that the occupier was in exclusive possession. She was not a tenant of the house; she was there as a guest. There was no such possession as to justify the setting up of the statute. If she was a tenant she was only a tenant at will, and that tenancy was determined whenever the landlord entered. He took possession when he so entered: Kingston Race Stand v. Kingston Corporation, [1897] A. C. 509, 46 W. R. Dig. 36. As to the other question, the case of The Duke of Buccleuch is in favour of the contention that the learned judge here acted within his jurisdiction in adding the trustees as plaintiffs. Fry, L.J., in that case says, at p. 212: "It has been argued that the rules do not apply after final judgment. They apply, in my opinion, as long as anything remains to be done in the case." That was the case here, as judgment had not been entered.

Lush replied.

LAWRANCE, J.—The question in this case is whether the defendant was a tenant at will. The facts of the case show that she was allowed by the testator, her father-in-law, to take possession of this house, and that she remained there for more than twelve years. During that period she paid no rent. She, however, paid the rates and did the internal repairs. The house in question is one of a row of houses, and when outside repairs were required to be done to them the defendant's house was repaired by the testator together with the others. He also rendered her assistance in other ways. An action is now brought to recover possession of this house, and the question raised is whether the plaintiff's right to recover is statute-barred. What must we infer from the evidence? I think the proper inference to draw is that the testator allowed the defendant to live rent free, that he gave her assistance, and that he effected repairs to this house as he did to the other premises. What condition, then, was the defendant in? I am of opinion that she was a tenant at will. The testator could have terminated the tenancy at any time. It has been argued that when the testator entered in order to do repairs he terminated the tenancy. I do not think such entry in any way determined the tenancy. The entry was not contrary to the defendant's wish, nor was it effected in such a way that the testator could have been sued as a trespasser. He entered, not in order to take possession, but in order to do a kindness to the defendant. There is no evidence to support the finding of the learned judge, and I think he was wrong and that the appeal must be allowed.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. On the merits of the case I think judgment should have been given for the defendant. Therefore it is not necessary to decide the point as to the amendment of the parties. My opinion, however, is that the amendment was not made too late. The case was not disposed of until judgment was entered, and in the words of Fry, L.J., there was still something to do. The other point is clear when the Real Property Limitation Act of 1833 is looked at. There was an actual possession by the occupier, and not a constructive possession by the owner. Probably under the old law the defendant's possession would have been held to be not adverse, but the doctrine of non-adverse possession has been swept away by the Act of 1833. In that Act there is an express provision as to tenancies at will—namely, in section 7, where it is provided that the tenancy shall begin to run in favour of the tenant at the expiration of the first year of the tenancy. The facts of this case show that there clearly was a tenancy at will. There was an actual possession, and the possession was that of the occupier and not of the owner. That being so, the county court judge was wrong upon that point.

In an action of ejectment the burden of proof is on the plaintiff. Therefore the burden lies on the plaintiff to prove here that the testator when he did the repairs took possession of the premises. There is, however, no proof that his entry in order to do the repairs was against the will of the tenant in possession. In fact no objection was made. The doing of the outside repairs by the testator is quite consistent with the continuation of the defendant's tenancy. In the case of Turner v. Bennett there was an actual objection, and therein lies the difference between that case and the present one.

If it could have been shown that the defendant did the internal repairs under an obligation to the owner I think the case would probably be taken out of the statute, as that obligation might be held to be equivalent to paying rent. But that is not so here. I do not think Peakin v. Peakin is in point.

RITCHIE (Appellant) v. LARSEN (Respondent). (a.)

Ship—Seaman—Agreement with the crew—Foreign port where there is a British consular officer—Advance note for more than one month's wages—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 113-115, 124, 140.

When a seaman is engaged abroad before a British consular officer, as provided by section 124 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, the provisions enacted by section 140 relative to agreements with the crew and the restrictions as to advance notes do not apply.

Special case stated by justices for county borough of Swansea.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 27th of July, 1898, a complaint was made to the said justices that the respondent having entered into an agreement in writing at Talcahuano to serve as a seaman on board the British ship "Melville Island" (of which ship the appellant was the master) on her voyage from Talcahuano to Swansea at the wages of £3 per month, and having duly performed the services required by the agreement, the sum of £2 6s. 8d. was due to the respondent as and for a balance of wages, and that the appellant had neglected to pay him that sum.

The facts may shortly be stated thus: The respondent joined the British ship "Melville Island" as an A.B. at Talcahuano, a nitrate port in Peru, and signed articles there before the British consul. He received no money at Talcahuano, but an advance note dated Talcahuano, the 30th of March, 1898, was given him by the appellant and was as follows:

"I promise to pay to the order of Ingerval Larsen, seaman, shipped in the British ship Melville Island, of Glasgow, the sum of four pounds ten shillings twenty-four hours after the sailing of the said vessel from this port, providing said man proceeds to sea as per agreement.—G. L. RITCHIE, Master."

The master also paid 16s. 8d. on the sailor's account and under his authority in writing.

On the termination of the voyage at Swansea the appellant claimed to deduct these two sums (i.e., the sum of £1 10s. being the excess over the month's wages of £3, and the sum of 16s. 4d.) from what was due to the respondent, who objected to this being done on the ground that, by the combined operation of sections 124 and 140 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, the appellant was precluded from relying on that advance except to the extent of £3, the amount of one month's wages.

The justices were of opinion that the sums of £1 10s. and 16s. 8d., making together the sum of £2 6s. 8d., should forthwith be paid by the appellant to the respondent, together with the respondent's costs.

On the application of the master (the appellant) a case was stated for the opinion of the High Court.

J. A. Hamilton, in support of the appeal.—Section 140 restricts the amount of advance notes, but that section only applies to seamen engaged in and going to sea from any port in the United Kingdom. It does not apply to the engagement of seamen in colonial and foreign ports, and section 124 ought not to be read with section 140. The master can therefore deduct the full amount advanced to the seaman.

Montague Lush, for the respondent.—The Justices were right. The seaman having been engaged abroad at a port at which there was a British consular officer, before whom the respondent entered into this agreement, the provisions of section 124 applied, and the engagement, although made abroad, must be treated as one made with the crew in the United Kingdom and subject to the same restrictions as to advances as provided by section 1, sub-section (a) of section 140. By sub-section 2 of that section any other agreement "by or on behalf of the employer of a seaman for the payment of money to or on behalf of the seaman conditionally on his going to sea from any port in the United Kingdom shall be void, and any money in satisfaction or in respect of any such agreement shall not be deducted from the seaman's wages. . . ." The advance to the sailor above the amount of one month's wages could not be recovered under the advance note.

CHANNELL, J.—In this case I have been asked to deliver the judgment of the court and I do not hesitate to do so, having formed a very clear opinion of the construction that ought to be put upon the material sections of this Act for the purpose of deciding the present argument. I think that apart from any considerations as to the probable intention of the Legislature, and looking only at the language of the Act itself, the construction adopted by the magistrates is clearly wrong. The material sections are section 113-115, 124, and 140, and I will refer to them in that order.

Section 113 refers to agreements with the crew, and enacts that "the master of every ship, except ships" of a class which I will call small coasting vessels, "shall enter into an agreement with every seaman whom he carries to sea as one of his crew from any port in the United Kingdom." By section 114 (i.) an agreement with the crew shall be in a form approved by the Board of Trade, and by sub-section 3 of that section the agreement with the crew shall be so framed as to admit of such stipulations to be adopted at the will of the master and seaman in each case, whether respecting the advance and allotment of wages or otherwise, as are not contrary to law. To my mind section 115 is very important; it commences as follows: "The following provisions shall have effect with respect to the agreements with the crew made in the United Kingdom in the case of foreign-going ships registered either within or without the United Kingdom." And goes on to provide for the agreement being made in the presence of a person called the superintendent, and contains a considerable number of other provisions, all on the face of them applying to agreements made in the United Kingdom, and incapable without modification of being applied to agreements made elsewhere because they must be made before a person who is only an officer in the United Kingdom.

The next section to be considered is section 124, which says that with respect to the engagement of seamen abroad the following provisions shall have effect: "Where the master of a ship engages a seaman in any British possession other than that in which the ship is registered, or at a port in which there is a British consular officer, the provisions of this Act respecting engagements with the crew made in the United Kingdom shall apply, subject to the following modifications:" Now, it is quite clear that the agreements referred to there relate to agreements made in the United Kingdom, and primarily this section was intended to be read with section 115, which begins by saying that its provisions shall have effect with respect to agreements with the crew made in the United Kingdom. You find, moreover, that the modifications introduced by section 124 are necessary modifications clearly relating to the provisions of section 115 when the circumstances are so changed that a modification is necessary. While, as I have said, the applying of section 115 to agreements made abroad was the main object section 124 was to effect, I do not say that it was the exclusive object. The effect of it is that agreements are to be made on the engagement of seamen in a British possession other than that in which the ship is registered or at a port in which there is a British consular officer, in the same way as in the case of agreements made in the United Kingdom, with the necessary modifications.

Then we have to consider section 140, upon which the present case mainly turns. The first part of the section is in these words: "Where an agreement with the crew is required to be made in a form approved by the Board of Trade, the agreement may contain a stipulation for payment to or on behalf of the seaman, conditionally on his going to sea in pursuance of the agreement, of a sum not exceeding the amount of one month's wages payable to the seaman under the agreement." Mr. Lush argued that this restriction on advance notes was not restricted to agreements with the crew made in the United Kingdom, but its provisions applied to certain British possessions and foreign ports where there was a British consular officer. So they do; but only two specified cases: "Save as aforesaid," the section in sub-section 2 continues, "an agreement by or on behalf of the employer of a seaman for the payment of money to or on behalf of the seaman conditionally on his going to sea from any port in the United Kingdom shall be void, and any money paid in satisfaction or in respect of any such agreement shall not be deducted from the seaman's wages. And a person shall not have any right of action, suit, or set-off against the seaman or his assignee in respect of any money so paid or purporting to have been so paid." It does not say that any other agreement for a conditional advance to a seaman is void. If there were no provision following the enabling enactment, expressly prohibiting advances of larger amount it would probably be right when construing this section to read into it an implied prohibition against larger advances. But if you find, as here, a clause following forbidding advances in certain cases, that, in my judgment, negatives there being any implied prohibition in other cases not referred to in the section. In the case we are now considering the only thing prohibited is what is expressly prohibited. That is contained in the sub-section (2) which I have just read, commencing "Save as aforesaid." I do not think it is necessary to read the prohibiting clause as co-extensive with the enabling clause. This sub-section 2 does not extend to cases where the seaman is going to sea from any port not in the United Kingdom. I think Mr. Lush was wrong when he argued that section 124 made it apply; and whether it applied to the case of small coasting vessels, as he would have us read the section, appears to me to be a question not before us now, and therefore one that we need not decide. If it had been intended so to apply it a modification of the words "in the United Kingdom" would have been necessary. There is nothing unreasonable about that. On the contrary it seems to me it is a reasonable meaning to place on the language used. If the other meaning is to be applied, then, as Mr. Hamilton pointed out, a clause (c) might be necessary. But there is no clause whatever which limits the modification to ships from the ports of the United Kingdom. There is no implied forbidding clause. It is perfectly clear that this case is not covered by this section, and if you go outside the words of the section and say that the intention of the Legislature ought to be considered, and say that it is perfectly clear that it was the intention of the Legislature in this way to carry out the forbidding of advance notes above one month's wages, whether given to a member of the crew in a ship sailing from the United Kingdom or to a sailor shipped at a foreign consular port, all I can say is that the words, in my judgment, do not admit of that construction.

Therefore, if the words of the sections in point are alone looked at, it is clear that the decision of the magistrates is wrong. I think, moreover, that consideration of the probable intention of the Legislature really supports the view I have just expressed, because a seaman might otherwise be detained in a foreign port for a debt incurred exceeding one month's wages, and therefore if the Act is to be read as prohibiting the advance of more than a month's pay, he might never be able to get away from a foreign port at all. There is no doubt that these restrictions as to advance notes were intended to deal with the practices of a class of persons known as "crimps," who infest the sea-ports of the United Kingdom. It was said that the Legislature having taken so much care to protect the seaman against "crimps," would certainly intend to afford him the same protection at least when stranded at some foreign port. But the same considerations obviously do not apply to sailors engaged at foreign ports, because the Legislature has not the same power to enforce regulations in a foreign country as in England or her dependencies. For the reasons I have given I feel no doubt whatever that is the proper construction to place upon the statute. The order of the justices must therefore be quashed, and the appeal allowed with costs both here and below.

LAWRANCE, J.—I merely desire to say I concur in the judgment that has been delivered.

KNIGHTS DEEP (LIMITED) (Appellants) v. THE COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE (Respondents). (a.)

Inland Revenue—Stamp duty — Debenture — Right to redeem debenture on paying a premium—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 86, Schedule I.

A limited company issued a series of debentures of £100 each, and each debenture stated that the company would, at certain specified dates, pay to the registered holder the sum of £100, with interest at £5 10s. per cent., and one of the conditions indorsed on the debentures was that the company might, after the 1st of July, 1900, on giving six months' notice to the registered holder, redeem any debenture at £103, before the time fixed for payment. The debentures were marketable securities not transferable by delivery within the meaning of Schedule I. of the Stamp Act, 1891.

Held, that each debenture was a security for £103, and not for £100 only, and ought, therefore, to be stamped as a mortgage for £103, as required by Schedule I. of the Stamp Act, 1891.

Case stated by Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

A debenture was presented on behalf of the issuers thereof- the Knights Deep (Limited). the appellants —to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for the opinion of the commissioners as to the stamp duty with which the instrument was chargeable.

The instrument in question was a first debenture for £100 issued by the Knights Deep (Limited), incorporated under the laws of the South African Republic. The share capital was £550,000 divided into 550,000 shares of £1 each, and there was an issue of £400,000 debentures in 4,000 debentures of £100 each, carrying interest at the rate of £5 10s. per cent. per annum, all ranking equally in security.

The debenture stated that "for valuable consideration already received the Knights Deep (Limited) (herein called the company) will, as and when the principal moneys hereby secured become payable in accordance with the conditions indorsed hereon, pay to the Simmer and Jack Proprietary Mines (Limited), of 8, Old Jewry, E.C., or other the registered holder for the time being hereof, the sum of £100. The company will in the meantime until such payment pay interest thereon at the rate of £5 10s. per cent. per annum by half-yearly payments on every 1st day of July and 1st day of January. This debenture is subject to the conditions indorsed hereon which are to be deemed part of it."

The conditions indorsed on the debenture showed that the debenture was one of a series of debentures for securing principal sums amounting in the aggregate to £400,000, carrying interest at the rate of £5 10s., and that they were all to rank pari passu in point of charge without any preference or priority one over another; that debentures of the nominal value of £26,000 would be redeemed by the company on the 1st day of July, 1902, and on each succeeding 1st day of July up to and including the first day of July, 1917, when the balance then outstanding should be redeemed; that the debentures to be redeemed should be determined by annual drawings, which the company would cause to be made at its branch office in London or at such other place as the company should determine; and that such drawings should be made not less than twenty-one or more than sixty days before the respective yearly days on which the debentures were to be redeemed, and the principal moneys hereby secured should become payable on the 1st of July next after this debenture should have been drawn for redemption.

Condition No. 17 endorsed on the debenture provided:

"The company may at any time after the 1st of July, 1900, redeem this debenture at £103 on giving six calender months' previous notice in writing so to do to the registered holder, and upon the expiration of such notice the said sum of £103 shall become payable as if the same was the amount of the principal moneys secured and shall thereupon cease to carry interest. Provided always that the company shall not without the consent of the registered holder be at liberty to give such notice unless concurrently it shall give due notice to redeem in like manner all the then outstanding debentures of the said series."

The appellants were a foreign company, and the debenture, which bore date the 8th of October, 1898, was made and issued by them in the United Kingdom and was capable of being sold in a stock market of the United Kingdom. In these circumstances it was admitted that the debenture fell within division (b) of the following head of charge in the first schedule of the Stamp Act, 1891—namely, "Marketable Security. (1) Marketable security (a) being a Colonial Government security, or (b) being a security not transferable by delivery, or (c) being a security transferable by delivery and bearing date or signed or offered for subscription before or on the 6th of August, 1885.

"For or in respect of the money thereby secured. } "The same ad valorem duty according to the nature of the security as upon a mortgage."

The commissioners were of opinion that the money thereby secured within the meaning of the said head of charge was the sum of £103, and accordingly assessed the instrument as liable to a duty of 3s. 9d., being the duty payable on a mortgage of that amount.

The appellants contended that the money thereby secured was £100 only, and that the duty under the said head of charge was 2s. 6d. only.

The questions for the opinion of the court were—(1) whether the instrument is chargeable with the duty of 3s. 9d. in accordance with the assessment of the commissioners; (2) if not, with what duty the instrument is chargeable.

Scrutton, for the appellants.—The money secured by the debenture was £100 only, and the proper stamp duty was 2s. 6d., as upon a mortgage securing £100. When this debenture was presented to the commissioners for their opinion as to the duty payable thereon, the company had not, and could not have, exercised the option given by the 17th condition, so that at that time the debenture could not have been a security for £103. Condition No. 17 gave the company a right to redeem at an earlier date than they would otherwise have been entitled to redeem, and the £3 which was to be paid if the company exercised their right under the condition was a payment over and above the £100 expressed to be secured by the debenture in consideration of their right to redeem at an earlier date. The interest is just as much secured by the debenture as this £3, and therefore if the £3 is to come within the sum secured by the debenture, so also would the interest come within that sum; but the case of Barker v. Smark, 7 M. & W. 590, conclusively shows that interest does not come within the sum secured by the debenture for the purposes of the Stamp Acts, and therefore the £3 does not come within the sum "thereby secured."

He referred to Rowell v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, [1897] 2 Q. B. 194, 45 W. R. Dig. 71.

Sir Robert Finlay, S.G. (Danckwerts with him), for the respondents.—The commissioners were right in requiring the debenture to be stamped as a mortgage for £103. As soon as the notice referred to in condition 17 is given the instrument becomes a security—not for £100 only, but for £103. The amount secured by or to be ultimately recoverable under the debenture is (excluding interest) limited to £103, and the debenture must be stamped on that amount according to section 88 (1) of the Act.

WILLS, J.—Upon the whole, though the case is not free from difficulty or doubt, I have come to the conclusion that the Crown are right. I wish, in the first place, to state my view as to what this instrument is. As far as the mortgage is concerned—that is to say, as far as that part of the instrument is concerned which pledges the assets of the company, the security did not extend to the extra £3, which was to be payable only in a certain event. That, however, does not settle the question. If we look at the parts of the schedule which deal with the words "bond, covenant or instrument," and also with the parts which deal with "mortgage, bond, debenture, covenant, and warrant of attorney," I think it is plain that "security," is used in a sense which embraces them all in each place, and therefore, unless there is some good reason to the contrary, I should suppose that when "security" is used in the expression "marketable security," it is meant to have the same wide and comprehensive meaning; and the fact that it is, as I think, in respect of the £3, merely a covenant to pay in certain events, does not prevent it being a security within the meaning of the schedule of this taxing Act. If so, it is, as I think, a security in certain events for £103, because there is undoubtedly a definite engagement, if a notice be given within six calendar months, to pay £103. That is an unqualified obligation when once the six months' notice has been given, and therefore in a certain contingency there is a covenant to pay £103. That would have been sufficient to settle the question but for a thing that has perplexed myself certainly—that is, that I was very much struck with the argument on behalf of the appellants, that there was just as much a covenant to pay the interest as there was to pay the principal. Undoubtedly there is, and there is no use in shrinking from that fact; but it is quite clear—looking at the definition of mortgage given in section 86 of the Act, and the definition in Barker v. Smark—that in the language of statutes of this kind a mortgage was supposed to represent the principal sum, and the money which is inserted in the schedule of the mortgage is supposed to represent only the principal sum secured by it. That was so held at a time when there was no possibility of curing a stamp objection, when it would here been fatal under the Act, and the unreasonable consequences of such a state of things must have had their operation upon the courts which from time to time had to decide the question. The result of the special expressions which are used in that part of the schedule which relates to "bond, covenant, or instrument," and in section 86, is that interest has been excluded from the computation for the purpose of taxation, and that the view which was entertained by the court in Barker v. Smark has received legislative sanction. The reasoning may have satisfied the court in that and in previous cases, but it does not satisfy me. So far as mere words are concerned I cannot see why a covenant to pay interest is not just as much a covenant to pay a sum of money as any covenant to pay the principal, and why the interest should not come in as well as the principal. But when once the contrary has been decided, and when that view of the court has been adopted by the Legislature, and sanctioned by these express enactments, it is no use going back to inquire whether the reasoning was satisfactory or not.

Nevertheless, I do not feel disposed to adopt that view and apply it to a subject-matter which seems to me to stand upon a very different footing—that is, this £3. If there had been no absolute undertaking on the part of the company to to pay that £3 in a certain event, the case would have been different from the present case, and there might have been much more ground for arguing that there was no kind of obligation imposed upon the company in any event to pay it, and if there were no kind of obligation imposed upon the company in any event to pay it, my present impression is that it could not have been brought under the words "covenant" or "security" for that sum of money. That, however, is not the case here, because upon the company giving the notice—that is to say, upon the happening of a contingency which is purely within their power to bring about—there is an absolute and positive promise to pay. It seems to me, therefore, that, according to the decision in Rowell v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, it is a security within the meaning of the Stamp Act and the schedule to it, and if that be so, it follows that it is a security in a contingency for £103. If so, it must be subject to the higher rate of taxation.

BRUCE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The principal money secured is £100, but in a certain event the sum of £3 becomes payable in addition to the £100. If and when the £3 becomes payable, it is to be the same, according to the conditions, as if it were part of the principal sum. Therefore the £3, if the event happen, becomes secured in the sense that it is included in the covenant to pay. Then why is not duty payable on the £3 so secured? It is said that it is only subject to a condition, that it becomes payable. The fact that it is only on the happening of a certain event that it becomes payable makes no distinction in the case. Then it was said that interest is secured by the debenture, and yet duty is not payable upon interest. With reference to that, it has been established by a series of decisions that interest is not to be regarded as money secured by the instrument for the purpose of settling the amount of duty.

I do not see that we can say that this £3, that is to be payable by way of premium, is in the nature of interest. I think, therefore, we must hold that the Crown are right in their contention and are entitled to the higher duty.

PERRINS v. BELLAMY. (a.)

Trustee—Breach of trust—Sale of leaseholds—No power of sale—Judicial Trustees Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 35), s. 3.

Where trustees of a settlement which did not contain a power of sale had, in the bonâ fide belief that they possessed such a power, advantageously sold leaseholds which formed part of the trust estate,

Held, that under section 3 of the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896, they were entitled to be relieved from personal liability to make good the diminution of income sustained by the tenant for life in consequence of the sale.

Decision of Kekewich, J., 46 W. R. 682, affirmed.

Appeal against a decision of Kekewich, J., 46 W. R. 682.

By an indenture of settlement dated the 23rd of October, 1879, Elijah Barnett assigned to trustees (inter alia) certain leasehold houses situated at Edgbaston for the respective residues then unexpired (which ranged from fifty-two to seventy-three years) of the several terms of years under which the premises were then held, upon trust after his death, to pay the income thereof to his wife Charlotte Barnett for her life, and after her death to his daughters, the defendant Eliza Barnett and the plaintiff Alice Mary Perrins, during their lives, in equal shares, and after the death of one of them to pay the income of her share to her children as therein directed until the death of the survivor of them, and in case there should be no child of the daughter first dying then upon trust to pay the whole income to the survivor of them for her life, and after the death of the survivor upon trust to stand possessed of the trust estate and the proceeds thereof for the children of his daughters as therein directed. The settlement contained no power to the trustees to sell the leasehold property.

Alice Mary Perrins was married to F. H. Perrins on the 9th of September, 1880, and there were two infant children of the marriage now living. The defendant Eliza Barnett was not married. Elijah Barnett died on the 10th of February, 1888, and Charlotte Barnett on the 26th of February, 1895. On the 10th of May, 1895, the trustees of the settlement offered for sale by public auction at Birmingham, in eleven lots, the whole of the leasehold premises comprised in the settlement. On hearing of the intended sale, Mrs. Perrins wrote to the trustees, objecting to it as a breach of trust. The purchasers of nine of the lots completed, but an objection was taken with regard to the remaining two lots that the trustees had no power of sale, and upon a vendor and purchaser summons Kekewich, J., upheld the objection. An action was then brought by Mrs. Perrins and her two infant children, by their father as next friend, as plaintiffs, against the trustees of the settlement and Eliza Barnett as defendants. By their statement of claim the plaintiffs alleged that the trustees had committed a breach of trust in selling the leasehold property when they had no power of sale; that the property was sold contrary to the expressed desire of the plaintiff Alice Mary Perrins; that the property was situate in a good position and let to good tenants at good rentals, and ought to have been retained in the interests of the trust estate; that the trustees had committed a breach of trust in not paying the proper amount of income to Mrs. Perrins, and that the trust estate had been reduced in value by the alleged breaches of trust, and the income of Mrs. Perrins greatly reduced thereby. The plaintiffs claimed (1) a declaration that the defendant trustees had been guilty of a breach of trust in selling the leasehold premises; (2) an inquiry as to the loss accrued to the trust estate and to Mrs. Perrins by reason of such breach; and (3) that the defendant trustees might be ordered to make good to the trust estate all such loss. The plaintiffs also asked for the removal of the trustees, and delivery of proper accounts, and the execution of the trusts of the settlement by the court so far as might be necessary.

In their defence the trustees admitted that they had no express power of sale under the settlement, but alleged that they had an implied power. They denied that the property was let at good rentals, that it should have been retained in the interest of the trust estate, and that they sold contrary to the desire of Mrs. Perrins. They further contended that if they had committed a breach of trust in selling the property they had acted honestly and reasonably, and ought fairly, under section 3 of the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896, to be excused.

Kekewich, J., held that the trustees had committed a breach of trust in selling, but were under the Act entitled to be relieved from liability.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and G. E. Tyrrell, for the appeal.

Warrington, Q.C., and S. B. L. Druce, for the trustees, were not called upon.

LINDLEY, M.R.—I do not think there is any ground whatever for differing from the view taken by the learned judge in the court below of the application to this case of the extremely beneficial enactment which is contained in section 3 of the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 35). That there has been a breach of trust in this case is obvious to any lawyer who has gone through the documents and attended to the evidence. But what does it all really come to? You have a voluntary settlement of some leaseholds, which the settlor settled first on himself for his life, then on his wife for her life, and then on his two daughters for their lives, and afterwards gave to the children of those two daughters. That disposition is expanded in the settlement itself, of which I do not think it necessary to give the details, because nothing turns upon them. It contained no clause authorizing the settlor to revoke or vary the provisions then made, and it gave no power to the trustees to sell these leaseholds, although there is in it such language as upon a hasty glance might mislead

* In a second case—The Knights Deep (Limited) (No. 2) (Appellants) v. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue (Respondents)—where the conditions of the debenture were in all respects the same as in the previous case, except that the debenture was payable to "bearer," the court held that the same principle applied.

anyone into thinking that such a power of sale was given. The settlor himself afterwards found out that defect, and sought to remedy it, for in October, 1892, he executed a deed giving the trustees a power of sale. We know, of course, that, the settlement being what it was, he could not make that alteration; but it would not, perhaps, strike everybody as obvious that he had no power to do so. That, however, is undoubtedly the law. No breach of trust was committed so long as the settlor lived or so long as his widow lived. The widow died in February, 1895. Then a considerable sum for payment of estate duty had to be raised, and the question arose how best to raise it. That matter, very naturally, took the trustees to their solicitors, and having talked with the solicitors not only about the sum of £600 which had to be raised for payment of estate duty, but also about the trust property generally, they were advised that they had a power of sale over the leaseholds. That, I agree, was a mistake made by the solicitors, who at the moment took a wrong view as to the construction of the settlement, and as to the effect of the deed of October, 1892. The solicitors thought that by the joint operation of those two deeds a power of sale of the leaseholds was conferred on the trustees, and they told their clients so. The trustees then obtained a report on the property from a professional surveyor, and they got a report condemning the state of the property as very unsatisfactory; saying, in substance, that it was a very undesirable property for trustees to hold. Thereupon the solicitors advised a sale of the leaseholds, and a sale in lots took place accordingly. Ultimately, as it turned out, two of the purchasers took alarm about the vendors' power to sell, and objected to complete. A vendor and purchaser summons was taken out, and it was held—rightly or wrongly, I must presume rightly—that the vendors had no power to sell, and that those purchasers who objected could not be compelled to complete. A good many of the purchasers of lots, however, were prepared to take the risk, or were satisfied that there was a power of sale in the trustees. There certainly was power in the trustees to sell so much as was necessary for the purpose of raising the £600. But as to two or three of the houses the objection was taken that they had no power of sale.

It is important to bear in mind at present that Mrs. Perrins was quite aware of the advertisement of the property for sale, which was published on the 17th of March, 1895, and that she then objected to the sale as a breach of trust. The trustees gave her the answer in Mr. Bellamy's letter of the 17th of April, 1895, and the sale did not take place until the 10th of May, 1895. If Mrs. Perrins had wished to prevent this sale from going through, it was quite open to her to commence an action against the trustees to stop it; but no writ at all was issued by her until the 11th of May, 1897, when she seeks (now joining her husband and children as co-plaintiffs) to get rid of the trustees, and also to make them liable for the loss of income which she has suffered. She has in fact lost part of her income. Before the Act of 1896 I suppose she would have succeeded in making these unfortunate trustees liable for that loss. That was certainly a very hard state of the law; a state of the law which shocked one's sense of humanity and sense of fairness. That matter was brought to the attention of the Legislature, and Parliament relaxed—deliberately relaxed—the requirements of the law. [His lordship read section 3, and proceeded:] That is to say, the Act throws upon the court the extremely difficult and responsible task of saying that a trustee has committed a breach of trust, but that, at the same time, having regard to the fact that he has acted honestly and reasonably, it is not a case in which he ought to be held responsible to make good the loss which has been sustained. Now, in the present case the honesty of the trustees is plain; the reasonableness of their conduct, also, is absolutely plain when you consider the facts to which I have alluded. As to their not applying to the court for advice, the answer to the argument founded upon that, is obvious enough. It is said that they ought to have applied to the court, if not before, at all events when some of the purchasers raised the objection that the settlement conferred no power of sale. Suppose the trustees had so applied, what could the court have done for them? I do not see what they could have gained by such an application, except that they would probably have had the costs of it to pay. It is clear that they had got themselves into a scrape, and the court could not have got them out of that scrape. I do not see that the trustees did anything unreasonable in completing the purchases with those of the purchasers who were willing to take the title as it was. Of course they had to submit to the consequences of having entered into invalid contracts of sale with those purchasers who objected to the title and refused to complete.

If this is not a case to which the Act of 1896 applies, I cannot conceive one which would come within it. There is on the trustees' part honesty, reasonableness, prudence—everything which there could be in their favour, except, unfortunately, that they have committed a breach of trust; and it is a breach of trust which has no evil consequence. In fact, it was a most judicious breach of trust, if you look at the interests of the reversioners as well as those of the tenant for life. This appears to me to be precisely one of those cases in which we are bound by the Act of 1896 to say that the trustees are entitled to the protection given by section 3, and ought to be excused for their breach of trust. The appeal, therefore, must be dismissed with costs.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I remember in my early days at the bar when an inadvertent breach of trust, involving no moral blame at all, still was visited upon the trustees. They were told that the Court of Chancery was always open to them, and that if they would incur the risk of acting without the direction of the court they must take the consequences. That was the only excuse given for the state of the law; and I can remember very very hard cases against trustees—cases which shocked the conscience. But now trustees are not entitled as of course to take the opinion of the court. They cannot now get rid of their liability by consulting the court, for they cannot now, except at the risk of having to pay the costs of the proceedings, approach the court at all; so that there is now no possible excuse left for those old decisions which were, in many cases, so hard upon trustees. In the Act of 1896, among other things against which trustees are to be protected, come the very words, "omitting to obtain the direction of the court."

When the defendants went to their solicitors they were advised that they had a power of sale. Whether the solicitors said in so many words, "We advise you that you have a power of sale," or simply allowed them to go on, on the assumption that they had such a power, makes, to my mind, no difference at all. The deed was of a nature to impress persons who had not very carefully considered it with the belief that there was a power of sale. The document of 1892 gave that power in so many words expressly and clearly, and I presume the people who drew that deed thought its provisions of importance. The trustees took all that into consideration, and thought that they had a power of sale. As regards the first proposal to purchase five (I think it was) of the seventeen houses, the doubt does not appear to have entered the mind of anyone. The trustees' solicitors told them that they ought to get the opinion of a competent surveyor upon the property, and to act on that opinion.

I think this is certainly a case in which the trustees have acted reasonably, and ought fairly to be excused for their breach of trust; and that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree, and cannot usefully add anything to what has been said.

Appeal dismissed.

POWELL v. MARSHALL, PARKES, & CO. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Bankruptcy—Protected transaction—Notice of act of bankruptcy—Act of bankruptcy by vendor after contract and before date for completion—Payment after notice of act of bankruptcy—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 49.

The plaintiff entered into a contract to purchase a public-house, the purchase to be completed within four weeks, and paid a deposit. By the contract the deposit was to be forfeited in case of neglect or refusal on the part of the purchaser to perform his part of the contract, and to be returned in case of such neglect or refusal on the part of the vendor. Before the expiration of the four weeks the vendor committed an act of bankruptcy. The plaintiff thereupon gave notice refusing to complete the purchase and requiring the deposit to be returned. The vendor never in fact became bankrupt.

Held, that, as the plaintiff had at the date fixed for completion notice of an available act of bankruptcy, payment of the purchase-money to the vendor would not have been protected by section 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, in the event of the vendor's bankruptcy upon a petition presented within three months of the act of bankruptcy, and the vendor was not in a position to complete the purchase by executing a conveyance and giving a good receipt for the purchase-money; and that the plaintiff was accordingly entitled to the return of the deposit.

Appeal from the judgment of Wills, J., in favour of the plaintiff, at the trial of the action with a special jury.

The action was brought for the return of a deposit paid upon an agreement for the purchase of the lease of a licensed house.

By the agreement, which was dated the 17th of November, 1897, and made between the plaintiff as the purchaser, and the defendants acting on behalf of one Inman as the vendor, the latter agreed, in consideration of the sum of £500 paid by the purchaser to the defendants as stakeholders by way of deposit, and of the further sum of £6,250 to be paid to the vendor upon possession being given to the purchaser, to assign to the purchaser the lease of the licensed house and the goodwill thereof for the remainder of the term, and to deliver up possession on or before the 15th of December, 1897. It was further provided that the £500 deposit was to be forfeited in case the purchaser should neglect or refuse to perform his part of the agreement, but to be returned in case such neglect or refusal should arise on the part of the vendor.

On the 24th of November, 1897, a bankruptcy notice under section 4, sub-section 1 (g), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, was served on Inman, who failed to comply with the requirements thereof within the seven days and thereby committed an act of bankruptcy. The plaintiff, having heard of the act of bankruptcy, on the 9th of December gave notice that he refused to complete the purchase and that he required the return of the deposit; but this was refused. The plaintiff thereupon sued the defendants, as the stakeholders, to recover the deposit. Wills, J., held that the possibility of the vendor being adjudicated bankrupt upon a petition presented within three months of the act of bankruptcy prevented the vendor from completing, and that the plaintiff could therefore recover the deposit; and he directed judgment to be entered for the plaintiff.

Robert Wallace, Q.C., and J. W. S. Kay, for the defendants.—The contract of the 17th of November was a contract entered into for valuable consideration before any act of bankruptcy was committed, and therefore was protected by section 49 (d) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The contract being protected, it is valid to all intents and purposes, and any payment made thereunder or a conveyance executed in pursuance thereof is protected. If the contract cannot be carried out, it is the same as if it were invalid, and the protection afforded by section 49 (d) is useless. As James, L.J., said in Ex parte Holthausen, In re Scheibler, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 722, at p. 726, if a bankrupt, under circumstances which are not impeachable, enters into a contract with respect to his real estate for valuable consideration, that contract binds his trustee in bankruptcy as much as himself; and that learned judge went on to say that the trustee was bound to perform the contract in exactly the same way as the bankrupt was bound to perform it. That applies to this case, and if the vendor had been made bankrupt on a petition presented within three months of the act of bankruptcy, his trustee could not have claimed the purchase-money again if it had already been paid over. If, on the other hand, the vendor had tendered a conveyance it would have been no answer to an action for the price to say that the vendor had committed an act of bankruptcy: Prickett v. Down, 3 Camp. 131. There is no instance in the books of a plea to such an action that the vendor has committed an act of bankruptcy. The time to look at is the date of the contract, and the rest follows. The plaintiff relies upon Ex parte Rabbidge, In re Pooley, 26 W. R. 646, 8 Ch. D. 367, but that case has not affected Ex parte Holthausen, In re Scheibler. The contract therefore went off owing to the fault of the plaintiff, and he cannot recover the deposit.

W. Ellis Hill, for the plaintiff.—In Ex parte Holthausen, In re Scheibler the contract was sought to be enforced against the trustee in bankruptcy, who, of course, could be compelled to carry out the contract. No question of the vendor being able to give a receipt for the purchase-money arose. Ex parte Rabbidge, In re Pooley shows that, though the contract may be protected, a payment made under it after adjudication is not protected. It was there held that the purchaser, who had already paid the bankrupt the purchase-money, must pay it over again to the trustee. Similarly a payment made under a protected contract after notice of an act of bankruptcy is not protected. The contract therefore went off through the fault of the vendor, and the plaintiff can recover the deposit.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

He also referred to In re Pollitt, Ex parte Minor, 41 W. R. 276, [1893] 1 Q. B. 455.

Wallace, Q.C., replied.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This is an action by a vendor against stakeholders to recover the deposit paid upon an agreement dated the 17th of November, 1897, to purchase a public-house. By the terms of the contract the purchase was to be completed on the 15th of December, 1897, and it was agreed that the deposit was to be forfeited if the purchaser should neglect or refuse to carry out his part of the agreement, but it was to be returned if the vendor should so neglect or refuse. It is clear—and, indeed, it is admitted—that time is of the essence of the contract. What happened was this: On the 24th of November a bankruptcy notice was served upon the vendor, and he failed to comply with its requirements, and in consequence of such failure he committed an available act of bankruptcy on the 2nd of December. The plaintiff, having heard of this, gave notice on the 9th of December that he refused to complete the purchase, and that he required the return of his deposit, and on being refused the return of the deposit he brought this action against the stakeholders.

In my opinion the question comes to this, was the vendor in a position to complete the sale on the 15th of December, the date fixed for completion? I do not think he was. On the 15th of December the position of the vendor was this: The plaintiff would have to hand over the £6,250 to the vendor upon the latter executing the conveyance, giving up possession, and giving a valid receipt for the purchase-money. It was said that the vendor could have conveyed the property, because there was no bankruptcy. In my opinion if he had conveyed and bankruptcy had followed upon a petition presented within three months of the act of bankruptcy, inasmuch as the conveyance would in such a case have been taken with notice of an available act of bankruptcy, the trustee appointed subsequently could have intervened. It is sufficient, however, to deal with the purchase-money. If the purchase-money had been paid to the vendor with notice of an available act of bankruptcy, in my opinion the trustee in bankruptcy, if bankruptcy had followed within the three months, could have intervened and claimed the purchase-money over again. The vendor was therefore not in a position to give a discharge for the purchase-money, and was not in a position to complete. Reliance has been placed on section 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which provides that nothing in this Act is to invalidate "(d) any contract, dealing, or transaction by or with the bankrupt for valuable consideration"; provided that (sub-section 2) "the person (other than the debtor) to, by, or with whom the payment, delivery, conveyance, assignment, contract, dealing, or transaction was made, executed, or entered into, has not at the time of the payment, delivery, conveyance, assignment, contract, dealing, or transaction notice of any available act of bankruptcy committed by the bankrupt before that time." Though the contract was before the act of bankruptcy, it is impossible to say that the conveyance or payment would have been protected by this section, because the plaintiff would have had notice at the time of the conveyance or payment of an available act of bankruptcy. For these reasons I think that the appeal should be dismissed.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I was at first somewhat impressed in favour of the appellants by the decision in Ex parte Holthausen, In re Scheibler, and with the observation of James, L.J., in his judgment where he says: "If that is so, the debtors were personally bound by the contract at the moment when their liquidation commenced. They ought to have fulfilled it; and that a bill could have been filed against them in this country to have compelled them to fulfil that contract is beyond all question. In this country, in an English bankruptcy the trustee stands exactly in the same position as the bankrupt himself stands in, and therefore his trustee is bound to perform the contract in exactly the same way as he himself was bound to perform it." It is said that that case shows that the trustee in bankruptcy would be bound to convey the property upon the same terms as the vendor would have been bound to convey. But upon looking more closely at that case it becomes manifest that the Lord Justice was there dealing with the right of the purchaser to have a conveyance of the property, and it in no way conflicts with the decision in Ex parte Rabbidge, In re Pooley. The position in the present case is that the plaintiff, as a condition of getting a conveyance of the property, would have to pay the purchase-money to the vendor, and if he had done so he might have been compelled to pay it over again to the trustee. As James, L.J., said in this latter case, "it is the purchaser's misfortune that he has paid the money to a person who had then ceased to be the owner of the property. But that can give him no equity to take the property away from the real owner without paying him for it." The purchaser here was in this position: he might, in the event of the vendor's bankruptcy within the prescribed time, have insisted upon having a conveyance of the property upon paying the purchase-money to the trustee, or if he had already paid the vendor and got a conveyance, he might have been compelled to pay over again. Therefore the vendor was not in a position to convey as he could not give the plaintiff a good receipt for the purchase-money.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Section 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, does not necessarily protect the conveyance or the payment executed or made in pursuance of a protected contract.

Appeal dismissed.

ELLIS AND ANOTHER v. WADESON & MALLESON. (a.)

Practice—Partnership—Action against firm in firm's name—Form of defence—Death of partner after action—Defence by sole surviving partner—Ord. 48a, r. 5.

Two partners were sued in the name of their firm. After appearance and before defence delivered one of the partners died, and the surviving partner, R. C. Nesbitt, delivered a defence headed with the title of the action, followed by the words "Defence of the defendant R. C. Nesbitt."

Held, that the defence was wrong in form, as it was not a defence of the firm, but of the surviving partner in his individual capacity, in which capacity he was not sued.

Appeal from an order of Ridley, J., at chambers.

The action was brought against two co-partners in the name of their firm to recover damages. One of the partners died after appearance entered and before defence delivered, and the surviving partner, R. C. Nesbitt, thereupon delivered a defence headed with the title of the action, followed by the words, "Defence of the defendant, Robert Chancellor Nesbitt," and in the body of the defence it was stated that "this defendant" did not admit or denied, as the case might be, the allegations contained in the statement of claim.

The plaintiffs took out a summons for leave to sign interlocutory judgment upon the ground that default had been made in delivering a defence of the firm.

The judge, to whom the summons was referred by the master, offered to allow Nesbitt to amend the defence by making it the defence of the firm, and on Nesbitt refusing to amend, he made an order giving the plaintiffs leave to sign interlocutory judgment against the defendants for damages to be assessed unless the defendants delivered their defence in the action forthwith.

Nesbitt appealed.

English Harrison, Q.C., and J. R. Atkin, for the appellant.—The defence delivered by the appellant is a defence for the firm, and is perfectly regular. It is entitled in the action against the firm, and the proceedings are therefore continued in the name of the firm, as required by ord. 48*a*, r. 5. Partners are entitled to sever their defences, as they may not agree upon one common defence. The other partner having died, the appellant was entitled to head his defence as he did, provided it was a defence for the firm. So long as a partner delivers a defence for the firm he is entitled to deliver it in his own name. The appellant does not wish to prejudice the personal representatives of the deceased partner by putting in a defence on behalf of the deceased partner. The name of a firm is only a convenient method of denoting those persons who compose the firm, and a plaintiff who sues partners in the name of their firm in truth sues them individually just as much as if he had set out their names: per Lindley, L.J., in Western National Bank of New York v. Perez, Triana, & Co., 39 W. R. 245, [1891] 1 Q. B. 304, adopted by Fry, L.J. in Heinemann v. Hale & Co., 39 W. R. 485, [1891] 2 Q. B. 83; Lindley on Partnership (6th ed.), p. 120. The order was therefore wrong.

G. Spencer Bower, for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs are entitled to have a defence delivered for the firm. This defence is a personal defence on the part of Nesbitt. Nesbitt wishes to compel the plaintiffs to add the personal representatives of Malleson as defendants, whereas order 48*a* was framed for the purpose of allowing the plaintiff to ignore the individual partners and to do away with the necessity of finding out who are the partners until it becomes necessary to issue execution. The last part of rule 3 deals with the case of a dissolution of partnership to the knowledge of the plaintiff before action brought. In such a case the plaintiff must serve everyone within the jurisdiction sought to be made liable. Where a partner dies after action brought, the action continues against the firm. There is no provision in order 48*a* for adding the personal representatives of a deceased partner. The surviving partner has only to put in a defence for the firm, which he has authority to do: Tomlinson v. Broadsmith, 44 W. R. 471, [1896] 1 Q. B. 386.

ROMER, L.J., delivered the judgment of the court.—The point made on behalf of the plaintiff is not, so far as this case is concerned, a very important one, but certain questions have been raised which it is desirable that we should deal with, so as to afford some guide in future cases. I will first take a case where an action is brought against a firm in the firm name, the partnership consisting of several partners. The case may be one either where the partners are the same at the dates of the accrual of the partnership liability and of the issue of the writ of summons, or where the partnership has been dissolved between those two dates. In either case, there being a partnership liability, the plaintiff would be entitled to sue the firm in the firm name. As it is an action against the firm in the firm name, the partners may, if they can agree upon one common defence, deliver one defence on behalf of the firm. If they cannot so agree, then each partner, who has to appear individually, is entitled to put in a separate defence, and the defence so put in should be a defence of the firm, and in form it should be entitled a defence of the defendants by (naming the partner) one of the partners appearing in the action. That seems to us to be the proper form of defence in such a case.

It was said, what is a plaintiff to do if there is a series of inconsistent defences put in by the different partners? The answer is, that the plaintiff, in order to succeed, must satisfy the judge at the trial that none of the defences prevent him from recovering judgment against the firm. If only one partner appears to the writ of summons, he would be entitled to put in a defence for the firm, and he may, if he chooses, add the words, by (naming the partner) one of the partners appearing in the action. It would be the defence of the firm, and the action would go to trial on that defence, and judgment, if recovered, would be recovered against the firm. If the partner put in an improper defence, and thereby rendered the firm liable when otherwise they would not be, he might be committing a breach of duty towards his co-partners, and might be liable to them, but that would not affect the plaintiff, who would be entitled to judgment against the firm. Judgment being recovered against the firm, it could be enforced against the partnership assets and against the partner who had appeared, and against the other partners, as provided by ord. 48*a*, r. 8, provided that if an alleged partner, who has not been served with the writ of summons, has not admitted on the pleadings that he is a partner, and has not been adjudged to be a partner, leave ought not to be given to issue execution against him without giving him an opportunity of contesting his liability. An illustration of this is to be found in Ex parte Young, In re Young, 30 W. R. 330, 19 Ch. D. 124.

I now proceed to consider the case of the death of a partner after the cause of action has arisen. First, I will take the case of a partner dying before action brought, the action being against the firm in the firm name. The deceased man is no party to the action so far as his private property is concerned. A dead man cannot be sued; his personal representatives alone can be sued. The action is against the surviving partners only. At common law if a creditor had joint debtors and one died, he could only sue the survivors. But since the Judicature Act, in partnership cases a creditor may join in one action the surviving partners and the personal representatives of the deceased partner, provided that the maxim actio personalis moritur cum persona does not apply. But the personal representatives must be expressly added as defendants. If they are not so added, and judgment is recovered against the firm, execution can only be enforced against the surviving partners and the partnership assets. I may here mention that the reason why the partnership assets can be reached is that, notwithstanding the death, the surviving partners have authority to bind the deceased partner's share in the partnership assets, for their authority extends to winding up the partnership, to paying the partnership debts, and to defending claims made against the partnership: see Lindley on Partnership (5th ed.), pp. 217, 218, 587. So far I have dealt with the case of the death of a partner before action.

I will now take the case of a partner dying after the writ is issued and before judgment. The judgment would, if recovered, be against the firm, and in that case execution could only be enforced against the surviving partners and the partnership assets: see upon this point Phillips v. Homfray, 32 W. R. 6, 24 Ch. D. 439; In re Shephard, 38 W. R. 133, at p. 135, 43 Ch. D. 131, at p. 136. It is clear that a partner dying after action brought and before judgment is not before the court, and judgment cannot be obtained against him. This seems to be clear. Suppose the firm consisted of two partners, and that both died before judgment, no judgment could be obtained against them.

Apply those considerations to the present case. Nesbitt is the surviving partner. The action is a good action against the firm. Nesbitt has to put in a defence for the firm. By so doing he does not make the deceased partner a party to the action. The form of the defence put in by him should be a defence of the firm, though he might, if he chose, add the words, by Nesbitt, the surviving partner. This is not a mere question of form, because if the plaintiffs recover judgment against the firm, they can issue execution against Nesbitt and against the partnership assets. Where we think the defence is wrong in substance is that Nesbitt, instead of putting in a defence of the firm denying the partnership liability, puts in a defence in his individual capacity, in which capacity he is not sued, heading it as his defence, and stating in it that "this defendant" does not admit or deny, as the case may be, the allegations in the statement of claim. He is not entitled to do that. It cannot be said that the defence he has put in is the defence of the firm. In our opinion, therefore, the judge was right in making the order appealed from. He offered to allow the defendant to amend the defence by making it a defence of the firm, and upon the defendant refusing to do so, he made the order. The appeal, therefore, fails. But we will now give the defendant leave to put in, within seven days, a defence on behalf of the firm, adding, if he likes, the words, by Nesbitt, the surviving partner.

Appeal dismissed.

Sale of goods—Documents of title—Buyer obtaining possession with consent of seller—Bill of exchange not accepted—Bill of lading indorsed to sub-purchaser—Title to goods—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 71), s. 25, sub-section 2—Factors Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 45,) s. 2, sub-section 1.

The seller of copper forwarded to the buyer the bill of lading, under which the copper had been shipped, and a bill of exchange for the price for the buyer's acceptance. The buyer, when he received the document, was about to become bankrupt. He did not accept the bill of exchange, but indorsed the bill of lading to the plaintiffs, with whom he had previously entered into a contract for the sale of copper. The seller stopped the goods in transitu.

Held, that the buyer had obtained possession of the bill of lading with the consent of the seller within the meaning of section 25, sub-section 2, of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, and that the plaintiffs, who took the bill of lading in good faith and without notice, had a title to the goods which defeated the seller's right to stop the goods in transitu.

Judgment of Mathew, J., [1898] 2 Q. B. 61, 46 W. R. Dig. 149, reversed.

Appeal of the plaintiffs from the judgment of Mathew, J., [1898] 2 Q. B. 61, 46 W. R. Dig. 149.

The facts were as follows:

On the 12th of July, 1897, Steinmann & Co., a firm carrying on business in Liverpool, contracted to sell to one Pintscher, of Altona, ten tons of copper, to be delivered at Rotterdam or Hamburg, payment to be by a thirty days' acceptance from the date of the bill of lading. The copper was shipped upon the defendants' steamship. On the 27th of August, 1897, the plaintiffs purchased ten tons of copper of Pintscher. On the 30th of August, Steinmann & Co., in fulfilment of their contract with Pintscher, forwarded to him the bill of lading for the goods, indorsed in blank, and a bill of exchange for his acceptance. When the documents arrived Pintscher was on the verge of bankruptcy. He did not accept the bill of exchange, but he indorsed the bill of lading to the plaintiffs, who took it in good faith, and without notice that Pintscher had no authority to deal with the bill of lading in that manner. Before the goods were delivered at Rotterdam, Steinmann & Co. stopped delivery of the goods, giving an indemnity to the defendants.

The plaintiffs in this action sought to recover damages for the non-delivery of the goods.

The Sale of Goods Act, 1893:

Section 19, sub-section 3.—"Where the seller of goods draws on the buyer for the price, and transmits the bill of exchange and the bill of lading to the buyer together to secure acceptance or payment of the bill of exchange, the buyer is bound to return the bill of lading if he does not honour the bill of exchange, and if he wrongfully retains the bill of lading the property in the goods does not pass to him."

Section 25, sub-section 2.—"Where a person, having bought or agreed to buy goods, obtains, with the consent of the seller, possession of the goods or the documents of title to the goods, the delivery or transfer by that person, or by a mercantile agent acting for him, of the goods, or documents of title, under any sale, pledge, or other disposition thereof, to any person receiving the same in good faith and without notice of any lien or other right of the original seller in respect of the goods, shall have the same effect as if the person making the delivery a transfer were a mercantile agent in possession of the goods or documents of title with the consent of the owner."

Sub-section 3.—"In this section the term 'mercantile agent' has the same meaning as in the Factors Act."

The Factors Act, 1889:

Section 1, sub-section 2.—"A person shall be deemed to be in possession of goods or of the documents of title to goods, where the goods or documents are in his actual custody, or are held by any other person subject to his control or for him or on his behalf."

Section 2, sub-section 1.—"Where a mercantile agent is, with the consent of the owner, in possession of goods or of the documents of title to goods, any sale, pledge or other disposition of the goods, made by him when acting in the ordinary course of business as a mercantile agent, shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, be as valid as if he were expressly authorized by the owner of the goods to make the same; provided that the person taking under the disposition acts in good faith, and has not at the time of the disposition notice that the person making the disposition has not authority to make the same."

Mathew, J., held that Pintscher held the bill of lading, as agent for Steinmann & Co., for safe custody until he should have accepted the draft, and that, therefore, he continued to have the custody only of the bill of lading, not possession of it, with the consent of the seller; that he had, therefore, no right to deal with the bill of lading by indorsing it to the plaintiffs, and could not, by so dealing with it, give the plaintiffs a title to the goods. The learned judge on these grounds gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Chayter (J. A. Hamilton with them), for the appellants.—Mathew, J., wrongly held that this case came within section 19, sub-section 3, of the Sale of Goods Act. That section has no application to a case such as this. It is admitted that Pintscher acquired no property in the goods, but the plaintiffs nevertheless obtained a good title by virtue of section 25, sub-section 2, of the Act, which is practically a re-enactment of section 9 of the Factors Act. Possession within section 25, sub-section 2, means actual custody—see the Factors Act, s. 1, sub-section 2—and Pintscher undoubtedly obtained the custody of the bill of lading with the consent of Steinmann & Co., and possession was none the less so obtained by reason of the giving of possession being coupled with a condition—viz., the acceptance of the bill of exchange, which Pintscher failed to perform. A subsequent determination of consent does not affect the question: see the Factors Act, s. 2, sub-section 2. Possession obtained by a trick would give rise to different considerations, and might prevent the case from coming within section 25, sub-section 2, but no fraud is alleged in this case. The defendants will probably rely on Shepherd v. Harrison, 20 W. R. 1, L. R. 5 H. L. 116. That case only deals with the question of the property in goods when the bill of exchange forwarded with the bill of lading is not accepted, and is no authority in this case. Assuming that the plaintiffs are within the protection afforded by section 25, sub-section 2, Steinmann & Co. lost their right to stop the goods in transitu.

They also referred to Jenkyns v. Usborne, 7 Man. & G. 678.

Cohen, Q.C., and Parker Lowe, for the respondents.—Steinmann & Co. were entitled to stop the goods in transitu. Apart from the provisions of the Sale of Goods Act and the Factors Act they clearly had that right, for they did not transfer the bill of lading to Pintscher as buyer. The Sale of Goods Act preserves the law merchant, which includes the right to stop goods in transitu, in so far as it is not inconsistent with the Act. Neither Act alters the law as to stoppage in transitu. The rights of a seller who retains possession of the goods or the documents of title are dealt with directly in the Sale of Goods Act by section 25, sub-section 1. The powers of the buyer, who obtains possession, are dealt with in section 25, sub-section 2, but only indirectly and by reference to the Factors Act, s 2, sub-section 1. That section only validates a disposition of the goods, and does not mention documents of title, the intention being that there should be no interference with the law merchant as to stoppage in transitu which is affected not by the passing of property in the goods, but by a lawful transfer of the documents of title. The only provisions in the Acts as to stoppage in transitu are those contained in section 10 of the former, and in section 47 of the latter. The effect of these sections is that where documents of title to goods have been lawfully transferred to any person, as buyer, a transfer of the documents to a third person, taking in good faith, defeats the right to stoppage in transitu. In this case there was no transfer of the bill of lading to Pintscher as buyer, with the intention that he should acquire property in the goods. There was only a conditional indorsement to him: Gurney v. Behrend, 2 W. R. 425, 3 E. & B. 622. Secondly, Pintscher did not obtain possession of the bill of lading with the consent of Steinmann & Co. If Pintscher did not intend to accept the bill of exchange, it was his duty at once to return the bill of lading, and not having done so his possession was wrongful ab initio: see the language of Lord Cairns in Shepherd v. Harrison, L. R. 5 H. L., at p. 133. Finally, the provisions of section 25, sub-section 2, of the Sale of Goods Act, and of section 2, sub-section 1, of the Factors Act, which must be read with it, only apply to cases where the assignment of the goods by the buyer to the third person was made after the buyer obtained possession of the documents of title, whereas Pintscher sold the copper to the plaintiffs before he had the bill of lading.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 8.—A. L. SMITH, L.J., read the following judgment: The question raised in this case is whether, when a seller of goods sends to his buyer under cover of a letter a bill of lading accompanied by a draft to be accepted by the buyer for the price of the goods contained in the bill of lading, the buyer can keep the bill of lading, and refuse to accept the draft, and yet give a good title to the goods covered by the bill of lading to a sub-purchaser from him who takes in good faith and without notice of the want of authority of the buyer to deal with the bill of lading and the goods represented thereby. If the question be answered in the affirmative, a further question as to stoppage in transitu will arise, which I will deal with hereafter. Upon the 12th of July, 1897, Steinmann, of Liverpool, contracted to sell to Pintscher, of Altona, ten tons of copper to be delivered, cost, insurance, freight, at Rotterdam, payment to be made by Pintscher's acceptance at thirty days from date of bill of lading. On the 27th of August, 1897, the plaintiffs Cahn and Mayer purchased of Pintscher ten tons of copper. Upon the 30th of August, 1897, Steinmann, in fulfilment of his contract with Pintscher forwarded to him a bill of lading indorsed in blank for ten tons of copper, accompanied by a draft for his acceptance in the following letter: "Liverpool, August 30, 1897. Mr. M. D. Pintscher, Altona. Dear Sir,—We beg to confirm our respects of the 26th inst., and have the pleasure of handing you herewith bill of lading for ten tons R.T.C. ingots, shipped per ss. Collier to Rotterdam. We further hand you our invoice for these goods amounting to M.10,624.30, and our draft for the same amount, which be good enough to provide with your acceptance and return to us as soon as possible.—Yours truly, R. Steinmann & Co." The draft contained in this letter was by mistake drawn for £10 in excess of the contract price of the copper, but no point is made as to this. This letter, with its enclosures, reached Pintscher upon the 1st of September, 1897, and he thereupon retained the bill of lading and handed it to his banker to hand to the plaintiffs, and when they paid against the bill of lading, the banker was to credit the proceeds to Pintscher's account which was then in debit. Pintscher never accepted the draft. The banker, on the 2nd of September, 1897, accordingly handed the bill of lading indorsed by Pintscher to the plaintiffs in fulfilment of their contract with Pintscher, and against this bill of lading the plaintiffs paid cash to the banker, taking it in good faith and without notice that Pintscher had no authority from Steinmann to deal with the bill of lading as he was doing. The banker credited the amount received from the plaintiffs to Pintscher's overdrawn account. Before the goods arrived at Rotterdam, Steinmann, being unpaid for his copper, and Pintscher having become insolvent, stopped the copper in transitu. In these circumstances are the plaintiffs entitled to the copper as against Steinmann, the unpaid vendor? This depends upon the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, coupled with the Factors Act, 1889, which clearly must be read together, for without these Acts there can be no doubt that the plaintiffs took no title to the goods. The learned judge has held that they did not, and the plaintiffs appeal.

That the Factors Acts, commencing as they do in the year 1823 (4 Geo. 3, c. 83), and finishing up with the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, were passed to afford protection to persons dealing in good faith and without notice with factors cannot be disputed, and that additional protection to persons so dealing, not only with factors, but also with buyers of goods, has by these Acts from time to time been afforded is equally clear; and the first question is whether the plaintiffs are within the protection of the last of these Acts—viz., the Sale of Goods Act, 1893—coupled with the Factors Act, 1889. I would point out that it is only in cases where an owner has in some way been deprived of his goods without his authority that the Factors Acts are required; for, if he is not so deprived, the Acts are not needed to protect bonâ fide transactions with agents and buyers. [His lordship read section 25, sub-sections 2 and 3, of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, and section 1, sub-section 2, and section 2, sub-section 1, of the Factors Act, 1889.] It will be seen that in this case the first question comes to this, did Pintscher obtain the actual custody of the bill of lading with the consent of Steinmann? For, if so, the plaintiffs can make title to the bill of lading and the goods under the above-mentioned Acts. No point is made as to whether Pintscher acted in the ordinary course of business of a mercantile agent when he parted with the bill of lading as he did to his bankers. A point was made that when the plaintiffs contracted with Pintscher to buy ten tons of copper they did so before Pintscher had the custody of the bill of lading, and that the plaintiffs were, therefore, not protected by the Acts; for it was said that the sale was made by Pintscher to the plaintiffs before he was in possession of the document of title. But I think the answer to this argument is that section 25, sub-section 2, of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, validates the delivery or transfer of a document of title, which took place in this case when Pintscher transferred the indorsed bill of lading through his banker to the plaintiffs, against which they paid their money. This point fails Steinmann. That the bill of lading was in the actual custody of Pintscher is clear, though I agree that this does not suffice, for the statute enacts that the actual custody of the document of title must be obtained by the mercantile agent or buyer with the consent of the seller. Now, the bill of lading was not obtained by Pintscher from Steinmann by any trick or device—in which case it could not, I think, be said that Pintscher had obtained the actual custody of it with Steinmann's consent—but, on the contrary, the bill of lading, accompanied by the draft, was voluntarily sent by Steinmann to Pintscher, and it was by this voluntary act of Steinmann, and by this alone, that the bill of lading was obtained by Pintscher from him, and thus got into his actual custody, which are the words of the Act. Why, then, was not the bill of lading obtained by Pintscher and in his actual custody with Steinmann's consent? The limitation of Pintscher's authority to deal with the bill of lading after he got it into his custody, before he accepted the draft, is not to the point, which as before stated is—Did Pintscher obtain the actual custody of it with the consent of Steinmann? In my judgment the words of the Act mean actual physical custody. After consideration, the only answer I can give to this question is that the bill of lading was obtained by Pintscher from Steinmann, and was in his actual custody with Steinmann's consent. It is, however, argued that what Lords Westbury and Cairns said in Shepherd v. Harrison shows that I am wrong, but I do not think so. What those noble and learned lords were dealing with was the passing of property in goods contained in a bill of lading to a purchaser, he not accepting the draft accompanying the bill of lading. We have nothing to do in this case with the passing of property to Pintscher. That no property passed to Pintscher in the copper cannot be doubted, but this is not the question. Lord Westbury said (L. R. 5 H. L., at p. 129): "I think no man, certainly no lawyer, would consider that the letter was written with any other conviction in the mind of the writer than this, that it would not be consistent with courtesy towards a house like that of Shepherd & Co. to say: 'Remember, you are not to possess yourself of the bill of lading until you have accepted the bill of exchange.' That is not said in terms, but it is indicated by the transaction"; and Lord Cairns said (at p. 132): "I do not believe there is a merchant in England that would have any doubt that the meaning" (of sending the bill of lading and draft together) "was, You shall have the bill of lading when you accept the bill of exchange. . . . I hold it to be perfectly clear that when a cargo comes in this way, protected by a bill of lading and a bill of exchange, it is the duty of those to whom the bill of lading and bill of exchange are transmitted in a letter either 'to approbate or to reprobate' entirely and completely then and there. . . . I therefore think that when one merchant in this country sends to another, in circumstances like the present, a bill of lading and a bill of exchange, it is not at all necessary for him to say in words: We require you to take notice that our object in enclosing these bills of lading and bills of exchange is that, before you use the bills of lading, you shall accept the bills of exchange." It seems to me that the noble and learned lords clearly state that before the draft is accepted the buyer is not to use the bill of lading, and, if he does so, it is a clear breach of his duty to his seller, and in such circumstances no property passes to the buyer. But this does not cover the present question, which is, did Pintscher obtain the actual custody of the bill of lading—that is, of the thing itself—with Steinmann's consent? The noble and learned lords were not dealing with the effect of the Factors Acts, which were not then before them, and with which they had nothing to do. I agree that it was Steinmann's intention that Pintscher was not to use the bill of lading unless and until he accepted the draft, but the bill of lading was none the less in Pintscher's actual custody with his (Steinmann's) consent before he had accepted the draft. The Legislature when it passed the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, by section 19, subsection 3, enacted what had been held by the House of Lords in Shepherd v. Harrison, and nothing more, the Act being an Act to codify the law.

I now come to the second question, raised in this court for the first time, for it was not made in the court below—that, supposing the plaintiffs had a good title to the bill of lading by virtue of the protection afforded to them by the conjoint operation of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, and the Factors Act, 1889, Steinmann could, nevertheless, stop, as he did, the goods in transitu and thus defeat the plaintiffs' statutory title to the goods comprised in the bill of lading. I agree that this is an important point, for, if it be sound, the title to a bill of lading and the goods represented thereby, which a sub-purchaser in good faith takes from a buyer of the goods and obtains by reason of the provisions of the Act, will in many cases be invalidated. Now, what does section 2, sub-section 1, of the Factors Act, 1889, enact? It enacts that where a mercantile agent (which includes a buyer) is, with the consent of the owner, in the actual custody of goods or the documents of title to goods (which for this point must be taken to be the case), any disposition of the goods made by him shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, be as valid as if he were expressly authorized by the owner of the goods to make the same; provided that the person taking under the disposition acts in good faith, and has not at the time of the disposition notice that the person making the disposition has not authority to make the same; in other words, as if the disposition had been made by the owner of the goods himself or by his lawfully-authorized agent. By section 10 of the same Act it is enacted that where a document of title to goods has been lawfully transferred to a person as a buyer (which was done in this case by Steinmann passing the indorsed bill of lading to Pintscher), and that person transfers the document to a person (the plaintiffs) who takes the document in good faith and for valuable consideration (as the plaintiffs did), the last-mentioned transfer shall have the same effect for defeating any vendor's lien or right of stoppage in transitu as a transfer of a bill of lading has for defeating the right of stoppage in transitu. What avail, then, is it to call attention to section 61, sub-section 2, of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, which enacts that the rules of common law, including the law merchant, save in so far as they are inconsistent with the express provisions of the Act, shall continue to apply to contracts for the sale of goods? For, in my judgment, the provisions of section 2, sub-section 1, and section 10 of the Factors Act, 1889, which it is conceded must be read as part of the Act of 1893, expressly provide that, in circumstances such as exist in the present case, the right to stoppage in transitu is defeated. See also as to this the proviso to section 47 of the Act of 1893, the first part of which section leaves the right of stoppage in transitu precisely where it was before upon the mere sale of goods, when no transfer of the bill of lading by indorsement takes place, and re-enacts section 10 of the Factors Act, 1889. This second point, therefore, as to stoppage in transitu, also fails Steinmann. For these reasons I think that the appeal must be allowed with costs here and below.

COLLINS, L.J., read the following judgment: The crucial question in this case is, whether Pintscher, the buyer, obtained possession of the bill of lading with the consent of Steinmann, the seller. If he did, his transfer of it to Cahn, the sub-purchaser, for cash, who received the same in good faith and without notice of any lien or other right of Steinmann, was by section 25, sub-section 2, of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, as effectual as if Pintscher had been a mercantile agent in possession of the bill of lading with the consent of the owner. Such a sale by a mercantile agent is by section 2, sub-section 1, of the Factors Act, 1889, as valid as if he was expressly authorized by the owner to make it. It is, therefore, immaterial whether the consent was afterwards withdrawn; when he has once got possession by consent, his subsequent disposition of the bill of lading, whether such consent still subsists or not, is made as effectual as if he were, in making the transfer, a mercantile agent in possession with the consent of the owner. A mercantile agent is himself placed in a similar position by section 2, sub-section 2, of the Factors Act. Where he has been in possession with consent, the determination of the consent does not, while he retains possession, defeat his disposition. Possession, by section 1, sub-section 2, of the Factors Act, means actual custody. The Factors Act, 1889, which is thus referred to, and, as to part of it, is in terms again enacted in the Sale of Goods Act, is the last of a series of statutes whereby the Legislature has gradually enlarged the powers of persons in the actual possession of goods or documents of title, but without property therein, to pass the property in the goods to bonâ fide purchasers. Possession of, not property in, the thing disposed of is the cardinal fact. From the point of view of the bonâ fide purchaser the ostensible authority based on the fact of possession is the same whether there is property in the thing, or authority to deal with it, in the person in possession at the time of the disposition, or not. But the Legislature has not carried the rights of a purchaser under these Acts so far as to make the sale equivalent to a sale in market overt. The purchaser must accept the risk of his vendor having found or stolen the goods or documents, or otherwise got possession of them without the consent of the owner. But if a mercantile agent, or one of the persons whose disposition is made as effectual as that of a mercantile agent, has obtained possession by the consent of the owner, even though it were under a contract voidable as fraudulent—see Baines v. Swainson, 11 W. R. 945, 4 B. & S 270; Sheppard v. Union Bank, 10 W. R. 299, 7 H. & N. 661—he is able to pass a good title to a bonâ fide purchaser. However fraudulent the person in actual custody may have been in obtaining the possession, provided it did not amount to larceny by a trick, and however grossly he may abuse confidence reposed in him, or violate the mandate under which he got possession, he can by his disposition give a good title to the purchaser; see the distinction between possession obtained by a trick and possession under a contract voidable for fraud, noted by Blackburn, J., in Cole v. North-Western Bank, L. R. 10 C. P. 354, 23 W. R. Dig. 186.

These considerations seem to me decisive of the crucial question in this case. By sending the bill of lading and the bill of exchange direct to Pintscher, Steinmann constituted him bailee of both of them. It seems impossible to say that there was any wrongful taking by Pintscher. There was no trick which would have negatived a bailment. If he became criminally responsible for his subsequent dealing with the bill of lading, it must have been as bailee, which presupposes a taking by consent. The circumstances of the obtaining possession would not have supported an indictment for larceny, and the subsequent abuse of his opportunity could not alter the character of the original taking. He might conceivably have fully intended to accept the draft and forward it by the first post. If he had disposed of the bill of lading while he remained in this attitude of mind, and subsequently accepted the draft and forwarded it and became insolvent before the transitus of the goods was over, could Steinmann have stopped them effectually on the ground that Pintscher had not obtained possession of the bill of lading with his consent? If not it could only be because the original taking was with his consent. The possession—i.e., the actual custody, was obtained once for all when the bill of lading was placed in Pintscher's hand, and no subsequent changes in his intention with regard to the draft could change the character of this completed act. It would, in my opinion, defeat the purpose of the Act, and work a public mischief, if a vendor, who had himself placed the bill of lading in the hands of his purchaser, were entitled, as against a bonâ fide sub-purchaser from the latter, to enter into nice questions as to the intention with which the original purchaser took the document of title into his possession. The Legislature has deliberately chosen to alter the common law which made a transfer of a bill of lading ineffectual, if the person transferring was not himself the owner of the goods. It has step by step enlarged the class of persons who, having possession, may give a better title than they had themselves, and has relaxed the conditions under which they may do so, and I think it would be a backward step to subject the title of the purchaser from such persons to speculations such as the argument for the defendants suggests. It is to be noted that section 25, on which the question turns, and which makes possession obtained by consent the only condition of the buyer's power to sell again, follows immediately upon a series of sections dealing with transfer by persons without title, in the last of which the distinction of possession obtained under circumstances amounting to larency from that obtained by fraud or other wrongful means not amounting to larency is made the basis of an enactment. Read in this context, the section itself at once suggests the test of larceny where the obtaining possession has been, as in this case, by the direct delivery by the owner to the buyer. In Phillips v. Huth, 6 M. & W. 572, at p. 597, decided upon the law as it stood after 5 & 6 Vict. c. 39, Parke, B., in delivering the judgment of the court, says: "If the Legislature had intended to make the simple possession of such instruments sufficient to enable the party having them to make a good title, they no doubt would have so provided; if they had, the innocent party dealing with him would have been protected, but the innocent owner would, in that case, have suffered if the document had been taken from him by felony or fraud. But by providing that a person should be intrusted, as well as in possession, the inconvenience is obviated." Though, as we have seen, the word "intrust" was afterwards held to be satisfied, although the intrusting was induced by fraud, I think the omission of this word in the present statute and the substitution of "obtain with consent" must have been still further to improve the position of the purchaser from the class of persons dealt with in the Act, and at least to exclude all consideration of the conditions upon, or purposes for, which actual possession was in fact voluntarily given to his vendor. In Cole v. North-Western Bank, L. R. 10 C. P. 354, at p. 372, Blackburn, J., in delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, says: "The Legislature seems to us to have wished to make it the law, that where a third person has intrusted goods or the documents of title to goods to an agent who in the course of such agency sells or pledges the goods, he should be deemed by that Act to have misled anyone who bonâ fide deals with the agent, and makes a purchase from or advance to him without notice that he was not authorized to sell or procure the advance." In Sanders v. Maclean, 31 W. R. 698, 11 Q. B. D. 327, at p. 343, Bowen, L.J., in dealing with an objection that the usage there contended for would facilitate fraud, says: "The object of mercantile usages is to prevent the risk of insolvency, not of fraud; credit, not distrust, is the basis of commercial dealings." The later legislation is clearly an attempt to bring the law more nearly into line with mercantile opinion, and to extend the statutory implication of misleading to the case where persons, not agents at all, have been permitted by the owner to obtain possession of goods or documents of title. In short, the vendor who puts his purchaser in possession of the documents may be deemed to have misled the sub-purchaser who buys on the faith of that possession. The vendor from whom they have been stolen or taken against his will cannot. The common precaution of sending the bill of lading to his own agent, instead of to the buyer direct, would have avoided all difficulty, and I think the Legislature must have been well aware of the common practice in these cases, and left the seller to protect himself.

It is, however, contended by the respondents that section 19, sub-section 3, of the Sale of Goods Act, which enacts the law as laid down in Shepherd v. Harrison, concludes the case in their favour, and the learned judge below seems to have adopted this view. With the greatest respect for his opinion, I cannot think that section has any bearing on the point now under discussion. It is not addressed to the original obtaining possession at all. It is addressed to the duty of the recipient after he has got it and declares that, if he wrongfully retains it, the property in the goods does not pass. All this is wholly consistent with, and indeed assumes, custody with consent. His possession becomes wrongful only if he does not honour the bill of exchange; then and only then he is bound to return it. Even when, by electing not to accept the bill, he has come under a duty to return it, he is bailee of the bill for that purpose with the consent of the owner. But at what moment does his retention become wrongful. Suppose he bonâ fide intends to honour the bill, and lays both bill of lading and bill of exchange aside for an interval while he is attending to other matters, is his possession during this interval without consent? At what point of time does he obtain possession with consent in case he makes up his mind to accept the bill? Surely the obtaining possession with consent cannot depend on the fluctuations which his mind goes through during the period that the bill is in his custody. But when Shepherd v. Harrison itself is looked at it is clear that the point then decided was quite outside the question of the possession as distinguished from the jus disponendi. The whole point was whether the true owner had shown that he intended to reserve to himself the jus disponendi in the goods so as to negative the inference that the property in them had passed to the person to whom a bill of lading indorsed in blank had been handed by the owner's agent together with a bill of exchange for the price for acceptance. The handing over the bill of lading under such conditions clearly did not rebut the conclusive evidence from the transaction itself that the seller intended to preserve his jus disponendi until the acceptance of the bill of exchange, and that therefore no property in the goods passed to the plaintiffs by the delivery of the bill of lading. It was not a question what title the buyer, having no title himself, could pass to a bonâ fide purchaser, but whether he could make title against the seller himself, a point wholly outside the special legislation of these Acts, which are based, as I have shown, on a constructive misleading of third persons. The decision and the dicta are addressed to this point only. "I therefore think," says Lord

Cairns, L. R. 5 H. L., at p. 133, "that when one merchant in this country sends to another under circumstances like this a bill of exchange and a bill of lading, it is not necessary at all for him to say in words: 'We require you to take notice that our object in enclosing these bills of lading and bills of exchange is that before you use the bills of lading you shall accept the bills of exchange.'" This is what he means when he says earlier in his speech, "The meaning was, 'You shall have the bill of lading when you accept the bill of exchange.'" The same meaning must be attributed to Lord Westbury's paraphrase at p. 130: "Remember you are not to possess yourself of the bill of lading until you have accepted the bill of exchange." Property, control, not mere actual custody, is what their lordships are referring to. The statutory declaration of the buyer's duty, when he has got the bill of lading, could not, any more than a mandate actually given or implied by law out of the circumstances, undo or defeat the effect of possession given concurrently with the mandate. It is expressly provided by section 21, sub-section 2, that nothing in the Sale of Goods Act shall affect the provisions of the Factors Act, or any enactment enabling the apparent owner of goods to dispose of them as if he were the true owner thereof. If, therefore, there was possession with consent here under the Factors Act, this provision would not suffice to defeat it. But, for the reasons I have given, I think it leaves the law merely as it was, and has no bearing on the discussion. On the principal point in the case, therefore, I think the appellants are right.

It remains only to deal with Mr. Cohen's argument that, even on the assumption that Pintscher obtained possession of the bill of lading with the consent of Steinmann, his transfer of it to Cahn did not suffice to defeat the right of Steinmann to stop in transitu. He relied on section 61 of the Sale of Goods Act, which preserves the rules of the law merchant, save so far as they are inconsistent with the Act, and pointed out that, apart from the Factors Act, a transfer such as that made by Pintscher, having himself no property in the bill of lading, would not have defeated the unpaid vendor's right to stop. But that Mr. Cohen pressed this point upon us, I should have thought it unarguable. The law merchant has unquestionably been altered by this Act, which partly re-enacts and partly applies the existing Factors Act. Section 21, sub-section 2 (a), expressly enacts that nothing in this Act shall affect the provisions of the Factors Act, or any enactment enabling the apparent owner of goods to dispose of them as if he were the true owner. The effect of this legislation, therefore, has been to enable a buyer, who has obtained possession of the bill of lading with the consent of the owner, to deal with it as effectually as he might have done before if he had had property as well as possession. By section 25, sub-section 2, his transfer is made as effectual as if he were a mercantile agent in possession of the goods or documents with the consent of the owner; and, by section 2, sub-section 1, a disposition of the goods by a mercantile agent, under such circumstances, "is as valid as if he were expressly authorized by the owner of the goods to make the same." I have no hesitation in holding that a transfer of the bill of lading is a disposition of the goods within the meaning of those words in this section. But Mr. Cohen then fell back on section 47 of the Sale of Goods Act which, he said, now defines the only terms under which a buyer may defeat the right to stop in transitu by a sub-sale, and that this case does not fall within them. But the opening words of this section would be sufficient to introduce the Factors Act legislation into this enactment, even if it had not been otherwise expressly preserved. They are, "subject to the provisions of this Act the unpaid seller's right of stoppage in transitu is not effected by any sale or other disposition of the goods, which the buyer may have made, unless the seller has assented thereto." It then provides that where a document of title to goods has been lawfully transferred to any person as buyer or owner, he may defeat the right to stop by a transfer of the document to a person who takes it in good faith, and for valuable consideration. Mr. Cohen contended that, in this case, the bill of lading had not been "lawfully transferred" to Pintscher as buyer, inasmuch as it was not intended that the property should pass. But by section 11 of the Factors Act, "the transfer of a document may be by indorsement, or where the document is by custom, or by its express terms transferable by delivery, or makes the goods deliverable to the bearer, then by delivery." Delivery by the Sale of Goods Act, s. 62, means "voluntary transfer of possession from one person to another." I think there can be no doubt whatever that the bill of lading, which was indorsed in blank, was in this case "lawfully transferred" to Pintscher as buyer. It would, indeed, be a strange result of this legislation if the transfer of a bill of lading by a buyer to a sub-purchaser under the statutory conditions were ineffectual to defeat the vendor's rights in the case where such transfers are most likely to take place—viz., while the goods are still in transit. The result is that all Mr. Cohen's points fail.

I have dealt with the case throughout upon the same footing as that upon which it was dealt with in the court below—viz., as though the transfer of the bill of lading was from Pintscher to Cahn direct. No point was made before us upon any other hypothesis.

As to the point that there had been a bargain made by Pintscher with Cahn before the former got possession of the bill of lading, the answer is that Cahn's title rests on the transfer of the bill of lading for cash, and not on the prior bargain.

I think the appellants are entitled to judgment.

ROMER, L.J., read the following judgment: Section 25, sub-section 2, of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, applies if Pintscher obtained possession of the bill of lading with the consent of Steinmann & Co. Now, "possession" in that context means, I think, actual custody: see the definition of possession in the Factors Act, 1889, s. 1. The question, therefore, becomes narrowed to one of consent. On that question I have come to the conclusion that Steinmann & Co. did consent to Pintscher obtaining the custody of the bill of lading. No doubt Steinmann & Co. contemplated that Pintscher would on receipt of the bill of lading accept the bill of exchange drawn for the price of the goods; and when Pintscher declined to accept the bill of exchange he ought not to have dealt with the bill of lading; but I do not think this is a case where the owner of the bill of lading made it a condition precedent to its custody being obtained by Pintscher that the bill of exchange should be accepted, so that if the bill of exchange was not accepted it was not the intention of Steinmann & Co. that Pintscher should obtain the custody of the bill of lading. I think the circumstances negative that view. It appears to me that Steinmann & Co. did intend, and consent, that the bill of lading and the bill of exchange should both come into the actual custody of Pintscher, though after Pintscher obtained that custody he had certain duties to discharge as between him and Steinmann & Co. with regard to both documents. Steinmann & Co., in short, consented that Pintscher should obtain the custody of the bill of lading, though they did not consent that Pintscher should use the bill of lading after it came into his custody before accepting the bill of exchange: see the observations of Lord Cairns in Shepherd v. Harrison. It follows that Pintscher was, for the purposes of this case, in the position of a mercantile agent having possession of the bill of lading with the consent of the owner; and accordingly section 2 of the Factors Act, 1889, applies, and the plaintiffs obtained a good title to the goods. For, in the circumstances of this case, it cannot in my opinion be successfully contended by Steinmann & Co. that the transaction between Pintscher and the plaintiffs was not a disposition of the goods within the meaning of that phrase as used in section 2, sub-section 1, of the last-named Act. With regard to the second point argued before us, which relates to the right of stoppage in transitu, I do not desire to add anything to what the Lords Justices have already said.

ALLEN v. VESTRY OF FULHAM. (a.)

Metropolis management—Paving expenses—New street—Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), s. 105.

The word "street" in the expression "new street" in section 105 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, is used in its popular sense—viz., of a road having buildings erected on the adjoining land.

Judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (ante, p. 9) affirmed.

Appeal from the judgment (reported ante, p. 9) of a Divisional Court (Day and Ridley, JJ.), on a case stated by a metropolitan police magistrate.

The appellants were the owners of certain premises forming, bounding, and abutting on Wandsworth Bridge-road. The respondents, the Vestry of the Parish of Fulham, were the successors of the Fulham District Board of Works by virtue of section 3 of the Metropolis Management Amendment Act, 1885.

Wandsworth Bridge-road, which formed a means of approach to Wandsworth Bridge on the north side, was made by the Wandsworth Bridge Co. in 1873 in pursuance of an Act of Parliament passed in 1864, by which it was provided that the road when completed should be a public highway and one of the parish highways of Fulham, and repairable in like manner as any other highway of that parish from time to time should be repairable.

For some time the district board refused to take over the maintenance and repair of the road, on the ground that it was inefficiently made, but, after prolonged negotiations and litigation between the company and the district board, an agreement was arrived at in September, 1876, whereby the district board agreed, in consideration of the sum of £1,750 paid by the company to them, to put the road in repair and thenceforth undertake the liability of repairing it.

In 1877 the district board made up the carriage-way of the road with flints rolled in over a foundation of hard core. No channelling or kerbing was done, neither was anything done in the way of repairing the footways.

The magistrate found that except for the omitted channelling and kerbing the carriage-way was made up and repaired in a permanent manner, and in the same mode and to the same extent as new streets with a similar amount of traffic were dealt with at that period under section 105 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855. There were no buildings upon the land adjoining the road until the year 1890. In that year houses were erected on the east side. In 1895 and 1896 houses were built on the west side.

In 1897 the vestry passed a resolution that the Wandsworth Bridge-road, being a new street, should be paved under the provisions of the Metropolis Management Acts, 1855 and 1862, and that the estimated expenses of the paving works should be apportioned upon the owners of the houses and lands abutting upon the street. The sums apportioned upon the appellants were sums of £554, £963, and £248. The appellants having made default in payment, summonses were taken out by the vestry.

The magistrate found that the road was not in 1877 a new street within the meaning of section 105 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1885, and section 77 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1862, and that it became a new street for the first time after the erection of houses therein, and was a new street within the meaning of the Acts when the resolution of the vestry was passed. He accordingly held that the appellants were liable to pay to the vestry the sums demanded.

The Divisional Court affirmed the decision of the magistrate (see ante, p. 9).

The appellants appealed.

Macmorran, Q.C., and R. Cunningham Glen, for the appellants.

Macaskie, for the respondents.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The appellants contend that this road was a "new street" within the meaning of the Act in 1877, though no house had then been built on either side of it. The vestry contend that it was then a highway, but not a street, and that it became a street for the first time when it was converted into what is popularly known as a street by the building of houses. The magistrate has found as a fact that it was not a street until the houses were built. The appellants say that that is wrong, because a road may be a street within the meaning of the Act, although not a single building has been erected on either side of it. But section 105 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, which is the charging section, clearly contemplates the existence of houses by the side of the road which is to constitute a new street. It begins by speaking of "the owners of the houses forming the greater part of any new street," and the persons who are to pay the expenses of paving the new street are described as "the owners of the houses forming such street." In my opinion the interpretation clause, section 250, which makes "street" include any highway except the carriage-way of a turnpike road, does not cut down the popular meaning of the word "street." In Robinson v. Local Board of Barton-Eccles, 32 W. R. 249, 8 App. Cas. 798, Lord Selborne, dealing with the similar interpretation of "street" in the Public Health Act, 1875, said: "An interpretation clause of this kind is not meant to prevent the word receiving its ordinary, popular, and natural sense whenever that would be properly applicable; but to enable the word as used in the Act, when there is nothing in the context or the subject-matter to the contrary, to be applied to some things to which it would not ordinarily be applicable.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

I look upon this portion of the interpretation clause as meaning neither more nor less than this, that the provisions contained in the Act as to streets, whether new streets or old streets, shall, unless there be something in the subject-matter and the context to the contrary, be read as applicable to these different things. It is perfectly consistent with that, that they should be read as applicable, and should be applied, to those things to which they in their natural sense apply, and which do not require any interpretation clause to bring them in; and in the natural and popular sense of the word 'street,' or the words 'new street,' I should certainly understand a roadway with buildings on each side (it is not necessary to say how far they must or may be continuous or discontinuous); and by 'new street' a place which before had not that character, but which, by the construction of buildings on each side, or possibly on one side, has acquired it." But then the appellants rely on section 77 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1862, which brings in the owners of land abutting on a new street, and makes them liable to contribute to paving expenses as well as the owners of houses. I think the object of that was this: Before the Act of 1862, where a street became paveable which had houses alongside it, and also at intervals pieces of vacant land on which houses had not been built, the owners of the houses had to pay the whole of the expenses, and the owners of the vacant land paid nothing; and this section was passed to make them liable to contribute.

I entirely agree with what was said by Wright, J., in Vestry of St. Mary, Battersea v. Palmer, 45 W. R. 110, [1897] 1 Q. B. 220: "When section 105 is carefully looked at, it is obvious that it not merely begins by treating houses as the essence of what is a street for the purposes of the section, but later on it goes on to use this expression: 'And the owners of the houses forming such street shall on demand pay to such vestry or board the amount of the estimated expenses.' Clearly when that section was passed the Legislature was thinking of a street composed wholly or partially of houses; and I should say that the question whether there was a sufficient number of houses to make a road a street for the purposes of that Act would be a question of fact for the magistrate."

I think the judgment of the Divisional Court is right. This road was not a new street in 1877, and the magistrate has found that it did not become a new street till houses were erected. The vestry, therefore, were entitled to pave it as a new street and charge the expenses on the frontagers.

DAVIES v. PARRY. (a.)

Administration—Creditor's action—Right of retainer—Decree for administration—Form of administration bond.

(a.) Reported by RALEGH B. PHILLPOTTS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The form of a creditor's administration bond as now used still permits a creditor who has taken out letters of administration to retain his own debt, even out of assets come to his hands after a decree for administration obtained by other creditors.

Nunn v. Barlow (1824), 1 Sim. & St. 588, followed.

Adjourned summons.

The chief question in this summons was whether the present form of administration bond as now used, after the decision in In the Goods of Brackenbury, 25 W. R. 698, 2 P. D. 272, deprived an administrator of his right of retainer.

Thomas Parry, a solicitor, died intestate in November, 1862, and letters of administration to his estate were granted to his widow Mary Parry on the 11th of December, 1862.

On the 20th of December, 1862, the usual decree was made for the administration of the real and personal estate of Thomas Parry in this action, which was an administration suit brought by certain of his creditors.

In January, 1867, the chief clerk certified that a sum of £405 was owing to the estate of the deceased for taxed costs in a suit of Tardrew v. Howell, 9 W. R. 296, for payment of which there was no fund available until after the death of one Hannah Howell; and he also found that among other creditors of the deceased, one William Bonville was a simple creditor for £136

Thomas Parry's estate proved insufficient to pay all the debts, and William Bonville only received £58. William Bonville died in 1872, and his son, William Bonville the younger as sole executor, proved his will.

The widow Mary Parry died intestate in 1890, and in July, 1897, letters of administration de bonis non of the personal estate and effects of the said Thomas Parry were granted to the said William Bonville the younger as a creditor, and he executed the usual bond of a creditor on taking administration.

On the said Hannah Howell's death a sum of £257 was, by an order in Tardrew v. Howell made in February, 1898, directed to be paid to William Bonville the younger, as the legal personal representative of Thomas Parry, on account of the said debt of £405 for costs.

William Bonville alleged that with arrears of interest and the unpaid balance, the amount owing to his father's estate in respect of the said debt of £136 was £182, and he now applied by summons for a declaration that as administrator de bonis non of the personal estate of the intestate the said Thomas Parry deceased, he had a right to retain the said sum of £182 in discharge of the debt owing to him by the said deceased, out of the said sum £257, moneys come to his hands as legal personal representative of the said Thomas Parry deceased, with a further sum of £25 on account of costs, and that he might be at liberty to pay into court the balance of the said sum of £257 to the credit of this action.

Farwell, Q.C., and Douglas, for the administrator.—An administrator has the right to retain his own debt, and he cannot be said to be "unduly preferring his own debt" within the meaning of the words in the administration bond, when he retains it in the manner allowed by law. Nunn v. Barlow, 1 Sim. & St. 588, is precisely in point.

Neville, Q.C., and Elgood, contrà.—The case of In the Goods of Brackenbury, in consequence of which the administration bond was settled in its present form, shows that the bond is intended to exclude the administrator's right of retainer.

ROMER, J.—There is no doubt that the question raised here is a very important one; but I do not see how I can refuse to allow the right of retainer claimed by the administrator. It is settled law, by decisions which I cannot review, that an administrator has a right of retaining out of the legal assets a debt due to himself as trustee, although there may be other creditors, and the estate be insolvent. It is also settled that an administrator can do that, even though there has been a decree for administration, and even though the debt which he claims to retain has been proved in the administration action. I may refer, in support of that last proposition, to the case of Nunn v. Barlow, 1 Sim. & St. 588. That case having been decided so long ago, I certainly cannot review it. It was argued before me, or rather suggested, that the case of Jones v. Evans, 24 W. R. 778, 2 Ch. D. 420, threw doubt on that case, or showed that that case ought not to be followed. But the case of Jones v. Evans, which came before Hall, V.C., was perfectly distinct. There the executrix who claimed the right of retainer did not represent a dead creditor who had proved in the administration action against the testatrix's estate, but was a mere legatee under that creditors' will, and nothing more. Of course as legatee that executrix had no right to retain that debt, and it was so held. That case did not, in my opinion, differ from or throw doubt on Nunn v. Barlow, to which I have already referred. So far, therefore, as this court is concerned there would appear to be no answer to the claim of this administrator to retain this debt. What I desire to point out is that I wish the law was not so, but that being the law I must follow it.

That raises a very important question indeed as to the form of the bond which was entered into by the creditor when he obtained letters of administration de bonis non; it is said that this bond deprives him of his right of retainer, and it is said that I ought to construe that bond with reference to the special facts of this case—namely, that there had been an administration decree and a proof of debts in the administration. I cannot do that. This bond is in common form; there is nothing on the face of it to show that it was entered into with reference to this particular estate. How can I construe this bond with reference to the special circumstances of this case in one way, and when that same bond comes before me in another case say that I ought to place a different interpretation on it. I must put upon this bond the proper interpretation, regardless of the special circumstances of this case. When I look at it, it may well be that when the first bond was settled it may have been the object of those who framed it to exclude the right of retainer. I say that, having regard to the observation of Sir James Hannen in the case of In the Goods of Brackenbury, to which my attention has been called, whatever the intention was I can only look at the words of the bond, and unless I can gather that intention from the words of the bond, I cannot regard it.

Now I will look at the bond, and one of the conditions of the bond is that the administrator shall "well and truly administer according to law (that is to say) do pay all and singular the debts which he (the intestate) did owe at his decease in a due course of administration rateably and proportionably, and according to the priority required by law." I pause there before construing the following words to consider what that means. If the words I have read stood alone, it might well be that the administrator might find himself in this unpleasant position—he might have ample assets, and he might have an undoubted creditor of the intestate coming to him and saying, "Please pay my debt out of the assets you have in hand." The administrator might know nothing whatever of the existence of any other debts, and might have every reason to believe the estate solvent. Would it be right that, because of these words, he should be made liable for paying this debt out of the assets, in the event of subsequent debts of which he had no notice turning up? And again, ought he to be considered as having broken his bond because he did not pay all the debts rateably and in proportion?

That would be a strange position in which to place an administrator, and it would be curious to see what the liability was. If an administrator ought to be held entitled when he has ample assets, and knows of the existence of no other debts, to pay the debts he does know of, he ought to be allowed to do so; and, if he may pay other debts, why may he not pay his own. I do not think it was ever intended to place an administrator in this difficult position; but the bond might have been so construed if the words stopped at the place I broke off. But the words do not stop there. I think I have shown a very good reason why they should not; everything preceding is governed, in my opinion, by the following words: "And according to the priority required by law and not unduly preferring his own debt or the debts of any other of the creditors of the said deceased by reason of his being an administrator as aforesaid." It is contemplated that there may be circumstances in a particular case which ought to be considered. Therefore very properly this bond gives him the power of preferring, so long as he does not do it unduly. What does "unduly" mean? How can I hold that an administrator has not a right in a proper case, out of the legal assets to retain a debt due to himself as a trustee. I cannot hold it. It is not "unduly preferring" this debt. Indeed, if as trustee he represents a creditor, he is compellable at the instance of his cestui que trust to enforce his rights. How can I hold that an administrator is unduly preferring his own debt when the law says that he may retain payment of it. I do not see my way so to hold, and for the reasons given I hold that the true construction of this bond still leaves it open to the administrator to retain his own debt so long as the law allows him this right of retainer, and so long as he is not in that respect acting unduly. For these reasons I hold that the administrator is entitled to retain his debt in accordance with this summons, and he will be at liberty to pay the balance into court. Both parties will be allowed their costs.

NUTT v. EASTON. (a.)

Mortgage—Power of sale—Duty of mortgagee exercising—Purchase of mortgaged property by solicitor of mortgagee—Private contract—Validity of sale.

The executrix of a mortgagee, some months after his death, sold the property, which was reversionary, under the power of sale in the mortgage, to E., who had acted as solicitor for the mortgagee in regard to the mortgage and in regard to certain negotiations for selling the property and in proving the mortgagee's will. Notice of the sale was given to N., the owner of the equity of redemption. N. thereupon asserted that he was entitled to the property, but took no step until, more than nine years afterwards, the reversion fell into possession. He then brought an action against the executors of E. to redeem the mortgage and to have the property assigned to him on payment of what was due for principal, interest, and costs.

Held, that, the sale being bonâ fide and a sufficient price having been paid, there was no ground for saying the transaction was null and void, and, assuming that it was voidable, there was no ground of which the plaintiff could avail himself for avoiding it.

The rules for a mortgagee exercising his power of sale laid down in Farrar v. Farrars (Limited), 37 W. R. 196, 40 Ch. D. 395, and in Kennedy v. De Trafford, 45 W. R. 671, [1897] A. C. 180, considered and applied.

In this action it was sought to set aside a sale by a mortgagee of a contingent reversionary interest in stock (with a policy) under the power of sale contained in the mortgage deed, as against the plaintiff, who had purchased the mortgagor's equity of redemption; and to have it declared that an indenture dated the 24th of January, 1888, purporting to be the conveyance on sale of the said property, ought to stand as a security only for the amount of the mortgage principal with interest thereon from the 24th of January, 1888, and for the policy premiums.

By a deed of the 15th of May, 1884, made between W. E. Royou of the one part and R. H. Matthews of the other part, in consideration of £150 advanced by Matthews to Royou, Royou assigned to Matthews both a contingent reversionary legacy invested in stock subject to the life interests of Royou's father and mother and to the contingency of Royou's death in the lifetime of his father, and also a policy, subject, as to both the premises, to redemption on payment of £150 and interest thereon at 8 per cent. per annum; and the said deed contained an absolute power of sale of the premises and a purchaser's protection clause.

By deed of the 9th of October, 1886, made between Royou of the one part and the plaintiff of the other part, in consideration of £15 paid by the plaintiff to Royou, Royou assigned his equity of redemption of the said mortgaged property to the plaintiff absolutely, and notice in writing of this assignment was shortly afterwards given to Matthews.

Royou having made defaulr in payment of two quarters' interest, Matthews sued him and on the 25th of January, 1887, recovered judgment against him for the principal and two quarters' interest at 8 per cent. On the 14th of April, 1887, the mortgaged property was offered for sale on behalf of Matthews at the mart, but was not sold. On the 9th of August, 1887, Matthews died leaving his widow sole executrix.

Easton, who had acted as solicitor for Matthews in the mortgage, and action, and abortive sale at the mart, acted as solicitor for the executrix in proving his will. The plaintiff had been asked by Easton to take over the mortgage security in December, 1886, but took no step. Easton, being pressed by Mrs. Matthews to find a purchaser and being unable to do so, at last agreed to buy for £180, the amount due to the mortgagee for principal, interest, and costs. By deed, dated the 24th of January, 1888, between Mrs. Matthews of the one part and Easton of the other part, in consideration of £180 paid to her by Easton, Mrs. Matthews, in exercise of the power of sale contained in the mortgage of the 15th of May, 1884, assigned to Easton the mortgaged property, subject to the said life interests and contingency free from all equity of redemption; and notice in writing of this assignment was shortly afterwards given to the plaintiff, who wrote to Easton complaining of what had been done, and asserted that he was advised that he was entitled to the property, but took no step. On the 5th of February, 1895, Easton died.

On the 4th of April, 1897, the reversionary interest fell into possession on the death of the survivor of the life tenants. On the 17th of December, 1897, the plaintiff issued the writ in the above action.

Eve, Q.C., and Johnston Edwards, for the plaintiff — As against the mortgagor, in whose shoes Nutt stands, a purchase by the solicitor of the mortgagee cannot be sustained: Martinson v. Clowes, 30 W. R. 795, 21 Ch. D. 857, at p. 860; see also Whitcomb v. Minchin, 5 Madd. 91; Downes v. Grazebrook, 3 Mer. 200, at p. 207—[COZENS-HARDY, J.—The purchaser there was a mere nominee of the vendor.]; Farrar v. Farrars (Limited), 37 W. R. 196, 40 Ch. D. 395. In Lawrance v. Galsworthy, 3 Jur. N. S. 1049, 6 W. R. Ch. Dig. 47, 55, the solicitor of the mortgagee vendor, who as such solicitor had the policy in his possession, bought at the sale by auction, and Stuart, V.C., treated the sale as wholly invalid, and where the sale is by private contract the same rule applies. [COZENS-HARDY, J., referred to the dicta in In re Bloye's Trusts, 1 Mac. & G. 488, at p. 494.] The principle is that the mortgagor is entitled to call on the mortgagee so to conduct a sale under the power of sale as to get a reasonable price, and a sale to a man's own agent is inconsistent with this principle, and therefore invalid: Orme v. Wright, 3 Jur. 972; see also Marriott v. Anchor Reversionary Co., 9 W. R. 726. [COZENS-HARDY, J., referred to Warner v. Jacob, 30 W. R. 731, 20 Ch. D. 220.] Nobody is prejudiced by the delay in paying off, and it makes no difference.

Astbury, Q.C., C. A. Russell, Q.C., and Lewin, for the defendants.—Assuming everything in favour of the plaintiff, he has stood aside for ten years with full knowledge of the circumstances and his rights, and is barred by his delay. Downes v. Grazebrook was quite a different case, and there was no question of laches there. Easton was not Mrs. Matthew's solicitor in the matter of the sale when he bought. If the transaction is bonâ fide, as is admitted. Easton did not buy as her agent. Kennedy v. De Trafford, 45 W. R. 671, [1897] A. C. 180, shows that Orme v. Wright is not law. The solicitor acting for the vendor at the time of and in the purchase—that is, as the vendor's agent for sale—cannot buy on the common law rule of principal and agent. Martinson v. Clowes goes beyond the earlier cases. It is impossible to say that the transaction here was not a sale. It was intended to be, and was a sale. Therefore the plaintiff only relies on an equity. How, then, can he succeed?

They also cited Beckford v. Wade, 17 Ves. 87; Clegg v. Edmondson, 8 De G. M. & G. 787, 5 W. R. Ch. Dig. 60; Levy v. Stogdon, [1899] 1 Ch. 5; and Knight v. Bowyer, 6 W. R. 565, 568.

Eve, in reply.—Easton had notice that there had been no exercise of the power of sale in the plaintiff's view. The plaintiff could therefore redeem, as, and when he pleased, in virtue of the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee subsisting between him and Easton, and was not bound to elect at any particular time whether he would do so or not.

COZENS-HARDY, J.—In my opinion the plaintiff has failed to prove his case. From an early stage I have thought that the case depended on a question of law. There was a time when a mortgagee selling under his power of sale was thought and said to be a trustee for sale subject to all the obligations and disabilities of such a trustee. It was said that he must sell for the best price; that anyone who acted as his agent could not buy for himself—that is, beneficially, from him. But all depends on the question, Is the mortgagee to be regarded as a trustee? If he is not a trustee, it is difficult to see how a transaction between a mortgagee selling under his power and his solicitor can be opened at the instance of the mortgagor. I am happily relieved by the authorities from deciding the point. It was laid down by the Court of Appeal in Farrar v. Farrars (Limited): "A mortgagee with a power of sale, though often called a trustee, is in a very different position from a trustee for sale. A mortgagee is under obligations to the mortgagor, but he has rights of his own which he is entitled to exercise adversely to the mortgagor. A trustee for sale has no business to place himself in such a position as to give rise to a conflict of interest and duty. But every mortgage confers upon the mortgagee the right to realize his security and to find a purchaser if he can, and if in exercise of his power he acts bonâ fide and takes reasonable precautions to obtain a proper price, the mortgagor has no redress, even although more might have been obtained for the property if the sale had been postponed," 37 W. R. 196, 40 Ch. D. 395, pp. 410, 411; and again more strongly and more clearly, if possible, by the House of Lords in Kennedy v. de Trafford: "If a mortgagee, in exercising his power of sale exercises it in good faith without any intention of dealing unfairly by his mortgagors it would be very difficult indeed, if not impossible, to establish that he had been guilty of any breach of duty towards the mortgagor. . . . It is very difficult to define exhaustively all that would be included in the words 'good faith,' but I think it would be unreasonable to require the mortgagee to do more than exercise his power of sale in that fashion," 45 W. R. 671, [1897] A. C. 180, p. 185, per Lord Herschell; "If a mortgagee selling under a power of sale in his mortgage takes pains to comply with the provisions of that power and acts in good faith, I do not think his conduct in regard to the sale can be impeached," p. 192, per Lord Macnaghten.

In the case before me no imputation was made of bad faith. Am I to treat the transaction as not amounting to a sale at all? It was a bonâ fide transaction, and a sufficient price was paid, and there is therefore no ground for saying it is wholly null and void. It bears no resemblance to a sale by a person to a trustee for the vendor, which is no sale at all.

It may possibly be that it is a voidable transaction. I am not, however, satisfied that Mrs. Matthews could have avoided it, and fail to see any ground of which the plaintiff can avail himself, who has never stood in the position of a client to Easton. This is enough to decide the case, but I ought to add that I am not satisfied that Easton ever was solicitor acting in the matter of the sale of this property for some considerable time prior to the assignment to him. The circumstances were known to the plaintiff in January or February, 1888, and according to his own story he then took advice. Knowing, therefore, the facts and his rights, he deliberately stands by for ten years. This being so, no authority is necessary to show that a court of equity will not assist him after such an interval. I dismiss the action with costs.

Bankruptcy — Insolvent estate — Administration — Executor's right of retainer—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 125.

The executrix of an insolvent testator, against whose estate an order for administration in bankruptcy had been made, paid over to the official receiver all such assets of her testator as she had collected, in ignorance of her right to retain the amount of a debt due to her from the testator, for which she presented a proof. On discovering that she had a right to retainer she withdrew her proof before it had been adjudicated upon, and moved for a declaration that she was entitled to retain the amount of the debt due to her.

Held, that the executrix was entitled to her right of retainer.

Motion by the executrix of G. W. Rhoades, deceased, for a declaration of her right to retain out of the assets of the deceased the amount of a debt due to her from him.

G. W. Rhoades died on the 14th of April, 1898; his widow proved his will as executrix, proceeded to collect his assets, and paid the money into her account at Glyn & Co.'s bank. Upon the 11th of July she received notice that a petition had been presented for the administration of the deceased's estate in bankruptcy. An order was made thereon, and the official receiver called upon her to hand over the amount she had collected, which then stood at £895.

The deceased owed Mrs. Rhoades £604, but she, being ignorant of her right to retain her debt, paid over the £895 to the official receiver, and on the 9th of August put in a proof for her debt.

Discovering soon afterwards that she had a right of retainer, she withdrew her proof upon the 15th of August, and applied to the official receiver to recognize her right of retainer. On his refusal she launched the present motion.

Reed, Q.C., and Rolt, for the motion.—The executrix having paid this money over under a mistake of law the court is entitled to deal with the matter: Ex parte James, In re Condon, 22 W. R. 937, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 609; Ex parte Simmonds, In re Carnac, 34 W. R. 421, 16 Q. B. D. 308. In an administration suit the executor never lost his right of retainer by payment into court or to a receiver: In re Harrison, Latimer v. Harrison, 34 W. R. 736, 32 Ch. D. 395.

Whinney, for the official receiver.—The executrix has no right of retainer save so long as she remains executrix, and the effect of the order for administration in bankruptcy divests the property from the executrix and vests it in the trustee. She should have exercised her right of retainer before notice of petition, or at least declared her intention of exercising it: In re Williams, Ex parte Lewis, 8 Morrell, 65; In re Gilbert, 46 W. R. 351, [1898] 1 Q. B. 282.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 29.—WRIGHT, J.—G. W. Rhoades died insolvent on the 14th of April, 1898. His will was proved on the 29th of June by his widow and executrix, who was a creditor for £604 3s. 4d. She proceeded to get in the estate and paid the money which she collected into a bank in her own name.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 11th of July she had notice of a creditor's petition for administration in bankruptcy. On that petition the usual order was made on the 25th of July. On the 30th the official receiver required her to pay to him the assets which she had collected, and she paid them over, and on the 9th of August she put in a proof for her claim. She was then for the first time informed by her solicitor that she had a right of retainer, and on the 15th of August her proof was withdrawn and a claim of retainer was asserted.

The Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 125, enacts by sub-section 4 that an order for administration in bankruptcy shall have "the like consequences . . . as under an administration order made on the petition of a creditor," and by sub-section 5 "the property of the debtor shall vest in the official receiver of the court as trustee thereof, and he shall forthwith proceed to realize and distribute the same."

It seems plain from In re Hubback, 33 W. R. 666, 29 Ch. D. 934, and In re Orme, 50 L. T. Rep. 51, 32 W. R. Dig. 6, that the order for administration did not of itself affect the right of retainer. In the former of these cases, Fry, L.J., said with reference to a balance order under the Companies Acts: "This order is analogous to the old administration decree and the present administration judgment, a form of judgment which it is notorious does not affect the right of retainer of the executor . . . it leaves unaffected all the piorities and all the rights which exist in due course of administration."

In In re Williams, Ex parte Lewis, which was relied on for the official receiver in the present case, the moneys sought to be retained were not received by the executor until after administration order, and the judgment seems to proceed on that ground: as to which, however, see Williams on Executors (9th ed.), vol. 1., p. 886. Nor, I think, would the mere fact of payment into the hands of the official receiver of assets collected by the executor necessarily bar the right of retainer, any more than payment into court—Stahlschmidt v. Lett, 1 Sm. & G. 145; Chissum v. Dewes, 5 Russ. 29; Tipping v. Power, 1 Hare 405; Richmond v. White, 27 W. R. 878, 12 Ch. D. 361; or payment to a receiver in an administration action: In re Harrison, Latimer v. Harrison, If the debt for which the executor claims the right to retain is disputed, as in the present case it was, it would be quite proper that the assets should be handed over to the official receiver, and it would be his duty as trustee for the interested persons to give effect to the right of retainer on proof of the debt.

Then was her right barred by the fact that the payment over to the official receiver by Mrs. Rhoades of the moneys which she had collected was made without reservation of that right and in ignorance of its existence? I do not find that any such contention was raised in the cases which I have cited of payment into court or to receivers; and if it was right for her to pay over the moneys without any express reservation of her retainer, I do not think that in so doing she can be held to have thereby made any election or waived any right, the facts negativing any intention of that kind.

Further, it was held in Ex parte James, In re Condon, that a payment made to a trustee by an execution creditor under a mistake of law may be the subject of relief by the court, and it was said that the trustee is an officer of the court and holds the money in his hands for equitable distribution according to the directions of the court; and this decision was followed and extended in Ex parte Simmonds, In re Carnac, and although it has often been said that retainer is not to be aided where there is no legal right to it, still if there was a legal right to retainer, and it has been suspended by a mere slip through ignorance of a somewhat obscure right, it seems to me that the doctrine of Ex parte James may, if necessary, be applied.

Lastly, it is said that the right is barred by the fact that Mrs. Rhoades has proved for her claim. It was held by Lord Chelmsford in Stammers v. Elliott, 16 W. R. 489, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 195, that the right was barred in a case of bankruptcy where not only had proof been made, but dividends had been received and kept, and several cases (e.g., Ex parte Downes, 18 Ves. 290; Ex parte Solomon, 1 G. & J. 25) decide that a proof may be an abandonment of securities.

But in the present case the proof was withdrawn before adjudication upon it. In In re Deerhurst, Ex parte Seaton, 8 Morrell 258, 39 W. R. Dig. 24, Cave, J., says there is no doubt that a creditor may withdraw his proof before it has been adjudicated upon, and I have not found any contrary decision; and if the executrix had the right to withdraw her proof, it seems to me that upon the withdrawal of it, every consequence dependent on the mere fact of making it, ceases. It might have been otherwise if the proof had been made with knowledge of the right of retainer. That might have been a final election to prove, although it could not have been so intended in this case. In the present case there was a mere slip, without any negligence, and there was no delay in retrieving it.

I think that the claim ought to be allowed.

From Q. B. Div. (A. L. Smith, Collins, and Romer, L.JJ.) — March 28.

THOMPSON AND ANOTHER v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL. (a.)

Practice — Parties — Joinder of defendants—Separate torts—Alternative claims—Negligently letting down house—Ord. 16, r. 7.

The plaintiffs claimed damages by reason of the defendants having negligently excavated the subsoil of the street adjoining the plaintiffs' premises, and so taken away the support thereof, thereby causing a part of the premises to subside. The defendants, in their statement of defence, denied that the injuries complained of were caused by their acts, and alleged that the injuries were caused by the negligence of a water company in leaving their water main insufficiently stopped. The plaintiffs thereupon applied to add the water company as defendants in the action.

Held, that the causes of action against the defendants and the water company were separate and distinct, and that therefore the water company could not be added as defendants.

Appeal from an order of Bigham, J., at chambers.

The plaintiffs were the lessees and occupiers of a house and premises in a street along which the defendants were constructing a sewer under section 135 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The statement of claim alleged that the premises had for more than twenty years been supported by the earth and soil adjoining thereto; that part of the premises consisted of a vault and cellar which extended under the footway of the street; and that the defendants negligently and improperly excavated the earth and soil of the street adjoining the vault and cellar and abstracted the subsoil and subsoil water supporting the premises, by reason whereof the vault and cellar became cracked and injured. The defendants in their statement of defence, while denying negligence, alleged that none of the injuries were caused by the acts complained of, but were caused by the negligence or default of the New River Co. in leaving their water main at a point in front of the premises unstopped or insufficiently and improperly stopped.

The plaintiffs thereupon applied to add the New River Co. as defendants, and the judge at chambers, reversing the order of the master, granted the application.

The defendants, the London County Council, appealed.

F. F. Daldy, for the London County Council.—The claim against the New River Co. is founded upon a different cause of action from that against the London County Council. The learned judge acted upon ord. 16, r. 7, but that rule does not authorize the joinder of distinct causes of action. Order 16 deals with the joinder of parties and not with the joinder of causes of action: Smurthwaite v. Hannay, 43 W. R. 113, [1894] A. C. 494; Sadler v. Great Western Railway Co., 45 W. R. 51, [1896] A. C. 450; Gower v. Couldridge, 46 W. R. 214, [1898] 1 Q. B. 348. Rule 4 applies before action brought. Rule 7 allows a plaintiff during the progress of the action to add a defendant, where he is in doubt as to which of two or more persons his cause of action is against. The cases of principal and agent, where the claim is against the principal upon the contract and against the agent for breach of warranty of authority, stand on a different footing, as the claims against each arise out of one common transaction: Honduras Railway Co. v. Tucker, 25 W. R. 310, 2 Ex. D. 301; Bennetts v. McIlwraith, 45 W. R. 17, [1896] 2 Q. B. 464. The decision in Child v. Stenning, 25 W. R. 519, 5 Ch. D. 695, cannot be supported since the decisions in Smurthwaite v. Hannay and Sadler v. Great Western Railway Co.

H. Tindal Atkinson, for the plaintiffs.—There is here only one cause of action—namely, the subsidence caused by the acts either of the London County Council or of the New River Co. The damage to the premises, and not the excavation, is the cause of action. For that one cause of action, the plaintiffs are uncertain which of two persons is liable. Therefore they can join the two as defendants under ord. 16, r. 7. In both Honduras Railway Co. v. Tucker and Bennett v. McIlwraith there were two causes of action, one against the principal on the contract, and the other against the agent for breach of warranty of authority. These cases are not affected by the decisions in the House of Lords. Child v. Stenning, which has never been overruled, is directly in point.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—In my opinion this appeal must be allowed. The plaintiffs have brought an action against the London County Council for having let down a house of which they were the lessees and occupiers while the county council were doing excavating work in connection with a new sewer. The defence of the county council is that they did not let down the house, but that it was the fault of the New River Co., whose main leaked, and thereby the soil became soaked with water, and it was that which caused the house to subside. The plaintiffs thereupon applied to have the New River Co. added as defendants in the action. The question is, Can they be added? I do not agree that the county council and the New River Co. are not, upon the plaintiff's assumption, independent tortfeasors. The one is sued for letting down the house by excavation work; the other is sought to be sued for allowing the water to escape from the main and thus rendering the soil unfit for the support of the house. The question must be which of the two brought down the house. The law upon the matter has been settled by the House of Lords in Smurthwaite v. Hannay, that order 16 deals with the joinder of parties and not with the joinder of separate causes of action. The authorities before that decision had got into a rather complicated state, but since that decision it is now unnecessary to refer to the earlier cases, because the House of Lords has now laid down that order 16 only applies to joinder of parties. Joinder of causes of action is dealt with in order 18. In my opinion, if the plaintiffs were allowed to join the New River Co. as defendants they would be joining separate causes of action. It is not to the point to say that the damage is the same in each case. The question is, Who is the tortfeasor? It is not a question under rule 7 of order 16 as to which of two defendants is liable upon the one cause of action. The action is an action for misfeasance against the London County Council, and the plaintiffs seek to join in that action a claim for misfeasance against the New River Co. Those are two separate causes of action. In Sadler v. Great Western Railway Co. two railway companies occupied premises, one on each side of the plaintiffs' premises, and each of the companies brought up their vans in front of their own premises, and the plaintiff sued the two companies in one action for obstructing the street and causing him inconvenience and annoyance. In that case Lord Watson, who put the matter very pithily, said: "It is perfectly obvious that the statement of claim for the appellant sets forth two separate and distinct causes of action against two separate defendants. I do not think that upon any fair construction of his pleading there is set forth any joint claim against the defendants. In these circumstances it has been painfully apparent from first to last of the learned argument we have heard that the contention of the appellant is not only unsupported by authority, but is in the teeth of authority." In my opinion, in the present case there are two separate and distinct causes of action against two separate defendants. That decision is binding upon us, and, if I may say so, I entirely agree with it. It is impossible to bring this case within ord. 16, r. 7. It is said that our present decision is in conflict with what we decided in Bennett v. McIlwraith, but I said in that case that "the redress, it will be seen, is sought against two persons, but the right to it arises out of one common transaction." That decision does not in any way offend against anything I am saying now. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. When once it is admitted that the House of Lords has decided that a plaintiff cannot join in one writ separate and distinct causes of action against separate defendants, there is an end of the case. If it were otherwise, the plaintiff might have relied upon rule 7 of order 16. But it is now well-settled that order 16 only applies to joinder of parties. The argument of the plaintiffs seems to me to be based upon a fallacy, that because in this case there was only one damage the cause of action was one, however many separate and distinct persons may have contributed towards it. The fallacy lies in confusing the damnum with the injuria, two things which are quite distinct. That which constitutes the cause of action is the injuria. In this case the acts of the London County Council and of the New River Co. are quite distinct, and constitute separate injuriæ. As the joint result of two alleged independent torts the plaintiffs' premises subsided. There is only one damage, but there are two causes of action. When Bennetts v. McIlwraith is examined it is clear that it does not touch the present case. That was an action against an agent for breach of warranty of authority, and the plaintiffs, being in doubt whether the agent had or had not authority, were held entitled to add the principal as a defendant. There was in that case one contract made by a person purporting to act on behalf of another. There being only one contract, the question was, which of the two broke it. If the agent had authority to make the contract, the principal would be liable; if he had no authority, the agent would be liable. In such a case the plaintiff reaches the agent through a technical claim for breach of warranty of authority, but the agent is liable to the same extent as the person on whose behalf he purported to make the contract would be if he had had authority. The form of action by which he is reached is immaterial. The question is, who is liable on the contract. The present is quite a different case.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

Appeal allowed.

Decision of Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., ante, p. 13, [1898] 2 Q. B. 223, reversed.

Appeal of the defendant Lewis from the judgment of Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., at the trial of the action, reported ante, p. 13, [1898] 2 Q. B. 223.

The action was brought to recover money lent and interest. The defendants were Glenton and Saunders, the present trustees, and Lewis, a former trustee, of the will of Lewis Glenton, who died in 1873. On the 9th of September, 1882, the plaintiffs, at the request of the defendants, took assignments of certain mortgage securities which formed part of the estate of the testator, Lewis Glenton.

The defendants were not parties to these deeds of assignment.

On the same date a deed of declaration of trust was executed to which the plaintiffs and defendants were parties, which recited the above deeds of assignment, and also recited that the plaintiffs, at the request of the defendants, had advanced them the sum of £1,650; and it then provided that the moneys advanced by the plaintiffs should be a first charge upon the transferred mortgage securities, and that no steps should be taken against the mortgaged property or the persons entitled to redeem without the consent in writing of the defendants, such consent only to be refused in case the defendants, within three months after application made to them for such consent, paid off the plaintiffs' claim. The deed contained no express covenant by the defendants to repay the plaintiffs their advance.

Immediately after this assignment the defendant Lewis retired from the trust. The other defendants paid the plaintiffs' interest on the loan up to March, 1896.

The plaintiffs having brought the present action in April, 1897, the defendants set up the defence that the plaintiffs had made the advance solely on the security of the mortgages, and that there was no personal liability on any of the defendants to repay. The defendant Lewis further set up the Statute of Limitations (21 Jac. 1, c. 16), and pleaded that the liability here, if any, was for a simple contract debt which, so far as concerned him, was barred by section 3 of that statute, on the ground that as he had had nothing to do with the trust since 1882 he was within the protection of section 14 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, by virtue of which the payments of interest made by his co-contractors or co-debtors, the other defendants, did not keep the debt alive as against himself.

The plaintiffs, on the other hand, contended that the action did not fall within 21 Jac. 1, c. 16, as it was in substance one to recover a sum of money secured by, or charged upon, or payable out of, land within the meaning of section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, and that the payments of interest by his former co-trustees from time to time kept the claim alive as against Lewis.

Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., held (1) that the whole transaction constituted a loan by the plaintiffs to the defendants, accompanied by the security of the transferred mortgages, and therefore that the defendants were personally liable; and (2) that, even in the absence of a specialty contract or covenant, the case fell within section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, and that 21 Jac. 1, c. 16, being therefore excluded, the defendant Lewis was not entitled to the benefit of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, s. 14, and his liability was kept alive by the payments made by his co-trustees.

From that judgment Lewis alone appealed, and he only appealed on the question as to the Statute of Limitations.

Rufus Isaacs, Q.C. (C. A. Russell, Q.C., and Dr. H. Greenwood with him), for the defendant Lewis.—The sole point is whether section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, defeats the defendant's right to plead in defence to the action 21 Jac. 1, c. 16, and section 3 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856. The plaintiffs admit that this is a simple contract debt, and the defendant Lewis admits that if section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, applies, then the defendant is out of court, because there has been an acknowledgment of liability by part payment. The defendant Lewis relies upon the decision of Stirling, J., in Firth v. Slingsby, 58 L. T. Rep. 481, 36 W. R. Dig. 135, in which this very point was argued. The case of Sutton v. Sutton, 31 W. R. 369, 22 Ch. D. 511, is no authority to the contrary, for all that case decided was that the covenant was held to be gone when the remedy against the land was gone. If, however, the loan is not within section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, that section being merely a replica of section 40 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, then the statute of 21 Jac. 1 applies, and Lewis is protected by section 14 of the Merchantile Law Amendment Act, 1856. Before the Act of 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27) an action to recover on a simple contract debt after twenty years could not be maintained: see Toplis v. Baker, 2 Cox Ch. 118, and Brocklehurst v. Jessop, 7 Sim. 438. Now, a simple contract debt, whether secured by mortgage or not, must be sued on within six years. The plaintiffs' claim against Lewis is therefore barred.

Dickens, Q.C., and H. F. Manisty, for the plaintiffs. — The Act of 1874 repeals the Act of James 1 as to money charged on land whatever the remedy may be. The decision of Stirling, J., in Firth v. Slingsby, relied on by the defendant on the point raised here with regard to the statute of 21 Jac. 1, c. 16, is really no part of the judgment, but a mere obiter dictum. [ROMER, L.J.—I do not agree with that statement. I think that Stirling, J., meant it to be part of his judgment, and we must treat it as such.] Sutton v. Sutton decides that in cases within this section the limitation applies to the personal remedy on the covenant in a mortgage deed as well as to the remedy against the land, and that therefore an action on the covenant will be barred unless brought within twelve years from the accrual of the right. [ROMER, L.J.—That merely decides that the limitation is not confined to the remedy against the land. But you want to make the decision say you may bring either class of action within twelve years—which it does say, and also that you may bring neither class of action afterwards—which it does not say.] We submit that the provisions of the Act of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, and the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, together form a code as to land and all charges thereon, and overrule the provisions thereto enacted by the statute of James 1. The later Acts cover all common law actions relating to money charged or secured on land. When Toplis v. Baker was decided there was no statute relating to money charged on land, and the present question had never then arisen. Brocklehurst v. Jessop was decided only one year after 3 & 4 Will. 4 was passed, and the question would not be present to the mind of the court. Before Sutton v. Sutton was decided, it was thought that the Act of 1874 only applied to the remedy against the land. It is quite clear that section 8 of that statute applies to any action at law, even to any action on a simple contract, and it would seem, therefore, that a simple contract debt is taken out of the statute of James although a simple contract debt may be paid out of real estate within twelve years. In re Stephens, 4 Ch. D. 39, 38 W. R. Dig. 116. [ROMER, L.J.—The case is really against you, see judgment of Kay, L.J. pp. 44, 45.]

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The action that gave rise to this appeal raised a new point, but fortunately there is no controversy between the parties as to the facts. It was an action brought for money lent upon a simple contract loan secured by a charge upon land, and admittedly the action was not brought until more than six years had elapsed from the date when the right of action first accrued.

The real point is whether or no the statute of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, or if you like it the Real Property Limitation Act of 1874, which modified its provisions in some particulars, has repealed the main provisions of 21 Jac. 1, c. 16, s. 3, in case of a simple contract debt charged upon land, where the creditor has slept on his right to recover such debt for more than six years and the debtor sets up as a defence the earlier statute. In whose favour was the statute of James passed? Undoubtedly in favour of the debtor. Bearing in mind that fact, where do you find in any statute an enactment that deprives the debtor of this plea? It was argued that sections 8 and 11 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, cut down the debtor's right. Speaking for myself I do not think that that is the case, and I think that the right that a simple contract debtor had under the statute of James, was not touched by the provisions referred to in the later Act. It is clear also that while the Act of James applied to simple contract debts, the provisions of the Act of 1874 applies them to the case of specialty debts also. It was argued that in Sutton v. Sutton it had been decided that the limitation of twelve years imposed by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, on actions to recover money charged on land, applies to the personal remedy on a covenant in a mortgage deed as well as to the remedy against the land. The decision did not touch the case of an action not upon a covenant, but for a simple contract debt, and all really decided was that in cases within this section the limitation applies to the personal remedy on the covenant in a mortgage deed as well as to the remedy against the land, and, therefore, that an action on a covenant will be barred unless brought within twelve years from the accrual of the right. Then how does that decision hamper the case we have to deal with. When the case was before the court the point we are now considering was not raised, and I am at a loss to know how anything that was then said could be an authority for us. As to the other cases cited, Toplis v. Baker, Brocklehurst v. Jessop, and In re Stephens, as far as they go they are really in favour of the appellant's contention. In Firth v. Slingsby, Stirling, J., deals expressly with the very point we have to decide, and in his judgment he gives it as his opinion that the provisions of the statute of James were still in force in cases of this sort. Again, the text-books, including the last edition of Darby and Bosanquet, are all in favour of the appellant's contention. I think the Lord Chief Justice was led to take an erroneous view of this question because the main argument was directed to the point whether the money was charged upon land, and to the case of Sutton v. Sutton, which, as I before said, is really an authority here; whereas the decision of Stirling, J., in Firth v. Slingsby, which covers it, was not referred to when the action was argued. For these reasons the appeal must be allowed.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is said that section 8 of the Act of 1874 now covers this question in regard to all classes of actions, whether founded on a simple contract or a specialty debt, when read with the decision in Sutton v. Sutton. It is therefore necessary to see how the law stood after the passing of the Act of 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27), since the Act of 1874 is merely an amending Act, and merely affects the question to this extent—that it cuts down the period in which such actions can be brought from twenty years to twelve. Now, the Act of James enacted that six years should be a bar to actions on a simple contract debt. How, therefore, can a subsequent statute imposing a wider limitation over a larger area extend the limitation already imposed on part of that area by a prior Act? Both Acts were passed in favour of the debtor, and he is entitled to the benefit they give him whenever his case falls within either. Sutton v. Sutton therefore has no bearing on the present question. Even assuming that decision applies to a simple contract debt, its provisions merely embrace actions against a person as well as actions against the land. Suppose it does; it only imposes a fetter which does not enlarge the rights of the creditor. This view is strengthened by the preamble to the Act of 1874, which describes the Act as one for the further limitation of actions and suits relating to real property. The whole point is that this Act of 1874 is not an enabling Act at all, as was pointed out by Stirling, J., in Firth v. Slingsby. That fact underlies the whole argument. I think that Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., came to a wrong decision in this case because Sutton v. Sutton was given such undue prominence to during the argument.

ROMER, L.J.—Before 1883 the appellant could certainly have pleaded the statute of James, since the action was one to enforce a simple contract debt charged on land: Toplis v. Baker, Brocklehurst v. Jessop. Then came the Act of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, amended by the Act of 1874; and by the decision in Sutton v. Sutton it must be admitted that the sections of the Act of Will. 4 applicable to this case were not confined, as was previously thought, to actions to raise money out of the land, but included in their provisions what I may call personal actions as well. Except so far, the case of Sutton v. Sutton has no bearing on this case. What we have to consider is whether the Acts of 1833 and 1874 repealed the provisions of James' Act in favour of debtors and increased the rights of creditors. In my opinion neither of the later statutes were intended to take away from debtors, rights they previously possessed, or to give, on the other hand, additional rights to creditors. [His lordship having read section 40 of the Act of 1833 and section 8 of the Act of 1874, said:] I find nothing in these sections which directly or by implication repeals the rights given to debtors by the statute of James to plead limitation. In my judgment these later statutes were intended to give extra rights to debtors to resist the claims of their creditors. The two sets of Acts are perfectly consistent, and the provisions of the later enactments cannot be taken to repeal the advantage given to debtors by the Act of James. Read together they mean, in substance, this—that no action for a simple contract debt, whether chargeable on land or not, shall be brought after six years, and that no action to recover any debt chargeable on land, even though it be a specialty debt, shall be brought after twelve years. The Act of 1874 does not say that an action may be brought at any time within twelve years; it only says that no action shall be brought after that period. The object of the statutes was not to enlarge the rights of action, but to cut down the period within which alone the action might be brought.

Appeal allowed, with costs.

"THE VORTIGERN." (a.)

Ship — Charter-party — Warranty of seaworthiness— Voyage divided into stages for coaling purposes.

Where, in a contract for sea carriage, the voyage is such that it is not reasonably possible for the steamer to carry, in addition to her cargo, sufficient coals to take her from her port of loading to her ultimate destination, and the voyage is therefore, for coaling purposes, divided into stages, there is an implied warranty that the vessel shall, at the commencement of each stage, be seaworthy so far as regards the supply of coal necessary for that stage.

Appeal from the judgment of Barnes, J., in favour of the defendants.

By a charter-party it was agreed between the plaintiffs, the owners of the steamship Vortigern and the defendants as charterers that the ship should, proceed to Cebu, in the Philippine Islands, and there load a cargo of Philippine produce and proceed therewith to Liverpool, and deliver the same on being paid a lump sum freight of £4,000, calling at Marseilles, if so ordered, and if Marseilles not used the freight to be £125 less; the ship to have liberty to call at any ports in any order; the act of God, perils of the sea, . . . collision, stranding, dangers of navigation or machinery, negligence, default, or error in judgment of the owners, pilot, master, and crew, or other servants of the shipowners excepted. The defendants shipped at Cebu, amongst other cargo, 500 tons of copra in bags for conveyance to Liverpool. According to the engineer's log the voyage was, for coaling purposes, divided into three stages, the first stage being from Cebu to Colombo, the second from Colombo to Suez, and the third from Suez to Liverpool. The ship called at Colombo, where she took in coals, and she passed Perim without calling there to coal owing to the erroneous report of the engineer as to the quantity of coals in the ship's bunkers, and when in the Red Sea the coals ran short, and the master mixed 828 bags of the copra with the coal and burnt it as fuel. Upon the arrival of the ship at Liverpool the plaintiffs refused to deliver the cargo unless the defendants made a deposit against general average of £559, and the defendants were compelled to make this deposit, and they paid to the plaintiffs the freight, less £590,* the value of the copra burnt. The plaintiffs thereupon brought this action to recover £590, the balance of the freight, and the defendants counterclaimed to recover £559, which they had been compelled to deposit against general average.

* The defendants had deducted from the total freight the sum of £610, but in their defence they paid £20 into court, leaving £590 deducted as the value of the copra burnt.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Barnes, J., found upon the facts that the ship when she started from Colombo had not sufficient coals to take her to Suez, and that she was in that respect unseaworthy for that stage of the voyage; and he held, upon the authority of Thin v. Richards, 40 W. R. 617, [1892] 2 Q. B. 141, that the implied warranty of seaworthiness attached at the commencement of each stage of the voyage. He accordingly entered judgment for the defendants upon the claim and counterclaim.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Scrutton and D. Stephens, for the plaintiffs.—The learned judge was wrong in holding that the implied warranty of seaworthiness attached at commencement of each stage of the voyage. Where there is one entire voyage the warranty of seaworthiness attaches at the commencement of the voyage only: Bermon v. Woodbridge, 2 Doug. 781. In the present case the ship was seaworthy for the entire voyage on leaving Cebu, but as regards perishables, such as coals, stores, &c., she had as much as was necessary to take her to the first usual place of replenishment. It was commercially impossible for her to take in coals at Cebu for the whole voyage to Liverpool. There is no absolute warranty that the ship, before starting on the second stage of the voyage, will take on board sufficient coals and stores for that stage; there is only a promise or an undertaking that the servants of the shipowner will take due care to replenish the stock, and the exception of liability for the negligence of the master and crew and other servants of the shipowner covers this. The principle is clearly laid down in Dixon v. Sadler, 5 M. & W. 405; Burgess v. Wickham, 11 W. R. 992, 3 B. & S. 669; Bouillon v. Lupton, 11 W. R. 966, 33 L. J. C. P. 37; and 1 Arnould on Marine Insurance (2nd ed.), p. 711, where a voyage divided into a river voyage and a sea voyage is discussed. In Thin v. Richards the voyage was a short one, and the court did not decide the case upon the ground that the voyage was divided into stages. [They also contended that the proper conclusion from the facts was that the ship started from Colombo with sufficient coal to take her to Suez and that the coal ran short owing to the engines breaking down. They further contended that the sacrifice was a general average sacrifice to which the defendants had to contribute, though this question would not arise if the implied warranty of seaworthiness had been broken.]

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and J. Mansfield (Horridge with them), for the defendants.—This being a voyage, which on account of its length has to be divided for coaling purposes into stages, the implied warranty of seaworthiness as regards the coal supply attaches at the commencement of each stage: Thin v. Richards. The ship must either take in coal at the commencement of the voyage for the whole voyage, or if it only takes in coal for the first stage it must replenish the coal at each stage. The law applicable to voyages divided into stages, each of which entails a different equipment, is discussed in 1 Arnould on Marine Insurance (2nd ed.), p. 711; Dixon v. Sadler; Quebec Marine Insurance Co. v. Commercial Bank of Canada, 18 W. R. 769; L. R. 3 P. C. 234; Bouillon v. Lupton. [They also contended that it was not a general average loss.]

Cur. adv. vult.

March 11.—A. L. SMITH, L.J., read the following judgment: This is an action by the owners of the steamship Vortigern to recover from the defendants the sum of £610, being for freight under a charterparty dated the 6th of August, 1897, and the defendants defend themselves upon the ground that the cargo, which belonged to them, and which consisted of copra (a species of cocoanut), had during the voyage been burnt up by the captain as fuel for the ship, and that this burning up of the cargo had taken place in consequence of the breach of the implied warranty of seaworthiness which attached to the contract of affreightment at the commencement of the voyage—that is, that coal necessary for the due prosecution of the voyage had not been taken on board when the ship commenced the chartered voyage, and the cargo had therefore to be used as fuel in the place of coal. The defence depends upon a point of law and a question of fact. The value of the cargo burnt equalled the freight claimed excepting as to £20 which was paid into court by the defendants. The charter-party was in ordinary form, and was for a voyage by the plaintiffs' steamship from Cebu, in the Philippine Islands, to Liverpool, calling at Marseilles if ordered. By this charter-party the steamship had liberty to call at any ports in any order, and by the charter-party dangers of navigation or machinery, negligence, default, or error in judgment of the owners, pilot, master, and crew, or other servants of the shipowner were excepted. The point of law is, as to what implied warranty of seaworthiness attaches to a contract of affreightment upon a voyage such as the present when from the necessity of the case the ship cannot start upon the chartered voyage with an equipment of coal on board sufficient for the whole voyage if the ship is to be a cargo carrying vessel, which it clearly was the intention of all parties that it should be. It cannot be denied that the implied warranty which primâ facie attaches to a charter-party such as the present is that the ship shall be seaworthy for the voyage at the time of sailing, by which is meant that it shall then be in a fit state as to repairs, equipment, and crew, and in all other respects sufficient to take the ship in ordinary circumstances to its port of destination, though there is no warranty that the ship shall continue seaworthy during the voyage. That coals are part of the equipment of a steamship I do not doubt, and if the voyage in this case had been an ordinary voyage, as to which there was no necessity, as regards taking in coal, by dividing it into stages, it cannot be denied that the steamship was unseaworthy when she started from Cebu on her voyage to Liverpool, for the simple reason that she had not then on board an equipment of coal sufficient to take her in ordinary circumstances to her port of destination. To obviate this difficulty—and a great difficulty it is in cases of long voyages of cargo-carrying steamships (for it is manifest that no cargo-carrying steamship can ever be seaworthy when she starts upon such a voyage as the present by reason of the impossibility of her having on board such an equipment of coal as will be sufficient to take her to the port of destination)—it has become the practice by reason of the necessity of the case for cargo-carrying steamship owners to divide these long voyages into stages for the purpose of replenishing their ships with coal, and thus as far as practicable complying with the warranty of seaworthiness which attached when the ship commenced its voyage. This practice was resorted to in the present case, for I find by the engineer's log that the voyage was divided into stages, and it appears from the average adjustment that the cargo-owners subsequently acquiesced therein, the first stage being from Cebu to Colombo, in Ceylon, the second from Colombo to Suez, and the third from Suez to Liverpool. At Colombo the ship accordingly called and took in coal for the second stage, but the learned judge has found and there certainly was evidence to support his finding that the ship did not at Colombo take in a sufficient of coal for the second stage to Suez, and thus, by reason of the coal falling short whilst passing up the Red Sea, the defendants' copra was resorted to in order to carry the ship on to Suez, where she again coaled, and so was enabled to perform her chartered voyage to Liverpool.

As to the question of fact, it was argued on behalf of the plaintiffs, that the learned judge was in error in finding that the ship was not fully equipped with coal when it started upon the second stage—from Colombo to Suez—and this argument was principally based upon the engineer's log; but this document, when looked at, has been so much altered that little, if any, reliance can be placed thereon. In my opinion Barnes, J., has dealt with this question of fact in the proper manner by investigating the amount of coal consumed by the ship at different parts of the voyage, and I agree not only in the result he has arrived at, but with the reasons he has given, which are fully set out in his judgment.

I come to the point of law, which is this—What was the implied warranty, if any (it matters not whether it is called a warranty or an absolute condition), when the ship started upon the second stage from Colombo to Suez? Was there then an implied warranty that she had a sufficiency of coal on board for this second stage—that is, that she was seaworthy for that stage? This is the real point in the case. The shipowners assert that there is no such warranty, and that the sole obligation they were then under to the cargo-owners was that their master and crew should not negligently omit to take in coal at Colombo or during the stages subsequent to the first stage, and that, although the ship might during the second stage in this case have put into Perim and obtained coal, and although it might be negligence for the master and crew not to have done so, as negligence of master and crew is excepted by the charter-party the shipowners are not liable to the cargo-owners for having burnt up their cargo for fuel as they did. Now reduce this contention of the shipowners into a concrete case to see what in practice it amounts to. Take, for instance, the case of a cargo-carrying steamship commencing a voyage of some 5,000 miles in length, and the shipowners, for coaling purposes by reason of the necessity of the case, having to divide the voyage into five stages of 1,000 miles each. The shipowners must admit that they warrant to the cargo-owners that their ship has a sufficiency of coal on board for the whole voyage, when it commenced that voyage, but they assert that by reason of their dividing the voyage into stages, although for their own purposes, this warranty is thus cut down to the first stage of 1,000 miles, and that as regards the residue of the stages (4,000 miles in all) there is no warranty that the ship has a single ton of coal on board, and that the only liability they are under to the cargo-owners during the residue of the voyage is for the negligence, if any, of their master and crew for not taking coal on board when they might have done, and, as negligence of master and crew is excepted by the charter-party, the shipowners are under no liability whatever to the cargo-owners during the transit of the 4,000 miles; and I am asked to hold that this is the true meaning of the charter-party in the present case. I certainly cannot do so. On the other hand, the contention of the cargo-owners is that, whether the shipowners divide the chartered voyage into stages or not for coaling purposes, that has nothing to do with them, but if from the necessity of the case the shipowners do so, the cargo-owners in no way abandon the undoubted warranty they have at the commencement of the voyage. The only way in which this warranty can be complied with is for the shipowners to extend the existing warranty to the commencement of each stage, and I can see no reason why such a warranty should not be implied, and I have no difficulty in making the implication, for it is the only way the clear intention of the parties can be carried out and the undoubted and admitted warranty complied with. It appears to me to be no answer to say that it is a warranty subsequent to the commencement of the voyage. In my judgment, when a question of seaworthiness arises either between a steamship owner and his underwriter upon a voyage policy or between a steamship owner and a cargo-owner upon a contract of affreightment, and the underwriter or cargo-owner establishes that the ship at the commencement of the voyage was not equipped with a sufficiency of coal for the whole of the contracted voyage, it lies upon the shipowner, in order to displace this defence, which is a good one, to prove that he had divided the voyage into stages for coaling purposes by reason of the necessity of the case, and that at the commencement of each stage the ship had on board a sufficiency of coal for that stage—in other words, was seaworthy for that stage—and if he fails in this he fails in defeating the issue of unseaworthiness which primâ facie has been established against him. In each case it is a matter for proof as to where the necessity of the case requires that each stage should be, and I think that in the present case the necessity for coaling places at Colombo and Suez has been established. The question of dividing up voyages into stages, as regards the warranty of seaworthiness, is by no means destitute of authority. There are numerous cases decided upon policies of marine insurance when the voyage is divided into stages, and there is also a case in this court relating to the warranty of seaworthiness upon a contract of affreightment when the voyage was divided into stages. As regards the first class of cases it suffices to cite from a judgment of Lord Penzance, when delivering the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, consisting of himself, Sir William Erle, and Giffard, L.J., in the case of Quebec Marine Insurance Co. v. Commercial Bank of Canada, 18 W. R. 769, at p. 771, L. R. 3 P. C. 234, at p. 241, where the numerous prior authorities relating to voyages consisting of different stages are referred to: "The case of Dixon v. Sadler, 5 M. & W. 414, and the other cases which have been cited, leave it beyond doubt that there is seaworthiness for the port, seaworthiness in some cases for the river, and seaworthiness in some cases, as in a case that has been put forward of a whaling voyage, for some definite, well-recognized, and distinctly separate stage of the voyage. This principle has been sanctioned by various decisions; but it has been equally well decided that the vessel, in cases where these several distinct stages of navigation involve the necessity of a different equipment or state of seaworthiness, must be properly equipped, and in all respects seaworthy for each of those stages of the voyage respectively at the time when she enters upon each stage, otherwise the warranty of seaworthiness is not complied with. It was argued that the obligation thus cast upon the assured to procure and provide a proper condition and equipment of the vessel to encounter the perils of each stage of the voyage necessarily involves the idea that between one stage of the voyage and another he should be allowed an opportunity to find and provide that further equipment which the subsequent stage of the voyage requires; and no doubt that is so. But that equipment must, if the warranty of seaworthiness is to be complied with, be furnished before the vessel enters upon that subsequent stage of the voyage which is supposed to require it." Read into this judgment the word "shipowner" in the place of "the assured," and the judgment is in point in the present case. There is no difference between the implied warranty of seaworthiness which attaches at the commencement of the voyage in the case of an assured shipowner and in the case of a shipowner under a contract of affreightment. In each case the shipowner warrants that his ship is seaworthy at the commencement of the voyage. What Lord Blackburn said in Steel v. State Line Steamship Co., 3 App. Cas. 72, at p. 86, 26 W. R. Dig. 216, in the House of Lords, as to the warranty of seaworthiness which attaches to "contracts for sea carriage" shows that it is the same warranty as that which attaches when a shipowner insures his ship with an underwriter. The judgment of the Privy Council contemplates, it will be seen, stages of necessity, and I can see no difference in principle between physical stages of necessity and other stages of necessity as to the implication of a warranty attaching thereto. But there is also the case in this court in the year 1892 of Thin v. Richards & Co., 40 W. R. 617, [1892] 2 Q. B. 141, which I am unable to distinguish on principle from the present. It was an action by cargo-owners against shipowners for non-delivery of cargo, and the point which arose was as to whether there had been a breach of the warrantry of seaworthiness when the ship commenced its voyage. The ship was chartered for a voyage from Oran, in Algiers, to Garston Dock, Liverpool, with liberty to call at any ports in any order. There was also an exception as to the negligence of the master and crew. According to usual practice, the ship, having left Oran with a light cargo of Esparto grass, proceeded to Huelva, in Spain, and there filled up with iron ore, and was subsequently lost on her chartered voyage. It was proved that when the ship left Oran on her voyage she had not a sufficiency of coal on board to take her to Liverpool, nor did she fill up at Huelva with a sufficiency of coal to take her on to Liverpool. The not taking on board sufficient coal at Huelva arose by reason of the negligence of the engineer. This court (Lord Esher, M.R., Fry and Lopes, L.JJ.) held that, whether the voyage was to be taken as a voyage from Oran to Liverpool, or a voyage divided into stages—that is, from Oran to Huelva, and from there to Liverpool, the ship was unseaworthy, and gave judgment accordingly, for, said the court, whether the voyage is taken to be an undivided voyage from Oran to Liverpool, or a voyage divided into stages, the ship was unseaworthy, for if the commencement of the voyage be taken as from Oran, she had not then a sufficiency of coal on board for the voyage from Oran to Liverpool, or if the commencement of the voyage be the stage from Huelva to Liverpool, she had not then sufficient coal on board for that stage, and consequently, whichever the voyage was, the implied warranty had been broken. The doubt expressed by Lord Esher as to whether it was a voyage divided into stages seems to me to have been, not that a voyage could never be divided into stages, if the necessity of the case required it, but whether in such a comparatively short voyage from Oran to Liverpool the necessity of dividing the voyage into stages had been satisfied by proof. In my judgment Barnes, J., was correct when he held upon the facts of this case that there was a necessity for dividing the voyage for coaling purposes into stages into which it was divided, and that therefore the warranty of seaworthiness existed at the commencement of the second stage at Colombo, and that the ship had not then sufficient coal on board for this second stage, and that the defendants were right in their contention. This decides the case in favour of the defendants, and it is unnecessary to embark upon the point raised as to general average. The judgment of Barnes, J., must be affirmed, and this appeal dismissed with costs.

COLLINS, L.J., read the following judgment: I will add a few words to the judgment which has just been delivered. I think the difficulties which have been suggested in this case are very much diminished when it is realized that the warranty of seaworthiness has always been relative. Though absolute when it attached, its precise extent and limitations were relative, and varied according to the standard which the parties must have been supposed to contemplate as applicable to the adventure. A good instance of this principle is to be found in Burgess v. Wickham, 11 W. R. 992, 3 B. & S. 669, where the standard of seaworthiness required was determined by reference to the class of the vessel which to the knowledge of both parties was intended to be insured. That was a case of a vessel built for river navigation sent on an ocean voyage, and the warranty was held to be satisfied by proof that it had been made as fit as was reasonably possible for a vessel of such a description. The cases cited by my brother Smith are other instances of the same principle. The custom of a particular trade (e.g., the Greenland whale fishery) or the convenience of the parties to a particular adventure may make it reasonable that the vessel should be equipped up to a different standard at different stages of the voyage, and the warranty of seaworthiness has to be adjusted accordingly. It is a necessary corollary of this principle of varying standards at different stages that at each stage the vessel shall conform to the standard required for that stage. I regard this not so much as a concession to the shipowner as an adjustment of the standard of seaworthiness to the requirements which the conditions of the adventure, according to the understanding and convenience of both parties, demand. To come to the case before us, it is obvious that the convenience of both parties required that the adventure should be carried out by a steamer, and that it was not reasonably possible for the steamer in question to carry coals enough, in addition to her cargo, to carry the vessel to her ultimate destination at a reasonable rate of consumption for a vessel of her class. It is obvious, therefore, that the common purpose could not be reasonably carried out unless the vessel's stock of coal should be from time to time replenished. The warranty of seaworthiness, therefore, must be construed by reference to the reasonably possible standard applicable to such a vessel on such a voyage. The voyage, therefore, for this purpose must be looked upon as divided into stages, with the necessary incident that the warranty must be adjusted accordingly. It follows that the warranty must cover a condition that the vessel shall at the commencement of each stage be in this respect seaworthy for that stage. The warranty was, as I have pointed out, in its inception relative—that is to say, varying according to the standard reasonably applicable to the contemplated conditions. Following the process of evolution through which modern commerce has passed, the warranty must be made to conform to modern exigencies—that is, to the rules of convenience which regulate the practice of merchants in respect to particular voyages. To say, as Mr. Scrutton contended, that the warranty is limited to the first stage, and is satisfied if the vessel is fit to perform it, is, as it seems to me, to ignore the principles out of which the doctrine of stages was evolved, and to accept it partially only and not in its entirety. The doctrine of stages involves a recurring obligation to bring the vessel up to the required standard at each stage. It cannot be accepted with an illogical limitation. It must be accepted altogether or not at all. Accepting, as I do, Barnes, J.'s, findings of fact for the reasons given by him and my brother Smith, it follows that, whether Colombo to Suez or to Port Said is regarded as the second stage in the contemplated voyage, the warranty of seaworthiness as to coal supply was not made good, to which, of course, negligence (though excepted) is no answer, and therefore that the shipowners are liable to make good the value of the copra consumed by reason of the breach of warranty. The question in this case is as to coal only, but the subject-matter as to which the voyage, for the purpose of applying the warranty of seaworthiness, may be deemed to be divided, and what the stages are to be, must be determined in each case by reference to what must be taken as the exigencies of the adventure as contemplated by the parties having regard to the ordinary course of a business.

A. L. SMITH, L.J., said that the Lord Chief Justice asked him to state that he agreed with the judgments which had been delivered.

Appeal from Wright, J.

The bankrupt Gieve, who carried on business (under the style of John Shaw) as an outside broker, had had various dealings with the claimant James Moss, a commission agent. The claim was for a sum of £2,323, consisting of £195, the balance due by the bankrupt in respect of stocks and shares bought and sold for the claimant, and £2,128 damages for non-delivery of 400 Canadian Pacific Railway shares bought by the claimant in May and June, 1897.

The sold notes issued by the bankrupt were in the form, "I beg to advise having sold to you," and contained after spaces headed "Amount," "Description," "Cover," and "Price," the words, "Plus one-eight if stock is taken up." The bought notes were as follows, "I beg to advise having bought of you . . . Less one-eighth if stock is delivered." All contracts were subject to conditions which were printed on the back of the note, and were substantially the same on sold notes and on bought notes.

Condition 1: "All stocks or shares become closed without notice whenever the cover is exhausted . . ."

No. 2: "The stocks or shares to which this contract refers, unless closed prior to the first day of the account, must either be delivered or carried over to the next account. If to be delivered the certificate or scrip must reach me before twelve o'clock on the first day of the account."

Nos. 3 and 4 contained further provisions as to "cover." and similar matters.

No. 5: "It is to be distinctly understood that I am prepared to deliver" [or, "to accept delivery of"] "the stock or shares to which this contract refers if demanded, but require cash on the first day of the account for securities I have to deliver customers [or, "if required, and will pay cash if desired at any time subject to discount for cash"]."

Prior to the transactions in Canadian Pacific shares the claimant had had many small dealings with the bankrupt, but the shares had in no case been actually delivered or paid for. After the purchase of the Canadian Pacific shares the claimant was not in a position to take them up without borrowing the money, and he did not in fact pay cash on the first day of the account. The shares having largely risen in price, he did, however, on the 7th of December, 1897, demand delivery, which demand was refused, or at least not complied with. Gieve having become bankrupt, the claimant claimed to prove for the above-mentioned sum.

Before the registrar and before Wright, J., it was contended that the claim arose out of a gambling transaction, and was bad under section 18 of the Gaming and Wagering Act, 1845. The registrar accordingly disallowed the claim; but Wright, J., though expressing considerable doubt as to whether the transactions were not contracts merely for the payment of differences and so of the nature of gaming and wagering, held that they were not sufficiently proved to be of that character, and admitted the proof. Gieve's trustee in bankruptcy appealed.

LINDLEY, M.R.—We have had an opportunity of considering this case, which was begun a week ago, and we are all agreed about it. The question turns, of course, on the true construction of the Act of 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 109), s. 18 of which enacts that "all contracts or agreements, whether by parol or in writing, by way of gaming or wagering, shall be null and void." We have therefore to consider whether this is a "contract or agreement by way of gaming or wagering." Of course, if it is an agreement to buy or sell stock for delivery, and if the stock is to be paid for, the Act has no application at all. But if the real object and the real effect of the agreement is to provide for the payment of differences, and nothing else, then it is plainly an agreement to which the Act does apply. That has been settled by a series of decisions to which I need not refer at present. Where the learned judge in the court below went wrong, as I think, was in not attending sufficiently to the terms of the agreement itself. To my mind—subject to a question of law to which I will address myself presently — the agreement, on the face of it, is a gaming and wagering agreement. The form of the transaction is that Gieve begs to advise having sold so much of a certain stock at a certain price, for account. If that were all it would be an ordinary sold note, and you could not say there was anything on the face of it to show that the parties did not mean what they said. In that case the party alleging that the transaction was within the Act would have to prove, by parol, if he could, that the contract was a gaming and wagering one, and that this sold note did not represent the real meaning of the parties to it. But here you have something else—namely, that the price mentioned is to be paid, "Plus one-eighth if the stock is taken up." Now, what does that mean? "Plus one-eighth if taken up": that shows plainly that they did not really contemplate the taking up of the stock. The buyer need not take it up at all unless he likes. If he does not he must pay the difference. On the face of it, this is not in truth a bargain for the sale of the stock. That, I think, is where Wright, J., has failed to give effect to the terms of the agreement. Both parties, it is plain, intended to act upon this bargain, and its terms amounted to a wagering contract.

If we look at the conditions subject to which the contract is stated to be issued, they point to the same conclusion. Those conditions, to my mind, look much more like a bargain for the payment of differences than an ordinary sold note. I do not say that "cover" is not applicable to other transactions than agreements for payments of differences. It is not merely the use of the word "cover" that I rely upon. But when you look at the terms altogether, it appears to me that the true effect of the contract, as really intended by both the parties, is this—that this is a bargain for the payment of differences, but that if the buyer likes to pay to the seller the stipulated price and one-eighth more, then the seller will deliver the stock to the buyer.

That state of facts gives rise to the question of law, whether such a contract is within the Gaming and Wagering Act of 1845. There, it appears to me, the case in the House of Lords of Universal Stock Exchange v. Strachan is very important. The appellants' counsel there had argued for this proposition (p. 169), that "even if the present contracts were for the payment of differences only, the power in either party to turn that into real contracts of sale and purchase by insisting on delivery prevents them from being contracts of gaming and wagering within the Act of 1845." I can understand that argument. It was based partly on the case of Shaw v. Caledonian Railway Co., and partly on that of Universal Stock Exchange v. Stevens. But the House of Lords repudiated the proposition, and Lord Herschell, in his speech, expressly addresses himself to it. He says he would never sanction such a view. So if you have an agreement which is on the face of it a gaming and wagering agreement, and superadded to it there is a clause giving the purchaser the option of actual purchase, that does not make the agreement a good one.

To say that this was not a gaming and wagering transaction we must decide the mixed question of law and fact against the trustee. I have not the slightest doubt that the parties really meant what they said. The terms of the bargain make it a bargain for differences, plus an option given to the buyer to demand delivery on payment of an increased price. But the seller can never call on the buyer to take delivery. The buyer could answer, "No. I shall not pay for the stock; I shall only pay the differences." The appeal must therefore be allowed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The main question in the case is the construction of the contract notes, which give an option to the purchaser to take up the stock. He may, if he chooses, by payment of an extra sum equal to one-eighth of the contract price, obtain delivery of the stock. It is plain that that is a contract for the payment of differences, and nothing else, and cannot be turned into anything else except by means of something to be done by the purchaser in a particular case. I think there is not sufficient to blind the court to the fact that this option was never intended to be acted upon at all. When it happened that the purchaser had an extraordinary run of luck in a particular stock, then he demanded delivery. But I do not find that he ever complied or offered to comply with the stipulation that he should pay one-eighth more. I do not see that the vendor under this contract was to be under the obligation of keeping the stock as long as the purchaser liked, and that at any time, perhaps months after, the purchaser might come and take delivery. I think this is, on the face of it, substantially a contract for payment of differences, and cannot be turned into a genuine transaction by simply giving one of the parties an option to take delivery on making an extra payment. The thing is substantially within the meaning of the words "contract or agreement by way of gaming or wagering." I think Wright, J., would have adopted the same view if he had had his attention called to the exact terms of the agreement.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree. This proof was rejected by the registrar because this was a gambling transaction. I have no doubt myself that the proper finding in fact here is that this transaction, and all these transactions between Moss and Gieve were gambling transactions. Wright, J., came to a different conclusion on the facts. If I thought his conclusion of fact was based upon the credit he gave to the witnesses who gave oral evidence before him, I should hesitate very much before I gave effect to a different view in my own mind as to that evidence, because I consider it a matter of the very highest importance that when witnesses have given oral evidence, and the tribunal before whom that evidence was given, be it judge or jury, has believed that evidence, and has given them credit as witnesses of truth, a court of appeal should not arrive at a different conclusion from the judge or jury who heard the witnesses. But I do not understand Wright, J., to have really based his conclusion on the credit he gave to these witnesses. On the contrary, I do not think anyone can read his judgment without seeing that he did not place any reliance upon the oral evidence that was given before him. The inference he draws is from the facts which really, so far as they are material, were not in dispute.

I am not sure that I am prepared to say that this contract is on the face of it a gambling contract, or a contract which, as far as its terms are concerned, did not entitle either party, or at all events the customer Moss, to call for delivery or acceptance as the case might be. I should be rather inclined to come to the conclusion that the contract, so far as its words are concerned, was a contract which at all events entitled Moss to insist upon acceptance or delivery of the shares. So I base my judgment really upon exactly the same grounds as the judgment was based on in Universal Stock Exchange v. Strachan, as appears from the opinions delivered by the noble and learned lords in that case. That is to say, assuming that this contract is a contract which upon the face of it would enable one or both of the parties to insist upon delivery or acceptance, the mere fact that the contract contains such a term does not prevent the court from asking the question whether the transactions between the parties really were based upon that contract. Here, in my judgment, if you look at the whole of this transaction, the proper inference to draw is that neither of these parties ever contemplated delivery or acceptance of the stock and shares the subject-matter of the contract, but both of them intended that the matter should be dealt with as a matter of differences simply, and that there should be no delivery or acceptance. The form of this contract, with this provision at the foot, plus one-eighth if the stock is taken up, or less one-eighth if it is delivered, shows that these parties were minded to have a contract between them which should facilitate that which I believe to have been their sole object, gambling in differences. When you look at the conditions of the contract which are endorsed on the contract note, every one of them seems to point in the same direction. The whole form of the transaction is exactly what you would have expected if the parties were minded to gamble in differences, but anxious to put their contract in such a form as to cloak or veil the fact that they were gambling. If you add to that the history of this account from beginning to end, it seems to me that the conduct of the parties leads to the almost necessary inference that they really only intended a gambling transaction.

COOPER v. BELSEY. (a.)

Settled land—Undivided share—Power of tenant for life to sell—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 2, sub-sections 5, 10 (i.).

The Settled Land Act, 1882, enables the tenant for life of an undivided moiety of land to sell that moiety without the concurrence of the owner of the other undivided moiety.

Appeal from Romer, J.

By his will, dated the 3rd of July, 1847, William Cooper devised a freehold house, 8, Queen-street, Cheapside, to trustees upon trust to pay one moiety of the rents and profits to his wife during her life, and after her death to convey the said moiety to the testator's four sons in equal shares as tenants in common. The other moiety of the rents and profits was to be paid to the testator's daughter, Mary Ann Cooper (the present plaintiff), for her separate use during her life, and after her death was to be held upon trust for her children or other issue.

The testator died in 1850. In 1865, on the death of his widow, the moiety of the messuage of which she had been tenant for life was sold by the four sons to one George Hensman in fee.

In February, 1898, the plaintiff entered into an agreement for the sale of the other moiety to the defendant. The defendant, relying upon the decision of North, J., in In re Collinge's Settled Estates, 36 W. R. 264, 36 Ch. D. 516, insisted that the plaintiff, as tenant-for-life of an undivided share of land, could not make a valid sale of her moiety without the concurrence of the owner of the other moiety.

The plaintiff then brought an action for specific performance. Romer, J., declined to follow In re Collinge's Settled Estates (in which case it did not appear that North, J.'s, attention was called to the provision in section 2, sub-section 10 (i.), of the Settled Land Act, 1882, "land includes . . . an undivided share in land"), and made a declaration that the plaintiff had shown a good title to the moiety she had contracted to sell, and could convey the same without the concurrence of any person entitled to the other undivided moiety.

The defendant appealed.

Badcock, for the appeal, relied upon In re Collinge's Settled Estates, and contended that the plaintiff was not "tenant-for-life" within the meaning of section 2, sub-section 5, of the Settled Land Act, 1882.

G. Broke Freeman, for the plaintiff, was not called upon.

LINDLEY, M.R.—It is evident that in In re Collinge's Settled Estates, North, J., overlooked section 2, sub-section 10, (i.) of the Settled Land Act, 1882. When you look at that sub-section it is plain it is not necessary that the owner of the other undivided moiety should join or concur. The decision of Romer, J., is right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

RIGBY and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

DARLEY v. HODGSON. (a.)

Married woman—Will—General power—Appointment in discharge of debt—Erroneous statement of indebtedness — Administration — Assets — Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 4.

Where a married woman, having under a settlement a general power of appointment by will, made a will and directed her trustees, to pay legacies, including one of £1,100 to D. in satisfaction of a debt due from testatrix to D., and subject thereto, the testatrix, in exercise of the power under the settlement, appointed a life interest in the trust funds to her husband; and where the testatrix's estate was insolvent, and the debt of £1,100 was not due from the testatrix to D., but from her husband to D., and the husband, after the wife's death, paid the debt of £1,100 to D.,

Held, (1) that, the debt of £1,100 being the husband's, the legacy of £1,100 was perfectly effective at date of testatrix's death, and payment of the debt by the husband did not make any difference; (2) that a valid appointment was made of the £1,100, and, by section 4 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, the other property not being sufficient to pay debts, that the legacy must go for that purpose.

(a.) Reported by R. C. MACKENZIE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by J. H. DAVIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In this case the testatrix, Juliet Hodgson, wife of Nathaniel Henry Hodgson, by virtue of a general power under a settlement, made a will exercising the power and directing the trustees of the marriage settlement to raise out of the property comprised therein a sum of money sufficient to pay funeral and testamentary expenses and duties and certain legacies, including one of £1,100 to Georgina M. B. Darley "in satisfaction of a debt to that amount due from me to her."

An action was brought by Georgina Darley for the administration of the testatrix's estate, and an order was made by North, J., on the 2nd of December, 1895. The estate turned out to be insolvent, and on an order for further consideration on the 1st of March, 1898, a sum equal to the legacies appointed by her will was ordered to be raised out of the settlement funds and declared liable to be applied in payment of the testatrix's debts.

The testatrix was under a misapprehension in stating in her will that a debt of £1,100 was due from her to Georgina Darley, but this sum was due from her husband to Darley. On the 4th of May, 1898, the husband paid Georgina Darley the sum of £1,100, and afterwards took out a summons in the action for a declaration that the legacy of £1,100 mentioned in the testatrix's will ought not to be treated as an effective legacy, or included in arriving at the total sum referred to in the inquiry directed by the order on further consideration dated the 1st of March, 1898.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and A. W. Rowden, for the summons, contended that there was no valid appointment at all. The intention of the testatrix was to pay her debt, and as there was no debt in existence the appointment fails: In re Rowe, Pike v. Hamlyn, 46 W. R. 357, [1898] 1 Ch. 153; In re Fletcher, Gillings v. Fletcher, 36 W. R. 841, 38 Ch. D. 373.

Henry Terrell, Q.C., and A. Adams, for the creditors.—If the power was once executed the payment of the debt by the husband could make no difference. The Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 4, provides that the execution of a general power by will by a married woman shall have the effect of making the property appointed liable for her debts.

NORTH, J.—The testatrix, when she spoke of the debt due from her to Miss Darley, was really referring to her husband's debt, and she made the appointment for the purpose of discharging that debt. At the date of her death the debt had not been paid, so the appointment was good at that time. The husband afterwards paid the debt, but that did not do away with the appointment, which, in my opinion, is still effectual, and comes within section 4 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. Accordingly, the appointed fund is liable for the payment of the testatrix's debts. The other property belonging to the testatrix not being sufficient to pay her debts, this legacy of £1,100 must go for that purpose.

Administration—Insolvent estate—Priority of specialty debts.

An executor has no power to pay simple contract creditors in full, to the prejudice of specialty creditors.

In re Orsmond, 58 L. T. Rep. 24, 36 W. R. Dig. 5, not followed.

Adjourned summons.

This was an application by the specialty creditors of Frederick Alers Hankey. His administratrix had paid simple contract debts of the deceased, leaving insufficient assets to meet the applicants' specialty debts.

Terrell, Q.C., and Stewart Smith, for the applicants.—The Administration of Estates Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 46) does not enable an executor to retain a simple contract debt due to himself as against a specialty creditor: In re Briggs, W. N. (1894), p. 162; In re Bentinck, 45 W. R. 397, [1897] 1 Ch. 673; In re Jones, 34 W. R. 249, 31 Ch. D. 440; Wilson v. Coxwell, 23 Ch. D. 764, 32 W. R. Dig. 82. There is no difference between the right to retain and the right to prefer. In re Orsmond, 58 L. T. Rep. 24, 36 W. R. Dig. 5, is the only case against us, but it is wrong in principle and is not consistent with the other authorities.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for the administratrix.—In re Orsmond is an express authority in our favour. In re Williams' Estate, 21 W. R. 160, L. R. 15 Eq. 270, shows that the right of preference has been enlarged by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 46.

NORTH, J.—The right of an executor to prefer one creditor and the right to retain his own debt are in many respects the same, though the latter can, but the former cannot be exercised after an administration decree. I am asked to follow the words of the Act, but they are not consistent with saying that the executor can pay some creditors leaving others who but for that Act would have priority out in the cold. It might be that the power to prefer was altogether abolished, but there are decisions to the contrary. The question I have to decide is whether the right to prefer is confined to a preference between persons in the same class of creditors. The right to prefer really does not differ from the right to retain: Talbot v. Frere, 27 W. R. 148, 9 Ch. D. 568. The cases as to the right to retain, In re Jones, In re Briggs, and Wilson v. Coxwell, show that the right of preference has not been enlarged so as to enable an executor to prefer a creditor of lower to one of higher degree. In re Orsmond is an authority on the other side, but I do not find the judgment as reported very intelligible, and I will follow the other decisions.

By a settlement made in 1839 a moiety of the Tring estates was limited subject to the life interest of Thomas Barnes and Ann, his intended wife, to such uses as they should by deed jointly appoint and in default to them as joint tenants.

By a deed-poll in 1869 Thomas Barnes and Ann Barnes appointed the moiety to trustees for 200 years, and subject to the trusts of the term, to the use of John Barnes for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, with remainders over.

The Tring estate was sold in a partition action in 1869. There was a fund in court representing the share of the Barnes' family in the proceeds of sale which was being dealt with by this petition. John Barnes was the only son of Thomas Barnes, and had one son only, Thomas Kay Barnes. Ann Barnes died in 1871, Thomas Barnes died in 1872 intestate as to his residuary real estate. John Barnes died in 1891, having devised his residuary real estate. Thomas Kay Barnes died in 1898 without having had issue.

A part of the Tring estate was copyhold of the manor of Bunstrix, in which there was no custom to entail, so a fee simple conditional on his having issue male was created in Thomas Kay Barnes, which determined on his death without issue. The question now argued was, who was entitled to the money representing the Barnes moiety of these copyholds.

Badcock, for the trustees of the will of Thomas Barnes and three of his co-heiresses according to the custom of the manor.—The possibility of reverter could not be devised or assigned, but devolved on the four co-heiresses of Thomas Barnes.

Robbins, for the other co-heiresses.—A possibility of reverter is not an estate. Before the statute De Donis there could have been no estate after an estate tail: Jones v. Roe, 3 T. R. 88; Earl of Stafford v. Buckley, 2 Ves. Sen. 170; Fearne on Contingent Remainders (10th ed.), vol. 1, 282*n.*; Co. Litt. 18*a*, 22*b*; Willion v. Berkley, Plowd. 223, at p. 248; Winchester's case, 3 Rep. 3*b*. Section 3 of the Wills Act does not extend to a possibility of reverter.

Fuller, for persons claiming under John Barnes' will.—This possibility of reverter descended to John Barnes, and passed under his will: Burton's Compendium, s. 641; Ingilby v. Amcotts, 4 W. R. 433, 21 Beav. 585; Roe v. Griffiths, 1 W. Bl. 605.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Clay, for a residuary legatee under Thomas Barnes' will.—The sale in the partition action effected a conversion. There was a possibility coupled with an interest which could be devised independently of the Wills Act: Sheppard's Touchstone, 239; Lampet's case, 10 Rep. 46*b*; Doe v. Tomkinson, 2 M. & Sel. 165; Moor v. Hawkins, 2 Eden, 342.

Procter, for a person in the same interest.

Hadley, for a person claiming the fund as realty under Thomas Kay Barnes' will, referred to Doe v. Simpson, 4 Bing. N. C. 333, 5 Scott 770 (affirmed 3 Man. & G. 929).

Robbins replied.

NORTH, J.—By the appointment of 1869, an estate in fee simple conditional on Thomas Kay Barnes having male issue was created in the copyholds, but as he died in 1898 without having had issue that estate did not arise, and the possibility of reverter was unappointed. It might revert to Thomas Barnes. It clearly would descend on his death (Doe v. Simpson), and I think that it is clear he could have devised it, but he did not do so. John, however, did devise it, and I think that he could do so. I should say that a possibility of reverter is an estate. In Doe v. Simpson the testator created a conditional fee by will, but the possibility of reverter was not created by the will and descended to the heir. Lord Hardwick says (Sodor and Man, Bishop of v. Earl Derby, 2 Ves. Sen. 337, at p. 354) "that a fee simple conditional cannot stand together with an absolute fee, but will be merged in it." An estate in which an estate merges must, I think, be an estate. Some authorities, however, have been read to me to show that a possibility of reverter is not an estate. I do not think it necessary to decide whether it is an estate under the third section of the Wills Act, as it is clearly included in the latter part of the third section. Several passages were cited from Coke on Littleton to the effect that a fee simple conditional on having heirs is equivalent to a gift over if there are no heirs. Mr. Challis deals with this question in his valuable book on Real Property (2nd ed., p. 201) and the language used by him is undoubtedly strong enough to include a possibility of reverter. I think, therefore, that this property passed under the will of John Barnes.

REG. v. STEWART AND OLSEN. (a.)

Ship—Seaman—Engagement of—Foreign ship—Civil debt—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 111, sub-sections 1, 4; ss. 260, 261, 682, sub-section 2.

A person who, in an English port, engages or supplies a seaman to be entered on a ship in the United Kingdom without having a licence for the purpose from the Board of Trade, acts in contravention to section 111, sub-section 1, of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, and is liable to a fine under sub-section 4, notwithstanding that the ship for which the seaman is engaged or supplied is a foreign ship.

A fine recoverable under sub-section 4 is not a sum recoverable as a civil debt under section 682, sub-section 2, but is a fine inflicted as a punishment for an offence the proceedings in prosecuting which are those prescribed by section 681, sub-section 1 (b).

Rule for a certiorari to quash two convictions.

Julius Olsen, a foreign shipping agent carrying on business at Liverpool, was convicted on two separate convictions, under section 111 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, for unlawfully engaging two seamen to be entered on board a ship called The Clarense, then lying at Port Glasgow, without a licence, and was fined £5 for each offence.

The ship Clarense was a sea-going steamer owned in Para and sailing under the Brazilian flag. She was not registered or owned in the United Kingdom. The captain of The Clarense instructed Olsen to engage twelve seamen for his vessel. Seven men were at first engaged by Olsen and approved by the captain. Afterwards five other men, including two men named Innis and Cottrell, were engaged by Olsen, and, in accordance with the instructions of the captain, they were sent down by Olsen to Glasgow, where they were met by the captain. The whole twelve were then taken to the office of the Brazilian consul in Glasgow, where the seven men first selected signed on. The remainder, including Innis and Cottrell, were rejected. Olsen was not a person licensed to engage or supply seamen under section 110 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The conviction adjudged that the defendant Olsen do forfeit and pay the sum of £5, and in default of payment that the sums due under the adjudication be levied by distress and sale of the defendant's goods, and in default of sufficient distress that the defendant be imprisoned.

Section 110 provides for the granting of licences by the Board of Trade to persons to engage or supply seamen or apprentices for merchants' ships in the United Kingdom.

Section 111 enacts as follows: "(1) A person shall not engage or supply a seaman or apprentice to be entered on board any ship in the United Kingdom, unless that person either holds a licence from the Board of Trade for the purpose, or is the owner or master or mate of the ship, or is bonâ fide the servant and in the constant employment of the owner, or is a superintendent, . . . (4) If a person acts in contravention of this section, he shall for each seaman or apprentice in respect of whom an offence is committed, be liable to a fine not exceeding £20, and, if a licensed person, shall forfeit his licence."

Both these sections are in Part II. of the Act.

Under the heading "Application of Part II." section 260 provides as follows: "This part of this Act shall, unless the context or subject-matter requires a different application, apply to all sea-going ships registered in the United Kingdom, and to the owners, masters, and crews of such ships subject as hereinafter provided with respect to (a) ships belonging to any of the three general lighthouse authorities, (b) pleasure yachts, and (c) fishing boats"; and section 261 provides as follows: "This part of this Act shall, unless the context or subject-matter requires a different application, apply to all sea-going British ships registered out of the United Kingdom, and to the owners, masters, and crews thereof as follows: (a) The provisions relating to the shipping and discharge of seamen in the United Kingdom, and to volunteering into the navy, shall apply in every case," &c., &c.

Section 680 provides as follows: "(1) Subject to any special provisions of this Act and to the provisions hereinafter contained with respect to Scotland . . . (b) an offence under the Act made punishable with imprisonment for any term not exceeding six months, with or without hard labour, or by a fine not exceeding £100, shall be prosecuted summarily in manner provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts. . . ."

Section 681 provides as follows: "(1) The Summary Jurisdiction Acts shall, so far as applicable, apply (a) to any proceeding under this Act before a court of summary jurisdiction, whether connected with an offence punishable on summary conviction or not; and (b) to the trial of any case before one justice of the peace, where under this Act such a justice may try the case. (2) Where under this Act any sum may be recovered as a fine under this Act, that sum, if recoverable before a court of summary jurisdiction, shall, in England, be recovered as a civil debt in manner provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts.

Sutton showed cause on behalf of the Board of Trade.—Two points are raised in support of the rule. The first is that the sum recoverable in respect of a breach of section 111 is a civil debt, and that consequently the conviction is bad, because if it is a civil debt no imprisonment can be awarded unless it has been ascertained that the defendant has the means to pay, and will not pay. It is conceded that if the sum is a civil debt the conviction is wrong. The second point raised in support of the rule is that section 111 does not apply to a foreign ship. The latter point is based upon the language of sections 260 and 261, and it is argued that because the Legislature has said that Part II. shall apply unless the context or subject-matter requires a different application, and only mentions British ships, therefore the whole of Part II. applies only to British ships. The answer is twofold. In the first place, looking at the crimping sections, it is clear that the subject-matter requires a different application; and, in the second place, the purpose of these sections is to pick out the sections made clearly applicable to British ships and to re-classify them with certain exceptions, at the same time making special provisions applicable to them: see Hart v. Alexander, 36 Scottish L. R. 64, and The Milford, 6 W. R. 554, Swa. 362. With regard to the first point, sub-section 2 of section 681 does not apply to a sum recoverable under section 111. It applies to cases where the sum of money to be recovered is an obligation in itself civil as distinguished from criminal. Examples of this may be found in sections 167, 582, sub-section 5, 591, 649, and 667. But in section 111 the object is not to obtain the payment of a sum of money, but to prevent the commission of an offence, and the conviction in this case, therefore, is not an order for the payment of money, but a punishment for the commission of an offence.

Horridge, in support of the rule.—The decision in Hart v. Alexander in the Court of Session in Scotland is against me, but it is not binding in this court. Unless there is a necessity, primâ facie the Act does not under the term ship include foreign ships; for instance, it has been held that the section limiting liability in respect of collision does not apply to a foreign ship. It is not true to say that the offence here is an offence against the seamen, and that it does not affect the ship. It does very seriously interfere with the ship, see section 111, sub-section 2, which provides that a person shall not employ a person to engage seamen for him unless such person has got a licence. If that applied to foreign ships, a master of such a ship could not procure a crew for it in the manner most convenient to him. Sections 260 and 261 do not say that where the context requires it, Part II. of the Act shall apply to foreign ships. All they say is that Part II. shall apply to sea-going ships, unless something in the context prevents it applying to those ships. If the argument used against the rule were right, the provisions relating to volunteering into the navy would apply to a foreign ship. Section 265 deals with cases where there is a conflict of laws, and provides as follows: "Where in any matter relating to a ship or to a person belonging to a ship there appears to be a conflict of laws, then, if there is in this part (Part II.) of this Act any provision on the subject which is hereby expressly made to extend to that ship, the case shall be governed by that provision; but if there is no such provision the case shall be governed by the law of the port at which the ship is registered." That section means that if there is a section which is expressly made to apply to a foreign ship the case shall be governed by that provision. Section 219 provides that where the Government of a foreign country have provided that unauthorised persons going on board British ships which arrive in its territorial jurisdiction shall be subject to provisions similar to those in section 118 in this Act, and desires that those provisions shall apply to ships of that foreign country in British territorial jurisdiction, Her Majesty may in Council order that those provisions shall apply to ships of that foreign country. That section almost conclusively shows that it is not intended that the provisions of the Act should apply to foreign ships except where expressly so stated, or unless an order in Council is made making them so applicable. Many of the sections in Part II. clearly could not apply to foreign ships; section 105, for instance, dealing with apprentices; section 113, dealing with the engagement of seamen by the master of the ship and the entering into agreements between the master and the seaman; section 126, dealing with rating of seamen; section 127, with their discharge; sections 164, 165, and 167, dealing with the mode of recovering wages.

DARLING, J.—The facts of this case are practically the same as those in Hart v. Alexander, which was decided in the Scotch Court of Session.

What was done was this: A foreigner not holding a licence from the Board of Trade engaged or supplied seamen to serve upon a ship in an English port, that ship being a foreign ship. It is admitted that what the man did would have been an offence against section 111 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, had the ship been an English ship. But it is said that because the ship was a foreign ship no offence has been committed.

The words of the Act are perfectly general, and in their ordinary meaning the words "any ship" would cover a foreign ship as well as an English ship. But it is said that in this case "any ship" does not mean any ship, but a British ship, and that that is so by reason of sections 260 and 261 of the same Act.

The same contention was raised in Hart v. Alexander. If the contention were right, all that the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894, which was a codifying Act, would have done would be this: it would have protected English sailors or any sailors in an English port against crimping, if crimping was performed for the benefit of an English ship; but it would have accorded absolute liberty to foreigners to come into an English port and to subject to all the evils of crimping not only foreigners, but British subjects. It would take strong language in the Act of Parliament—knowing, what one cannot help knowing, what was the intention of Parliament in 1894—to convince me that the Legislature in 1894 deliberately passed an Act of Parliament subjecting English shipping to a distinct disadvantage in English ports for the benefit of foreigners; and not only that, but allowing foreigners, if they went into an English port, to subject English subjects to all the evils from which it was desired to protect them if they became crews upon an English ship.

I do not think that sections 260 and 261 do distinguish between British and foreign ships, as is contended. The distinction drawn is between British ships registered in England, and British ships, registered somewhere else. For my part I am content to adopt as my judgment the words used by Lord Moncrieff in his judgment in Hart v. Alexander. He says: "The second part of the Act contains a variety of provisions; some of them are expressly applicable only to British ships, and some are applicable only to foreign ships; but there is a third class of provisions which are quite irrespective of the nationality of the ship or seamen. The section on which this complaint is founded belongs to that class." That is to say, section 111 is one of the third class of provisions which is quite irrespective of the nationality of the ship or seamen, so that the words "any ships in the United Kingdom" bear their natural meaning, and apply as much to a foreign ship in an English port as to a British ship.

Now it is further said that the convictions ought to be quashed because the proceeding was a criminal one, whereas it ought to have been a proceeding as for the recovery of a civil debt. It is perfectly clear that there are two kinds of offences in the Act. Section 111 speaks of an offence against that section, while section 680 speaks of an offence made punishable by a fine or imprisonment, or an offence punishable by a fine. It is said that a fine is only recoverable as a civil debt, and we are referred to sections 582, 649, and 667. I would point out that although in those sections the fine may be only recoverable as a civil debt, in neither of them is the fine spoken of as the result of an offence. I think that here the fine was a fine following as a punishment for an offence punishable by fine, and that the fine was not in the nature of a debt at all. It was a punishment for an offence, and the convictions are convictions justified under the Act and must stand.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion on both points. As to the first point—the applicability of these particular sections to foreign ships—the matter seems to stand thus: section 111, as my brother has pointed out, is quite large enough to apply to foreign ships as well as to English ships. Then it is contended that sections 260 to 266, inclusive, which are headed "Application of Part II.," show that section 111 does not apply to foreign ships. Now, I might content myself with the judgments of the judges of the Court of Session in Scotland on that point, but I also think that the observation of Dr. Lushington in the case of The Milford, to the effect that the words of the sections which he had before him and which correspond to sections 260 and 261 of the present Act, were affirmative words and not negative, is very important, and that it assists in the explanation of the whole matter. It seems to me to come to this, that you must read sections 260 to 266 as if they began by saying "and with respect to the application of Part II. to ships registered in the United Kingdom, be it enacted as follows," and then set out section 260, 262, and 263. The effect would be that to those ships the whole of Part II. would apply, except as to the three classes of ships as to which only portions apply. Then, with respect to the application of Part II., to ships registered in the British dependencies, there are special enactments which are contained in sections 261 and 264, namely, that a certain part of Part II. applies to all such ships, and that certain other parts apply if the Colonial Legislature should desire and pass a corresponding Act.

Thus you have provided affirmatively for British ships registered in the United Kingdom and for British ships registered in the colonies, but you have not provided for foreign ships. Therefore, if the matter stood there it would remain to be considered whether, with regard to a particular section, it was so framed as to apply to foreign ships or no. You would have nothing else to guide you. But there is something else to guide you—namely, section 265; and it appears to me that that section says this: "And with respect to the application of Part II. to foreign ships . . .", and then it goes on to say that if the matter is one which would cause a conflict of laws it is to be governed in this way: If there has been an express provision applying a particular portion of Part II. to foreign ships, that is to apply because it is express legislation; but if there has been no such express application of a particular portion of Part II. to foreign ships, but it is left to be applied by general words only, then it is not to be applied to a foreign ship if the matter is such as to cause a conflict of laws; but if the matter is not such as to cause a conflict of laws, then you are to apply the general words in the general way. That leaves the matter free from any difficulty.

Going back to section 111, it deals with matters arising in English ports with which the English Legislature has full jurisdiction to deal in every way, and there is no possible reason why the Legislature should not give protection to seamen in the case of their being engaged for a foreign ship as in the case of a British ship. If Mr. Horridge's contention is right, if an Englishman is shipped on board a foreign ship, then he loses his protection. There seems to be no reason whatever for saying that the section does not apply to a case where the seaman is engaged contrary to its provisions in an English port and not on board a foreign ship. As to the case where a similar thing is done actually on board the ship, I do not think it necessary for us to give a definite opinion. In that case it does seem to me a substantial doubt might arise as to whether there would be a conflict of laws, and whether, consequently, in that case a conviction would be right; but I do not think that question is definitely before us on the present occasion.

Then, as to the question about the civil debt, I do not think there is any real difficulty about that. Until Mr. Sutton directed our attention to sections 591, 649, and 667 it was not quite easy to understand section 681, sub-section 2; but the moment that was done the meaning of the section became clear. It seems that section 681 merely says this: Whereas certain things which are civil debts have been declared by this Act to be recoverable as if they were not civil debts, but fines and offences, such sums shall be recoverable as if they were civil debts. That does not apply to this matter, which, as my brother has pointed out, is an offence.

Q. B. Div.
(Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J.) } July 28; Dec. 15.

BLACKMORE v. WHITE. (a.)

Copyholds—Customary obligation on tenant to keep in repair—Breach of obligation by tenant—Remedy of lord against executors of tenant.

An action was brought by the lord of a manor against the executors of a deceased tenant of a copyhold tenement for not keeping the tenement in proper repair. It was proved that by the custom of the manor the tenant was bound to keep the tenement in repair, and that the ordinary mode by which that obligation had been enforced against the tenant was by presentment, fine, and forfeiture. Upon the death of the tenant the premises were found to be dilapidated and out of repair, but there had been no presentment by the lord in respect of such dilapidations.

Held, that, although there had been no presentment, the lord could have maintained an action in respect of the dilapidations against the tenant in her lifetime upon the implied contract by the tenant to keep the premises in repair arising from her admittance, and that this right of action, being founded on contract, survived against the executors of the tenant.

Further consideration.

The action was tried by Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., at Exeter, and was reserved by him for further consideration.

The facts were stated as follows in the considered judgment of the learned judge: The action was brought by the lord of an ecclesiastical manor against the executors of the late copyhold tenant of the manor for not repairing copyhold tenements pursuant to the terms of the tenancy. The manor in question was the ecclesiastical manor called Morchard Bishop, in Devonshire, and the rector for the time being of the parish in which the manor is situate, is the lord of the manor. In 1846 the then rector and lord of the manor was Archdeacon Bartholomew. On the 21st of January, in that year, 1846, John Southcott and James Southcott were admitted as tenants in possession of the manor, and the entry from the records and the court roll was as follows: "To this court came John Southcott and James Southcott, and took of John Bartholomew, clerk, lord of the manor aforesaid, three dwelling-houses, three gardens and outhouses, with the appurtenances thereof, situate within the manor, to have and to hold the said dwelling-houses, gardens, and outhouses unto the said John Southcott and James Southcott for the term of their lives and the longest liver of them, according to the custom of the said manor, yielding and paying therefor yearly 1s. and 2s. in the name of an heriot when it shall happen according to the custom of the said manor and by all other burdens, suits, and services therefor, and all right accustomed for such estate in possession of the premises, so had they have given to the said lord for a fine £5, and so are they admitted tenants in possession and do their fealty according to the custom of the said manor."

At the same time on the 21st of January there was a further record of the same court by which the reversion (subject to the above admittance) expectant on the death of the survivor of those two admitted tenants, John and James Southcott, was granted to Charles W. M. Bartholomew for the term of his life according to the custom of the manor.

In 1871 John Southcott died, and in 1872 James Southcott died. In March, 1875, the widow of James Southcott was admitted as tenant for life according to the custom of the manor by custom of free-bench. In November, 1884, the present lord succeeded to the rectory and to the lordship of the manor, and it was not in controversy that whatever rights the original lord—namely, Archdeacon Bartholomew—had, were now the rights of the present plaintiff, who has been since 1884 and still is the lord of the manor.

On the 14th of June, 1896, the widow of James Southcott, who had been so admitted as tenant for life by custom of free-bench, died, appointing by her will the present defendants her executors, and it was admitted that if the cause of action here claimed was well founded against the executors, they had assets to meet any damages awarded.

On the death of the widow in 1896 reference was made to Charles Bartholomew, to whom was made the grant in reversion expectant on the death of the two admitted tenants, John and James Southcott, and expectant also on the life estate of the widow by the custom of free-bench. He was then communicated with, but he disclaimed and declined to take the interest in reversion or to claim to be admitted, and, in fact, he never was admitted, and he died in July, 1897, before this action was commenced.

It was common ground that the premises in question were allowed to get out of repair, and it was found as a fact in this case that they were neglected not only during the period when the deceased widow was the tenant in possession, but during the existence apparently of the previous tenancies of John and James Southcott, but on behalf of the plaintiff the claim was restricted to a claim in respect of the breach of the condition or implied contract upon which the plaintiff was relying, that breach being confined to the action of the widow, whose executors the defendants were.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Bart., Barrister-at-Law.

The customary obligations of a tenancy by copyhold in this particular manor were that the tenant should keep the premises in ordinary repair, and the ordinary mode by which that obligation or term of the tenancy was enforced was by presentment, by fine, and in some cases by forfeiture, and this also extended to the case of widows admitted as tenants by free-bench.

Finally the writ in this action was issued on the 8th of April, 1898.

Foote, Q.C. (Howland Roberts with him), for the plaintiff.—There is no allegation here of any wilful waste. The action is for dilapidations, that is, for not keeping the premises in repair, and it is brought against the executors of the deceased tenant. We submit that the action is maintainable against the tenant, and after the tenant's death against the executors; and the chief point we wish to establish here is that the plaintiff, the lord of the manor, is entitled to maintain this action and recover some damages, and so far as we can find out it is the first case of the kind that has been brought by the lord of a manor. The customs of the manor and the entries on the court rolls prove that there is a liability on the tenant to keep in repair, with a liability to fine and forfeiture for not keeping in repair. Therefore by the very fact of the admittance of the tenant, and arising out of such admittance, there is the liability of the tenant to keep in repair, and this liability is based upon the implied contract by the tenant to keep the premises in repair. An action always lay for copyhold fines, and the form of the action was indebitatus assumpsit (Bullen and Leake (3rd ed.), p. 149); and the lord could always bring an action of debt against a copyholder for the recovery of his fine (1 Cruise's Dig. (4th ed.), p. 303); and this right of the lord is recognised in Fraser v. Mason, 32 W. R. 421, 11 Q. B. D. 574. The right to sue for this fine depends upon the admission: Hayward v. Raw, 6 H. & N. 308, at p. 326, 9 W. R. C. L. Dig. 20. The lord is also entitled to sue in equity for waste and for an account in respect of waste, whether the waste is commissive or permissive: Richards v. Noble, 3 Mer. 673. In answer to the argument in that case that a court of equity would leave the lord to his remedy at law for a forfeiture, Lord Eldon, L.C., there said that "in many cases the forfeiture was a very inadequate remedy." In Dench v. Bampton, 4 Ves. 700, Lord Loughborough held that the lord had no remedy in equity for an injunction and for an account, but was confined to his legal remedy for waste committed by the copyholder. This must be taken as no longer law, as Lord Brougham, L.C., said in Parrott v. Palmer, 3 My. & K. 632: "The case of Dench v. Bampton is clearly not law, and independently of its having been overruled a few years afterwards in the case of Richards v. Noble, the principle has never been considered a sound one." In Woodhouse v. Walker, 28 W. R. 765, 5 Q. B. D. 404, which is an analogous case with regard to freeholds, a similar action was held to lie against the tenant and against her executor after her death, under 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 2. That was stated by Lush, J., to be an action on the case, but in the later case of In re Williames, Andrew v. Williames, 52 L. T. Rep. 41, 33 W. R. Dig. 125, 54 L. T. Rep. 105, the right to maintain the action was based on the implied contract, that the acceptance by the tenant created an obligation to repair. In the same way if the admittance to the copyhold tenement be taken upon the terms or subject to the customs of the manor, an action for non-repair will lie against the tenant in the lifetime of the tenant and against the executors of the tenant after the tenant's death.

He also referred to the Ecclesiastical Leases Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 105).

Duke, for the defendant.—This is a case of permissive waste only, and an action of this kind does not lie for permissive waste. The plaintiff, upon the death of the widow, lost his right upon any implied contract to keep the premises in repair; but there is no trace in any book on copyhold law of any such implied contract, or of anything other than a customary right. An action on the case does not lie against a copyhold tenant for permissive waste; for permissive waste the lord has no remedy at law: Countess of Shrewsbury's case, 5 Rep. 13*a*. In the case of copyholds the liability of the tenant to the lord does not depend on the relations of the tenant to the lord apart from the customs of the manor. The liability depends on the customs of the manor, and in such cases the lord's rights are presentment, where presentment is necessary as in this case, and following presentment, fine, and then forfeiture. These are the rights and the only and exclusive rights of the lord against the tenant for permissive waste, and these rights and liabilities respectively are determined by status and not by contract; and in the statement of claim in this case the plaintiff's right is based upon the customs of the manor and not upon contract. If this had been commissive waste an action might have been brought, but as it is permissive waste the lord can only proceed by the customary means, that is, by presentment, and it is admitted there has been no such presentment here. The ordinary relation between lessor and lessee does not apply as between the lord and the copyholder, but the plaintiff here is really seeking to enforce the ordinary relations as between a lessor and lessee. Non-repair of the copyhold tenement is a forfeiture: Coke's Law Tracts, p. 134. With regard to the authorities, it has been held that an action on the case does not lie for permissive waste: Dench v. Bampton; Grubb v. Earl of Burlington, 5 B. & Ad. 507; Gibson v. Wells, 1 B. & P. N. R. 290. It has been argued that Dench v. Bampton has been overruled by Parrott v. Palmer. There the lord's right had been interfered with without any relation to copyholds, and the tenant had simply taken the lord's property and was in possession of it. The action here is an action arising ex delicto, and not ex contractu: Powys v. Blagrave, 2 W. R. 700, 4 De G. M. & G. 448; Re Williames, Andrew v. Williames; Woodhouse v. Walker; Batthyany v. Walford; 35 W. R. 814, 36 Ch. D. 269; Phillips v. Homfray, 32 W. R. 6, 24 Ch. D. 439. The action being one of tort, the maxim actio personalis moritur cum personâ applies, and the right of action died with the deceased tenant, and cannot be maintained against the executors: Eastcourt v. Weeks, 1 Salk. 186; Sollers v. Lawrence, Willes, 413; Wheatley v. Lane, 1 Wms. S. 239.

Foote, Q.C., in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 15.—Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J., delivered the following judgment: [His lordship set out the facts as above stated, and proceeded:] Upon these facts the question is whether the lord of the manor could have maintained an action against the widow under the circumstances of this case, and whether he can now maintain an action against the executors of the widow for the failure to comply with the condition or the implied contract upon which, as it is said, the tenant held. The customary obligations or incidents of the tenancy of a copyhold tenant in this manor, so far as is now material, were that there was an obligation upon the tenant to keep the premises in ordinary repair, that repair extending outside as well as inside, and that the ordinary mode by which that term or obligation of the tenancy was enforced and was enforceable was by presentment, by fine (which was generally remitted if the premises were repaired), and in some cases by forfeiture, and this customary obligation or condition of the tenancy applied to the case of widows admitted by the custom of free-bench. In this case there was no presentment, but I will deal with that later on. Once it can be rightly determined what is the true effect of the existence of these conditions or incidents of the tenancy, many of the questions which at first sight seemed to create some difficulty, to a large extent disappear. In my judgment, the effect of the establishment in face of those customary obligations was that one of the obligations under which the lord made his grant, and one of the terms of the tenancy and obligations which the tenant undertook as incident to his tenancy, was to keep the premises in repair; and from these facts there is to be implied, and to be clearly implied, a contract by the tenant to fulfil that obligation to keep the premises in reasonable repair, and these obligations attached by force of the custom to each tenant upon admittance. If that be so, why should not the lord be entitled to sue for the neglect to fulfil those obligations? It is clear that the obligation exists as one of the implied terms, I may almost say the express terms, of the tenancy; and if this were a case not of a copyhold tenant, but of a tenant who held on the terms that he should repair as was customary according to the custom of the county or the parish, it would be unarguable to say that in such a case the landlord could not sue upon an implied covenant for breach of an implied term of the tenancy.

It is said, however, that this being a copyhold tenant, a tenant holding at will according to the custom of the manor, the case is different, and in that view a number of questions have been raised with which I must now deal seriatim. The first contention was in substance that the widow being a tenant at will according to the custom of the manor, no action for permissive waste would lie against her. I am now treating the case as if the action had been brought against the widow. In answer to that contention it would be more correct to say that this is not an action for permissive waste, but that it is rather an action for breach of an implied term of the tenancy. It may be admitted, and I think it is clear, that apart from contract, express or implied, there is no cause of action even for permissive waste strictly so called against a tenant at will, and apart from contract the same observation would apply to many other tenancies, which I might suggest, except where they are brought within the statute of Marlebridge or of Gloucester. It is said that in the case of a copyhold tenant holding at will, no such contention would apply. The first case to which reference was made was The Countess of Shrewsbury's case, 5 Rep. 13*a*, decided in 1660. When we examine that case it will be seen that it does not at all support the proposition that no action for permissive waste—even if this were strictly an action for permissive waste—lies. The head-note is "An action on the case does not lie against a tenant at will for permissive waste; but if tenant at will commits voluntary waste it amounts to a determination of the will and an action of trespass lies against him." The Countess of Shrewsbury had brought an action on the case against one Crompton, a lawyer of the Temple. She had leased to him a house at will and he so carelessly managed his fire apparently that the house was burnt down. There it was adjudged that "for this permissive waste no action lay against the opinion of Brook in the abridgment of the case of 48 E. 3, 25, Wast. 52, and the reason of the judgment was because at the common law no remedy lay for waste, either voluntary or permissive, against lessee for life or years, because the lessee had interest in the land by the act of the lessor, and it was his folly to make such lease and not restrain him by covenant, conditions or otherwise, that he should not do waste." It is clear, therefore, that the explanation of that case is, not that an action for permissive waste will not lie when there is an express or implied contract against it, but that there must be an express or implied contract against it to found the action. That, I think, is made clear in a note of Mr. Hargrave to the case: Co. Litt. 57*a*. Another case referred to was that of Grubb v. Earl of Burlington (5 B. & Ad. 507), decided in 1833. The marginal note there is: "If a copyholder pull down a barn without any intention of rebuilding, the lord cannot recover the place from him on the ground of a forfeiture, if the jury find that the premises are not damaged." That simply comes to this—that in that case there was no cause of action, because there was no waste. The next case was Gibson v. Wells (1 B. & P. N. R. 290), decided in 1805. The same explanation will be found to exist in that case as I have already given in the Countess of Shrewsbury's case; and it ought to be borne in mind that it was an action on the case. The first count alleged commissive waste, and the second alleged permissive waste. There was no allegation of a contract express or implied, but there was a suggestion that by the mere fact of the tenancy the obligation against permissive waste arose. Sir James Mansfield, before whom the case was tried, being of opinion that the dilapidations proved amounted only to permissive waste, non-suited the plaintiff, saying that, "although an action on the case in the nature of waste might be maintained for commissive waste, yet that he had never known an action being maintained for permissive waste only." The ground there clearly was that the tenant was a tenant at will only, and that from that fact only and apart from agreement there was not to be implied the contractual obligation of doing or suffering permissive waste. The same observations may be made with regard to the cases of Powys v. Blagrave, 2 W. R. 700, 4 De G. M. & G. 448, decided in 1854; In re Skingley, 3 Mac. & G. 221, decided in 1851; and Herne v. Bembow, 4 Taunt. 764, decided in 1813. Therefore, where the tenant at will, whether a copyhold tenant or a tenant not a copyhold tenant, takes a tenancy upon the terms that he shall keep the premises in repair—that is that he shall not suffer them to go out of repair—there is no authority for the proposition that he should not be liable for a breach of that implied, or it might be express, stipulation in his contract.

It was next said that even if there were the implied obligation as one of the terms of the tenancy not to allow permissive waste and to keep in reasonable repair, that this being a tenancy by custom of the manor, which custom provides certain modes of remedy for breaches of the customary obligations of the tenancy, the lord has no right to resort to an action at law. It is contended that the true remedy is presentment, if necessary, and after presentment forfeiture, and following forfeiture, ejectment, if necessary. In favour of the plausibility of that view it may be urged that it is impossible to find any instance of an action of this kind brought against any copyhold tenant. The explanation of that may be—though it is not a full or complete explanation—the course of events before the Ecclesiastical Leases Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 105). Up to that time it appears that the usual course was, as in this case, to make a grant in possession to certain tenants with reversion to some third person, and when one life dropped to have another life added, so continuing practically toties quoties the life tenancies, the lord getting his fine upon each successive admittance. Then the legislature thought it right to put an end to this state of things in the case of ecclesiastical manors, the object being to spread more equally for the benefit of successive incumbents the benefits that would be derived from dealing with copyhold estates. The effect of that Act is that for the future the lords of these manors, being the rectors, are bound to lease at what are called rack-rents, to lease them in fact at their annual value instead of taking fines upon admittance. Looking to the antecedent state of things it was not very likely a case of this kind would arise, because, if there were these successive interests, practically perpetual interests, it would always be the interest of the persons in reversion to see, and they would have a right to see, that the conditions of the tenancy were carried out, and that the value of the reversion was not allowed to be injured by the neglect to fulfil the conditions as to repair or otherwise. In this case, however, we are dealing with tenancies created and based upon admittances prior to that Act. When the admittances and grants in this case came to an end, there was no reversioner after Bartholomew, who was dead, who had any interest in seeing that the premises were not run down, or in seeing that they were properly kept up and maintained. Those considerations may to a large extent account for the absence of precedents upon this subject, but we must consider on principle the question whether the remedy of the lord is confined to the customary remedy by presentment, by forfeiture and ejectment, if they are necessary. Upon this part of the case the first authority relied on for the defendants was Dench v. Bampton, 4 Ves. 700, decided by Lord Loughborough in 1799. That case is without doubt an authority for the proposition stated in the marginal note, that "the lord of a manor is confined to his legal remedy for waste committed by a copyholder, and has no equity for an injunction and account." The Lord Chancellor points this out at p. 703, and at p. 707 he says: "The law settles the matter between the lord and tenant. If by committing waste a forfeiture is incurred the lord proceeds for the forfeiture, and it is a question at law whether the act done is a forfeiture or not." I think it is quite clear that that does not express the law, because not only is there the considered judgment of Lord Brougham in 1834 in the case of Parrott v. Palmer 3 My. & K. 632, but within a few years of Dench v. Bampton, Lord Eldon, in Richards v. Noble 3 Mer. 673, decided in 1807, had expressed an opinion that it was not the law. The Lord Chancellor, in a considered judgment in that case, said: "In many cases the forfeiture was a very inadequate remedy, and he noticed the instance of a barren spot upon which many valuable timber trees grow. If the copyhold tenant only forfeited his copyhold by cutting down these trees he might in such a case be a considerable gainer by his own wrongful conduct." The point I wish to insist upon in this judgment of Lord Eldon is that the forfeiture might be, or was, he says, a very inadequate remedy; and taking that view, he overruled the demurrer in that case for want of equity, which demurrer was based on the decision in Dench v. Bampton. That case of Dench v. Bampton is still more explicitly stated to be no longer the law by Sir John Leach, M.R., and Lord Brougham, in the case of Parrott v. Palmer, 3 My. & K., at p. 632. In the judgment in that case it is said (at p. 639), "the case of Dench v. Bampton before Lord Loughborough is clearly not law, and independently of its having been overruled a few years afterwards in the case of Richards v. Noble, the principle on which Lord Loughborough proceeded has never been considered a sound one, namely, that the only remedy of the lord for waste done by the tenant in cutting timber without licence or custom, is at law for the forfeiture, a doctrine laid down by his lordship in a case of timber, but which he clearly applied to mining and all other waste as well." We may therefore disregard the authority of Dench v. Bampton; but it seems to me that there is some other light which can be thrown upon the matter. There is clear authority for saying that an action may be brought for a fine: 1 Cruise's Digest (4th ed.), p. 303 Fraser v. Mason, 32 W. R. 421; 11 Q. B. D. 574, and Hayward v. Raw, 6 H. & N. 308, which latter case principally deals with the point that the liability of the tenant depends upon his admittance. Again, actions or suits in respect of waste may be maintained, for which Richards v. Noble and Parrott v. Palmer are authorities; and I think that there are authorities that an action may be brought for the rent which is reserved by the customs of the manor; yet these are all cases in which proceedings by forfeiture might have been taken. They all give ground for forfeiture, and in the majority, if not all of them, that right of forfeiture is said to accrue eo instante—that is to say, that no presentment is necessary in such a case. In that connection I shall only refer to one or two passages on copyhold in Coke's Law Tracts, p. 132, s. 57, which deals with acts which amount to forfeiture, and these he divides into those which are forfeits eo instante that they are committed, some that are not forfeits till presentment — and in that enumeration he gives a number of these cases. [His lordship read these cases, and proceeded:] Lord Coke there mentions those acts which are not forfeitures till presentment, and as to that a further point was made during argument that presentment was necessary. With regard to that I merely refer to the authorities I have given. Lastly, as pointed out by Lord Eldon in Richards v. Noble, forfeiture may be a very inadequate remedy, and it seems to me that the present case is a good illustration of that, as the tenement, which originally consisted of one or two houses divided into three houses, with a very small portion of land attached, was undoubtedly allowed to go as to thatch, walls, and so on, into a very bad condition. In this connection a further point was made that presentment was necessary before this action. As I have pointed out the authorities seem to me to point in a contrary direction, and I need not refer to them again. I think presentment was not necessary. The next point made was that the lord—if there has been a breach—is not the person to sue, that he is not the person really injured, that the person really injured was the reversioner, and that the reversioner therefore was the person entitled to sue. It is not necessary to discuss that point at length. Even if there were a reversioner in the real sense interposed between the lord and possession, it seems to me that an action for at all events nominal damages would lie in such a case at the instance of the lord. In this case there was in fact no reversioner at all. When the widow died, Bartholomew, the person who had the grant in reversion, had his attention called to the matter. He disclaimed and declined to be admitted, and, in fact, never was admitted. Therefore, as regards him, his rights and obligations would, as Hayward v. Raw shows, be based solely on the fact of his admittance, and as he never was admitted he never had the rights or obligations of a tenant. He declined to come forward, and the result was that the premises reverted to the lord and the lord was in possession. Who, then, was the party injured? The lord alone was the person who was injured, and he alone was the person entitled to sue.

On this point I need refer to two cases only. The first is Woodhouse v. Walker, 28 W. R. 765, 5 Q. B. D. 404, decided in 1880. It was cited for the defendants as showing that the remedy there was treated as in the nature of an action for tort, but that is not the point with which I am now dealing. That was not the case of contractual obligation at all, as the action was brought by the remainder man in fee against the executor of the previous tenant for life, so that there was no contractual relation at all between them. The ground of the judgment there was that the devise was upon the terms and conditions that the tenant for life should keep in repair, and that the person who was injured—namely, the remainderman, had a right of action for the breach of that condition to repair, and that the action lay against the executor of the deceased tenant for life, the action having been brought within the period of limitation of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 2. The next case is In re Williames, Andrew v. Williames, 52 L. T. Rep. 41, decided in 1885, which in my opinion takes the more correct view of what the character of the action was. In that case it was held upon the facts of the case that the executor of the deceased tenant for life was liable for omission to repair, as such omission was a breach of condition or implied contract contained in the will; and the case of Woodhouse v. Walker was followed, and the decision of Kay, J., in that case was affirmed by the Court of Appeal (54 L. T. Rep. 105). I think, therefore, that the lord is the right person to bring the action.

It is further said that the action is one to which the maxim actio personalis moritur cum personâ applies. In my judgment that is answered by the authorities which I have cited. This is a case in which there was an implied, or almost an express, term of the tenancy that the premises should be kept in repair. The remedy, therefore, sounds in contract and not in tort. In Williams on Executors (9th ed.), p. 1593, it is said: "The general rule has been established from very early times, with respect to such personal claims as are founded upon any obligation, contract, debt, covenant or other duty, that the right of action, on which the testator or intestate might have been sued in his lifetime, survives his death, and is enforceable against his executor or administrator." That principle applies here, and the judgment of Kay, J., in In re Williames, Andrew v. Williames, shows that he was of opinion that a case of this kind falls within that rule.

I now deal with the last question. If the plaintiff is entitled to sue, and if the defendants are liable as the executors of the tenant who was under the contractual obligation to keep the premises in repair, for what are those executors liable? As regards this part of the case, I am relieved from difficulty because the plaintiff has disclaimed any intention of seeking to base his claim in respect of any defaults by John or James Southcott, and he has restricted his claim to any breaches made by the widow. As regards that I think the justice of the case will be met by my dealing with a fair apportionment of the claim for the six years previous to her death, counting down to the bringing of this action. This action was brought and was considered important, not so much as to the quantum of damages, but with the view of establishing the right of the lord to maintain this action, and that being so, I think justice will be done by considering the damages only in respect of that which would be within the ordinary Statute of Limitations, and I fix the damages to which the plaintiff is entitled at £30. I therefore give judgment for the plaintiff for £30, with costs on the High Court scale.

From Q. B. Div. (A. L. Smith, Collins, and Romer, L.JJ.) — April 15.

In re ROYAL COLLEGE OF SURGEONS OF ENGLAND (a.)

Inland revenue—Bodies corporate and unincorporate—Exemption from duty—"Property appropriated and applied for the promotion of science"—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 51), s. 11, sub-section 3.

By section 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885, duty is imposed upon the annual value, income, or profits of all property belonging to, or vested in, any body corporate or unincorporate, subject to exemption from duty in the case of "property which, or the income or profits whereof, shall be legally appropriated and applied . . . for the promotion of education, science, or the fine arts."

The College of Surgeons was a body corporate with two main objects—namely, the promotion of the science of surgery, and the promotion and encouragement of the practice of surgery, including examinations to qualify for such practice. The property of the college consisted, among other things, of general offices, an examination hall, and a library; but there had been no appropriation of this property by conveyance, declaration of trust, or otherwise, to the first-named of the above objects as distinguished from the second. The fees received in respect of the examinations constituted a large part of the income of the college. The college had no school of instruction or training for persons seeking admission to the college. The above property having been assessed to the annual duty imposed by section 11 of the Act of 1885,

Held, that as the college had two main objects, only such of its property as was legally appropriated and applied to the first-named object, as distinguished from the second, was exempt from duty within section 11, sub-section 3, of the Act, and that as none of the property in question was legally appropriated thereto the exemption did not apply.

The words "legally appropriated" mean appropriated so as to create a legal obligation upon the part of the administrators of the property to apply it in a particular manner.

Appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (Wright and Channell, JJ.), reported 46 W. R. 538.

The Royal College of Surgeons petitioned to be discharged from an assessment made under the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885, on the ground that the college was an institution the income whereof was legally appropriated and applied for the promotion of education and science.

The petition stated that the petitioners were a body corporate established by Royal Charter in the year 1800.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The objects of the petitioners' incorporation as specified in the said Royal Charter were the benefit of the commonweal of this kingdom by the promotion of the art and science of surgery, and the due promotion and encouragement of the study and practice of the said art and science of surgery.

Further powers and privileges had from time to time been conferred upon the petitioners by subsequent Royal Charters, the object with which such further powers and privileges were granted being in the charters expressed to be more effectually to promote and encourage the study and practice of the art and science of surgery.

By the charter divers obligations and duties were imposed upon the petitioners' corporation for the benefit of the public at large and the promotion and encouragement of the art and science of surgery.

The petitioners were, under terms imposed by Government, the custodians at their own expense of the "Hunterian Collection," which was national property.

On the 24th day of June, 1894, the annual value or income which had accrued to the petitioners during the yearly period ending on that date from real property belonging to or vested in them during such yearly period was £7,200. The total value of the petitioners' invested personal estate at the same date was £187,195 17s. 11d., and the income or profits thereof accrued to the petitioners during the said yearly period was £5,833 5s. 7d. (No question arose in this case as to the personal estate.)

The whole of such property, real and personal, or the income or profits thereof, was legally appropriated and applied for the benefit of the public at large or for the promotion of science, literature, or education.

The petitioners were called upon by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to deliver an account in accordance with section 17 of the Customs and and Inland Revenue Act, 1885, and did deliver such account, thereby claiming that all their property real and personal was entitled to exemption from assessment or duty, and alternately that divers portions thereof were entitled to such exemption as by the said account more particularly appears.

The petitioners were notwithstanding assessed by the commissioners at £3,161, and required to pay as duty thereon the sum of £158 1s.

The sum of £3,161 included the following which the petitioners had alternatively claimed to be entitled to exemption: The sum of £300, being the annual value of that part of the library of the petitioners situate within the premises Nos. 40, 41, and 42, Lincoln's-inn-fields; the sum of £250, being the annual value of the official residence of the conservator of the petitioner's museum, which contained among other things the Hunterian Collection, such residence having, through other portions of the college premises, internal access to the museum; the sum of £200, being the annual value of premises No. 39, Lincoln's-inn-fields, being another portion of the petitioners' library.

Apart from their claim to total exemption the petitioners submitted that in any event the above property was entitled to exemption from duty, being property which, or the income or profits whereof, was legally appropriated and applied for the benefit of the public at large or for the promotion of science, literature, or education.

The petitioners prayed that the assessment should be discharged by reason of the same being assessed upon property entitled to exemption from duty, or that the amount of the assessment be reduced to such sum as the court might order, and that the respondents should be ordered to repay them the said sum of £158 1s., or the sum by which such duty should be reduced.

As regards the museum, it was stated in the college calendar that the Hunterian Collection, which formed the basis of the contents of the museum, was originally purchased by the British Government and presented in 1799 to the Corporation of Surgeons upon certain terms, and was now in the possession of the college, and the present museum was subsequently built, the Government contributing towards the expense thereof. The official residence of the conservator of the museum adjoined the museum, and the conservator was required to reside there.

As regards the library, the calendar stated that members of the college had the privilege of personally introducing a visitor; and that persons not members desirous of admission must make application in writing to the librarian, accompanied by a letter from a fellow or member recommending that a ticket be granted to the applicant. Tickets of admission, which were not transferable, were granted for six months. In the case of students the application must be made on a form to be obtained from the librarian; and tickets were granted to students on the sole condition that the library was used by them for such purposes of study as they might be unable to pursue without the aid of books not accessible elsewhere. These tickets were granted for three months.

The affidavits filed in the case stated that the college had, shortly after the Medical Act, 1886, was passed, in conjunction with the Royal College of Physicians of London, instituted examinations and granted diplomas to the successful candidates which entitled them to practise as surgeons, and built a hall on the Thames Embankment where the examinations were held, and where laboratories were erected. The fees received on these examinations formed a large part of the income of the college. The college had no school of instruction or training for persons seeking admission to the membership of this college. Professors, however, delivered lectures in the theatre of the college, to which the public were admitted free of charge. The college awarded prizes for dissertations on subjects connected with the science of surgery.

The charters of the college and the bye-laws are sufficiently referred to in the judgment.

The commissioners allowed exemption in respect of the museum, and of that part of the property which consisted of laboratories, but disallowed any exemption in respect of the library, the conservator's official residence, the general offices and the building used for examinations.

The Divisional Court allowed exemption in respect of the conservator's residence, but affirmed the decision of the commissioners in respect of the other exemptions claimed.

The college appealed.

Sir E. Clarke, Q.C., and J. R. Paget, for the appellants.—The property of the college and its income are legally appropriated and applied for the promotion of science within the meaning of section 11, sub-section 3, of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885. The case is not distinguishable from the Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Forrest, 39 W. R. 33, 15 App. Cas. 334, where the property of the Institution of Civil Engineers was held exempt within this sub-section. The word "exclusively" does not occur in section 11, as it does in section 1 of the Scientific Societies Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 36), upon which the case of Royal College of Music v. Westminster Vestry, [1898] 1 Q. B. 809, 46 W. R. Dig. 126, was decided; and the word "solely" occurs in the Income Tax Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), Schedule A, r. 6, upon which Sulley v. Royal College of Surgeons of Edinburgh, 19 Ct. Sess.

Cas., 4th Ser., 751, was decided in Scotland. Though part of the income of the college is derived from examinations, that does not alter the character of the college so far as regards its corporate property, the whole of which is expended on purposes covered by the charter. The fact that the Legislature has by the Medical Act, 1886 (49 & 50 Vict. c. 48), and other Acts recognized the diploma of the college as one test of the right to practise surgery does not make the institution any the less one for the promotion of science. The examinations may properly be described as tending to promote the science of surgery. If the society is incorporated for scientific purposes, then all its property must be regarded as appropriated for the promotion of science. In Society of Writers to the Signet v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 14 Ct. Sess. Cas., 4th Ser., 34, the Court of Session in Scotland held that the library of the Writers to the Signet did not come within the exemption. But that library is used exclusively by the members of the society, like the library of the Law Society in London, whereas the library of the College of Surgeons is open to any member of the public who wishes to use it to pursue his scientific studies. Property held by a body corporate or unincorporate for the promotion of science is property held upon trust for that purpose, and is therefore "legally appropriated" to it: In re Bootham Ward Strays, 40 W. R. 632, at p. 635, [1892] 2 Q. B. 152, at p. 165. The property in question is therefore exempt from duty.

They also referred to Incorporation of Tailors in Glasgow v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 14 Ct. Sess. Cas., 4th Ser., 729, and to the charters of the college.

Sir Richard Webster, A.G., and Danckwerts, for the Crown.—To come within the exemption the property or its income must be legally appropriated and applied in fact for the promotion of science. The College of Surgeons has two objects—the promotion of the science of surgery and the promotion of the practice of surgery, and there is no deed or anything of that nature appropriating the property to the first object. The charters of the college contain no such appropriation. In the case of the Institution of Civil Engineers in the Court of Appeal (36 W. R. 598, 20 Q. B. D. 621) and in the House of Lords (39 W. R. 33, 15 App. Cas. 334) reliance was placed upon the charter and bye-laws of the institution to show that the property was legally appropriated and applied for the promotion of science, but there the institution had only one object. In the present case the charters of the college do not show any legal appropriation of the property in question for the promotion of science. If a society has two objects, one within and one without the exemption, and there is no legal obligation to apply any of its property to one of the excepted objects, then the property is wholly without the exemption. "Legally appropriated" means so appropriated as to create an obligation upon the part of its administrators to apply it in a particular manner: Incorporation of Tailors in Glasgow v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue; In re Linen and Woollen Drapers' Institution, 58 L. T. Rep. 949, 36 W. R. Dig. 97; In re Bootham Ward Strays, 40 W. R. 632, at p. 634. Even if there is such an appropriation there is no application of the property for that purpose. Science may be promoted by the education of surgeons, but the main object of the college, as shown by its charters and bye-laws, is to regulate admission to the profession and to protect its members. Since the time of Henry 8 the college has been one of the portals through which members enter the profession. The Medical Act, 1886, shows that there are privileges attaching to membership of the College of Surgeons. As regards the library, there is no legal appropriation of it for the promotion of science. The college might turn it to any use it pleased. The property, therefore, and its income are not exempt from duty.

They also referred to Mayor of Colchester v. Brooks, 7 Q. B. 339, at p. 382 (as to the powers of the college under the old charters); Davies v. Makuna, 33 W. R. 668, 29 Ch. D. 596; Howarth v. Brearley, 36 W. R. 302, 19 Q. B. D. 303.

Paget, in reply.—Before the Medical Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 90), anyone could practise as a surgeon if he obtained the bishops' licence: D'Allan v. Jones, 26 L. J. Ex. 79.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 15.—ROMER, L.J., read the judgment of the court as follows: This is an appeal by the Royal College of Surgeons of England, and raises the question whether certain property of the college is subject to duty under the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885. It is contended by the appellants that the property is exempt from duty under sub-section 3 of section 11 of the Act, as being property which, or the income or profits whereof, is or are legally appropriated and applied for the promotion of science. In order to see whether this contention is correct or not, it is important to ascertain what is the main purpose and object of the college. It was finally determined by the House of Lords in the case of Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Forrest that if the main purpose or object of an institution be the promotion of science, though there may be some subsidiary purposes or objects, then its property, having to be applied and being applied for the purposes of the institution, is legally appropriated and applied for the promotion of science within the meaning of these words as used in the Act, and is accordingly exempt from duty. Now the case before us differs essentially from the case above mentioned of the Institution of Civil Engineers before the House of Lords. That institution had only one main object and purpose. The college has two main objects, each of great importance. In fact it would be difficult to say which of the two main functions imposed on and discharged by the college is the more important. Neither can be considered as merely subsidiary to the other. The one may be shortly described as the promotion of the science of surgery. The other is the promotion and encouragement of the practice of surgery, including the promotion of the interests of those practising or about to practise surgery as a profession, and also including the examination of students and others to qualify for practice or honours in surgery or kindred subjects.

In order to establish this statement as to the second main function, we must shortly refer to some of the more important facts connected with the charters governing the college and the bye-laws, rules, and regulations made thereunder, and the statutes affecting, and duties discharged by, the college. We do not think it necessary for the purpose to inquire in detail into the constitution or duties discharged by, the predecessors of the present corporation, though such an inquiry would tend to confirm the views above expressed. We must, however, point out that by an Act of 18 Geo. c. 15, entitled, "An Act for making the Surgeons of London and the Barbers of London two separate and distinct corporations," the college's immediate predecessor was incorporated under the title of the master, governors, and commonalty of the art and science of surgeons of London, and by section 8 it was provided in substance that persons who passed a satisfactory examination held by that corporation tion should be at liberty to practise as surgeons. By a charter of the 22nd of March, 1800, granted by King George 3, the last-mentioned corporation was declared dissolved and the present college was incorporated. In this charter we find the reasons for its grant stated in the following recitals: "And whereas it is of great consequence to the commonweal of this kingdom that the art and science of surgery should be duly promoted, and whereas it appears to us that the establishment of a college of surgeons will be expedient for the due promotion and encouragement of the study and practice of the said art and science"; and then followed the incorporation of the college. It will be seen from the above recitals that the college was established, not merely for the promotion of the science of surgery, but also for the encouragement and promotion of the practice of surgery. It was also provided by the charter that the college should exercise and enjoy all the rights, liberties, privileges, and possessions of the dissolved corporation, and that the governing body of the college should transact and ordain all such matters and things as the governing body of the dissolved corporation might heretofore have lawfully done, transacted, or ordained. And the charter appointed examiners for the college. It also provided that no person should become a member of the college unless he obtained from it letters testimonial of his qualifications to practise the art and science of surgery. The examiners were, when requested, to examine all army and navy surgeons and their assistants, and to be paid fees for doing so. By a subsequent charter of King George 4, dated 13th of February, 1822, after reciting that it appeared expedient, in order more effectually to promote and encourage the study and practice of the art and science of surgery, that further powers and privileges should be granted to the college, further provisions in its favour were made. By a charter of Her Majesty, dated the 14th of September, 1843, it is provided, "in order more effectually to promote and encourage the study and practice of the said art and science of surgery," that there should be fellows of the college, who were to be appointed after examination by the examiners of the college. By clause 10 of this charter no member of the college was thenceforth to be eligible as a member of the council of the college who was not a fellow, and no fellow was to be eligible whilst practising midwifery or pharmacy, nor unless he should reside and bonâ fide practise his profession of surgeon within five miles from the General Post Office in St. Martin's-le-Grand (this provision was altered by clause 7 of the charter of 1852 and clause 4 of the charter of 1888); and by clause 20 all future examiners were to be elected from the council or from the fellows. By a subsequent charter of Her Majesty, dated the 18th of March, 1852, it was directed by clause 17 that a board of examiners should be appointed by the college for the purpose of testing the fitness of persons to practise in midwifery and of granting certificates of such fitness; and by another charter of the 8th of September, 1859, after referring to the Medical Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 90), there was, in pursuance of the power given by section 48 of that Act, granted to the college power to appoint a board of examiners to test the fitness of persons to practise as dentists who might be desirous of being so examined and to grant certificates of such fitness, and the college was to receive reasonable fees for the examination.

From the time of the above charters the college continued to hold the examinations thereby directed or provided and to grant certificates and to be paid fees for the examinations. In particular we may point out that from the passing of the above-mentioned Act of 18 Geo. 2, c. 15, down to the incorporation of the college its predecessor continued to hold examinations to qualify persons for practising the profession of surgery, and from its incorporation the college continued the examinations until the Medical Act, 1886, hereafter mentioned, came into operation. Persons who passed these examinations became duly qualified to practise under and by virtue of the above-mentioned Act of George 2, which still remains in force. Since the Act of 1886 came into force examinations have been held in pursuance thereof by the college and by the Royal College of Physicians, as hereafter more fully stated. The examination by the college in midwifery ceased in 1888, but the examination in dentistry is still continued. These examinations by the college have always been of great importance, and the certificates given to those who passed have been highly valued in the surgical profession, and a large income has been derived by the college from the fees on these examinations.

The importance of the functions discharged and work done by the college, by its examinations and otherwise, in promoting and encouraging the practice and profession of surgery received further legislative recognition in the year 1858 by the Medical Act then passed. By that Act was established a General Council of Medical Education and Registration of the United Kingdom, and it was provided that one member of that council should be chosen by the college. Numerous powers and duties were imposed on the general council with reference to medical practitioners, and the registration of duly qualified persons thereby provided for. Apart from persons practising before the 1st of August, 1815, only those qualified by certain colleges and bodies set forth in Schedule A could be registered or obtained the benefit of registration. In Schedule A is included "fellow or member or licentiate in midwifery of the Royal College of Surgeons of England." Section 19 provided that any two or more of the above colleges and bodies might, with the sanction of and under the direction of the general council, unite or co-operate in conducting the examinations required for qualifications to be registered under the Act. Section 28 provided that, if any of the said colleges or bodies should at any time exercise any power they possessed by law of striking off from their lists any member, notice should be given to the general council, who might thereupon, if they saw fit, strike off the name of such member from the register as a person qualified by being such member, subject to a proviso that no person should be erased from the register on the ground of his having adopted any theory of medicine or surgery. By section 31 every registered person was to be entitled, according to his qualification, to practise medicine or surgery, or medicine and surgery, as the case might be, with certain privileges therein mentioned, including the right to recover his charges in a court of law. And by section 32 it was provided that no unregistered practitioner should be entitled to recover his charges in a court of law. By the Act various other provisions were made in favour of registered practitioners. This Act, with certain amendments, has since continued in force. By the Medical Act, 1886 (49 & 50 Vict. c. 48), certain alterations were made in the general council, but the college had still the right to choose one member of it, and section 3, sub-section 1 (b), provided that an examination qualifying for registration might be held by any combination of two or more medical corporations in the same part of the United Kingdom who might agree to hold a joint examination in medicine, surgery, and midwifery, and of whom one at least should be capable of granting a diploma conferring the right of registration in respect of medicine, and one at least should be capable of granting such diploma in respect of surgery.

Shortly after this Act, and in pursuance of the above statutory provisions, the College of Surgeons and the Royal College of Physicians agreed to hold, and have since held, such a joint examination as that above mentioned, and for the purpose of such joint examination those two bodies have taken a lease of certain land and erected thereon a hall in which the examination is held; and it is in respect of the college's property in this hall, so far as used for the purpose of the examination, amongst other properties of the college, that this appeal is brought. The college has further duly recognized and carried out its duties connected with the practice and profession of surgery by its bye-laws and rules, many of which are devoted to the maintenance of a high standard of honour in that profession. We may refer by way of example to section 14, sub-section 1, of the bye-laws as to the examinations and qualifications necessary for membership of the college, and to sub-section 4 as to the declaration required of every person on his admission as a member of the college that he will demean himself honourably in the practice of his profession. See also section 16 of the bye-laws, providing that no fellow or member of the college should publicly profess or advertise a secret method or process of cure relating to his practice as a surgeon,* or advertise or publish any matter or thing prejudicial to the interest or derogatory to the honour of the college or disgraceful to the profession of surgery, under penalty of removal from being a fellow or member of the college. Such removal would, of course, have very serious results on the person removed in his practice, especially having regard to the provisions of the Act of 1858. Section 20 of the bye-laws may also be referred to as showing the close connection between the college and the profession. Sub-section 1 provides for the council annually publishing a list of all hospitals and schools of surgery and medicine whose certificates of the professional education of candidates for the fellowship would be received by the college. Sub-section 3 provides for the council making or altering rules respecting the professional education of candidates for the fellowship; and sub-section 4 gives the subjects for the professional examinations for the fellowship. Lastly, the diplomas issued by the college to persons satisfactorily passing the examinations for surgery and dentistry respectively testify under the college seal that those persons are qualified to practise surgery and dental surgery.

We think that the above facts amply show the dual nature of the object and purpose of the college as above stated by us. Now, so far as concerns property which may be legally appropriated and applied to what we have called the second main function of the college, as distinguished from its other function of the promotion of the science of surgery, it appears to us clear that such property would not come within any of the exemptions from duty mentioned in section 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885. It is equally clear that property which may be legally appropriated and applied by the college for the promotion of the science of surgery is exempt from duty. But a question arises as to property of the college which is not legally appropriated and applied to one of the two main functions of the college as distinguished from the other. Of course in a case like that of the Institution of Civil Engineers (Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Forrest) no such question could arise. Where an institution has only one main object and purpose, any property belonging to and properly dealt with by the institution must of necessity "be legally appropriated and applied" for that object and purpose, as was pointed out by the House of Lords. But in a case like the present, where the institution has two main objects, difficulty may arise both under the word "applied" and under the words "legally appropriated." The difficulty under the word "applied" would be merely one of fact—that is to say, the difficulty of determining to which of the two objects the property or its income was in fact being applied. But the words "legally appropriated" raise a question as to their meaning when used in section 11. They clearly mean something more than "applied." And on the construction of the section we agree with the view expressed in the case of The Incorporation of Tailors in Glasgow v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, and in the other authorities cited to the same effect, that the words mean that the property or its income is so appropriated as to create a legal obligation upon the part of its administrators to apply it in a particular manner. Now, there has been no legal appropriation in the above sense of any of the properties the subject of the present appeal, or of their incomes, to the first main object of the college as distinguished from the second main object. As above pointed out, seeing that the college has two functions, there can be no legal appropriation to one as distinguished from the other merely from the fact that the college owns the properties; and there has been no appropriation by the college by conveyance, declaration of trust, or otherwise. So that the college is under no legal obligation either to apply any of such properties or their incomes to the first main function of the college, or not to apply them to its second main function. So that there has been no legal appropriation for a purpose exempting from duty.

But beyond this we agree with our brothers Wright and Channell in the view they took that no property the subject of this appeal, or its income, is being even applied so as to exempt it from duty. For example, the £681 income derived from personal estate is applied for the general purposes of the college, and not separately for the purpose of the promotion of science; and the corpus of that personal estate is of course not applied for the last-mentioned purpose. Similar remarks apply to Nos. 37 and 44, Lincoln's-inn-fields, and the income derived therefrom. As to the part of the examination hall made subject to duty, that is applied for the second rather than for the first main purpose of the college. The offices at Nos. 40, 41, and 42, Lincoln's-inn-fields, which have been made liable to duty, are not applied, in our opinion, for the promotion of the science of surgery. We feel more doubt as to the libraries, but on the whole we think that they are not so applied as to exempt them from duty. They appear to us, on the whole, to be like the case cited of the library of the Society of Writers to the Signet (14 Ct. Sess. Cas. 4th Ser. 34), which was held by the Court of Session in Scotland not to be exempt. The appeal therefore must be dismissed with costs.

In re LANDOR (A SOLICITOR). (a.)

Solicitor—Costs—Taxation—Refusal to deliver bill of costs—Disclaimer of right to costs—Common order to tax.

A client obtained the common order for delivery of a bill of costs and taxation against his solicitor, who had received the loan of money from him. No bill was delivered, and the client moved for leave to issue a writ of attachment. The solicitor, in defence, said he made no claim for costs, and that such a claim, if made, was statute-barred.

Held, that, if the solicitor made a further affidavit that he had not been paid for work done, and refused to claim costs for such work and abandoned any right to receive costs therefor, no bill of costs could be demanded.

In this case it appeared that Robert Landor had acted as solicitor for James Moxon over a period of forty years and had been in the habit of sending in his bill for professional services at stated intervals up to November, 1889, when his last bill was delivered. Since that date Landor had acted as solicitor for Moxon on several occasions, and especially on the sale of some freehold properties in 1892, but he had sent in no bill of costs.

In the year 1891 his client Moxon had lent Landor the sum of £400, and this loan had never been repaid. Moxon made repeated applications to Landor for the bill of costs due after 1889, but no such bill was ever delivered.

On the 23rd of December, 1898, Moxon obtained the common order for delivery of a bill of costs and taxation against the solicitor, but no bill was delivered within the stated period and Moxon now moved for leave to issue a writ of attachment.

On the 22nd of February, 1899, Robert Landor made an affidavit in which he said: "I fully intended to make out an account of my professional charges, but find that owing to the long lapse of time since I acted for the applicant it is impossible for me now to make out a satisfactory bill of costs. As I am informed and believe, counsel on my behalf and also my solicitors have already repeatedly disclaimed all claim to any bill of costs, but the applicant refuses to accept a disclaimer by counsel or solicitors as sufficient and requires me to state on oath, as I now do, that I make no claim for any costs against the applicant. In fact my claim was wholly statute-barred and but for the applicant's submission to pay I could not have made any claim, and I have determined to make no claim."

F. Whinney, for the motion, said that the respondent was bound to deliver his bill of costs and his cash account. He could not get out of his liability by abandoning his claim for costs. His disclaimer only means that he has paid himself out of the client's money in his hands and he must give an account of the balance.

Ashton Cross, for the solicitor, said that he disclaimed all right whatever to the costs by way of set-off or otherwise, and refused to send in a bill. He could not be compelled to deliver a bill of costs when he claimed none, and he could not be compelled to claim costs for the sake of being made to give credit for cash received.

Whinney replied.

NORTH, J., A solicitor cannot get out of delivering his bill by paying his costs out of money belonging to the client in his hands and then saying that no costs are due to him from his client. The defence, however, goes much further than that, and than the affidavit. It admits that he did work for which he might have claimed, and that he has not been paid on account of this work, and refuses to send in a bill of costs now. His right to receive costs on account of this has been abandoned, and the sum in his hands ought to be paid over without any deduction. The solicitor may, however, make a further affidavit that he has not been paid anything on account of work done since the last settled account, and that he refuses to make any claim for such work, and abandons the right to receive costs in respect thereof. It is now suggested that, even after such an affidavit has been made, a cash account is required, because otherwise he would escape the summary jurisdiction of the court. I don't think this is so if a proper application were made, but I do not think the common order to tax involves an account of all monetary transactions between the solicitor and his client independently of costs due from the client. I think after an affidavit of that kind has been made I cannot require a bill of costs. If, therefore, such an affidavit is made, I shall make no order except that the solicitor is to pay the costs of this action.

NICHOLL v. URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL OF EPPING. (a.)

Local government—Public health—Power to require sufficient water-closet to be provided in place of a privy—Injunction—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 35, 36, 268.

Section 36 of the Public Health Act, 1875—which empowers a local authority to give notice requiring the owner of a house to provide a sufficient water-closet, earth-closet, or privy, and an ashpit, or either of them, and, in case of non-compliance, empowers the local authority to do the necessary works and recover the expenses—does authorize the local authority to order a sufficient water-closet to be provided in place of a privy, where the existing accommodation is insufficient.

Motion.

This was a motion by the plaintiff asking for an injunction to restrain the defendants from entering upon certain premises belonging to him, and from interfering with, pulling down, or converting the privies attached to the said premises into water-closets, and from digging into, excavating, or otherwise interfering with the said premises.

The plaintiff was the owner of four cottages at Epping, in Essex, rented at £3 15s. or £4 per annum. Each of the cottages had a privy attached to it.

The defendants were the urban district council for the Urban District of Epping, in the county of Essex.

On the 25th of May, 1898, the district inspector of nuisances reported to the defendants that the said houses were without a sufficient water-closet, earth-closet, or privy, and that a sufficient water-closet ought to be provided.

It appeared that each house was considered separately by the inspector, and that in respect of each house he came to the conclusion that the existing accommodation was insufficient, and ought to be replaced by a sufficient water-closet.

On the same day each report was read at a meeting of the district council; the inspector was present and was consulted as to each report.

Thereupon the defendant council caused notices to be served on the plaintiff in the following form: Take notice that the Urban District Council of Epping, in the county of Essex, being satisfied on the report of their inspector of nuisances, dated 25th day of May, 1898, that the house above described is without a sufficient water-closet, earth-closet, or privy, hereby require you in pursuance of the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875, to provide for the said house within the space of six weeks from service upon you of this notice a sufficient water-closet. If the above notice is not complied with within the time aforesaid, the Urban District Council of Epping may, at the expiration of such time, do the work required to be done and recover the expense incurred in so doing in the manner provided by the said Act.

After some correspondence the defendants gave the plaintiff notice that they intended themselves to do the work necessary for replacing the privies by water-closets. The plaintiff brought this action to restrain the defendants from acting on such notice.

The Public Health Act, 1875, provides: Section 35. "It shall not be lawful newly to erect any house, or to rebuild any house pulled down to or below the ground-floor, without a sufficient water-closet, earth-closet, or privy, and an ashpit furnished with proper doors and coverings. . . . Section 36. If a house within the district of a local authority appears to such authority by the report of their surveyor or inspector of nuisances to be without a sufficient water-closet, earth-closet, or privy, and an ashpit furnished with proper doors and coverings, the local authority shall, by written notice, require the owner or occupier of the house, within a reasonable time therein specified, to provide a sufficient water-closet, earth-closet, or privy and an ashpit furnished as aforesaid, or either of them, as the case may require. If such notice is not complied with, the local authority may, at the expiration of the time specified in the notice, do the work thereby required to be done, and may recover in a summary manner from the owner the expenses incurred by them in so doing. . . ."

Section 268.—Where any person deems himself aggrieved by the decision of the local authority in any case in which the local authority are empowered to recover in a summary manner any expenses incurred by them, or to declare such expenses to be private improvement expenses, he may, within twenty-one days after notice of such decision, address a memorial to the Local Government Board, stating the grounds of his complaint, and shall deliver a copy thereof to the local authority; the Local Government Board may make such order in the matter as to the said board may seem equitable, and the order so made shall be binding and conclusive on all parties. Any proceedings that may have been commenced for the recovery of such expenses by the local authority shall, on the delivery to them of such copy as aforesaid, be stayed; and the Local Government Board may, if it thinks fit, by its order, direct the local authority to pay to the person so proceeded against such sum as the said board may consider to be a just compensation for the loss, damage, or grievance thereby sustained by him.

Upjohn, Q.C., and Stokes, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff is willing to make the privies sufficient. Under the Public Health Act he has an option as to the nature of the accommodation, and as long as it is sufficient the local authority has nothing to do with the nature of the accommodation. The only power of the defendants was to require the accommodation to be made sufficient, but not to compel him to provide a sufficient water-closet.

They referred to the Public Health Act, 1875, ss. 35, 36, 37, 38, 40, 41; Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), s. 81; Barnett v. Laskey, 68 L. J. Q. B. 55; Tinkler v. Wandsworth Board of Works, 6 W. R. 390, 27 L. J. Ch. 342, 2 De G. & J. 261; St. Luke's Vestry v. Lewis, 10 W. R. 249, 1 B. & S. 865.

Macmorran, Q.C., and Parkyn, for the defendants, relied on the statutory rights of the district board under the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 36. No particular kind of water-closet was insisted upon, but only, in the words of the section, "a sufficient water-closet." The plaintiff has mistaken his remedy. He must either comply with the order of the local authority, and erect suitable water-closets, or he must permit the local authority to erect them, and then when called upon to pay, appeal to the Local Government Board under the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 268. The question of sufficiency is not one for the court to consider.

They referred to St. Luke's Vestry v. Lewis; Tinkler v. Wandsworth Board of Works; Wood v. Widnes Corporation, 46 W. R. 293, [1898] 1 Q. Upjohn, Q.C., replied.

April 28.—STIRLING, J., in giving judgment, after stating the facts and referring to the notices served on the plaintiff, said: This action was brought to restrain the defendants from acting on these notices. It was admitted that the plaintiff could not in this court impeach the report of the inspector; and that, if the plaintiff had any ground of complaint in respect of it, his course was to appeal to the Local Government Board under section 268 of the Public Health Act of 1875. Upon the hearing of the motion two objections were raised to the proceedings of the defendants. First, that the local authority were acting in pursuance of a general scheme to introduce water-closets in the place of privies without exercising a discretion as to the exigencies of each particular case, as required by the statute. This was rightly abandoned in the course of the argument. The second objection, and that chiefly relied upon by the plaintiff, was that the defendants had no authority to require the plaintiff to provide a sufficient water-closet in place of a privy. The determination of the question thus raised turns upon a few words in the Public Health Act, 1875, ss. 35, 36. [His lordship read the sections.] It was quite clear that the Legislature had not prohibited the erection of privies. The question was whether the local authority, having found an existing privy to be insufficient, had power to require the owner to provide a sufficient water-closet, subject, of course, to a right of appeal to the Local Government Board similar to that which admittedly existed as to the sufficiency of the existing accommodation. The material words in section 36 were "or either of them, as the case may require." The plaintiff contended that these words related merely to "privy and an ashpit"; the defendants contended, on the other hand, that they related to the three classes of accommodation, "water-closet, earth-closet, or privy and an ashpit." In my opinion the words "or either of them, as the case may require," read in their natural sense, have not the narrow meaning contended for by the plaintiff. There is no decision precisely in point upon the Public Health Act, 1875. Wood v. Widnes Corporation referred to a different point; for there the local authority gave notices prescribing the particular form of closet to be adopted; and the expressions which occurred in the judgments of the learned judges seem to be directed to the question before them and not to that which I have now to decide. Reference has been made, however, to decisions on the provisions of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, s. 81. In Tinkler v. Metropolitan Board of Works, 2 De G. & J. 261, Knight Bruce, L.J., expressed an opinion that the provisions of that Act did not constitute the local authority the judges of what ought to be required to be provided in the place of defective existing accommodation. Turner, L.J., expressed no opinion as to this, but gave his decision on the ground that the local authority was acting in pursuance of a general scheme. In Vestry of St. Luke's v. Lewis, the question came before the Court of Queen's Bench, consisting of Cockburn, C.J., Wightman and Crompton, JJ. They unanimously held that the local authority had the power claimed, but each relied on the frame of the latter portion of the clause in the Act under consideration, which differed from that which I have now to consider. The Chief Justice, however, pointed out reasons why the Legislature might have thought right to entrust such a power to the local authority. The abuse of such a power was guarded against by the right of appeal to the Local Government Board. It was said that on the view of the law contended for by the defendants, an owner having provided accommodation in accordance with section 35 might within a year or other short time be compelled under section 36 to provide accommodation of a different kind. That, however, could only happen on the occurrence of two events—(1) That the accommodation provided proved insufficient; and (2) that the circumstances of the particular case required another kind of accommodation; and on both those points the owners would have a right of appeal. Although the language of the Public Health Act, 1875, differs from that of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, yet under section 36 of the former Act, if the notice was not complied with, the local authority might do the work thereby required to be done; so that even if the notice followed the exact terms of the Act, the discretion as to the precise work to be executed would ultimately rest with the authority. On the whole, although the enactment is not so clear as that in the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, I think that the language is sufficient to confer the power claimed by the defendants, and that the motion consequently fails.

TIESSEN v. HENDERSON AND OTHERS. (a.)

Company—Reconstruction scheme—Special resolution—Notice of meeting—Sufficiency—Non-disclosure of interest of directors—Underwriting—Injunction.

In a notice convening an extraordinary general meeting for the discussion of the reconstruction of a company by the sale of the undertaking to another company, it was stated, inter alia, that the full issue of debentures had been guaranteed by a third company.

By another notice, convening a second extraordinary general meeting, the proposal to adopt the said reconstruction scheme was made conditional upon the non-acceptance of an alternative scheme. Neither notice disclosed the fact that the directors of the selling company were directors of or largely interested in the guaranteeing company. The resolutions as to the said reconstruction scheme were passed and confirmed.

Held, that the notices did not sufficiently disclose the interests of the defendant directors, and that therefore the resolutions were not binding upon shareholders absent from the meeting (Kaye v. Croydon Tramways Co., 46 W. R. 405, [1898] 1 Ch. 358, discussed and followed); but that all the shareholders had been sufficiently informed of the conditional proposal announced in the second notice.

Motion made by a shareholder of the Violet Consolidated Gold Mining Co., suing on behalf of himself and the other shareholders, against the directors and liquidator of the company, asking for an interim injunction to restrain the defendants from carrying into effect or acting upon certain resolutions passed at two extraordinary general meetings of the company.

On the 7th of February, 1899, a notice was sent out to the shareholders of the company stating that an extraordinary general meeting would be held on the 16th of February for the purpose of considering and, if thought fit, passing certain resolutions which were set out in the notice as to the winding-up and reconstruction of the company, and the approval of a draft agreement between the company and its liquidator of the one part and a new company about to be formed of the other part. A circular which accompanied the notice set out the nature of the scheme for reconstruction, stating that "the full issue of debentures has been guaranteed by the Henderson's Transvaal Estates (Limited), so as to secure the necessary amount for paying off the mortgage and for carrying on the work of the company." It having been mentioned that, out of the 500,000 proposed shares, 100,000 would be "kept in reserve," the circular further stated that "a call on shares is reserved as to 50,000 for the managers and issuing company, and as to the remaining 50,000 for the guarantors"; and it was further proposed "that the board of the company should consist of Messrs. Henderson, Richards, Schlesinger, and Van Ryn, and the Hon. Chandos Stanhope, as representing the Consolidated Gold Fields" (to which company it was proposed to entrust the management of the company in South Africa). The said circular did not disclose the facts that the first defendant Henderson was a director of the Violet Consolidated Gold Mining Co., and chairman of, and large shareholder in Henderson's Transvaal Estates (Limited), and that some of the other directors of the Violet Co., who were defendants, were also personally interested in Henderson's (Limited). At the meeting of the 16th of February, when the resolutions were carried, another scheme was brought forward, and, by another notice of the 23rd of February, the shareholders were informed that an extraordinary general meeting would be called to consider resolutions to adopt this new scheme (referred to as that of the General Mining and Finance Corporation (Limited)). The notice further stated that in the event of such resolutions not being passed, an extraordinary general meeting would be held to confirm the resolutions passed at the meeting of the 16th of February, and to approve the agreement with Henderson's (Limited); it was mentioned that "the directors would suggest that both meetings should be held together." In the event the resolutions as to the new scheme were not passed, the meeting in that respect being adjourned; the resolutions relating to the first scheme were, however, confirmed.

Article 51 of the articles of association of the Violet Co. provided, in respect of general meetings, that seven clear days' notice at the least, specifying the place, the date, and the hour of meeting, and in the case of special business the general nature of the business, should be given by notice as therein provided.

Warmington, Q.C., Warrington, Q.C., and Gore-Browne, for the plaintiff, contended that the first notice was bad because it did not disclose the interest which the directors, or some of them, were to get in the guaranteeing company under the proposed agreement (Kaye v. Croydon Tramways Co., 46 W. R. 405, [1898] 1 Ch. 358); and that the second notice, calling the meeting for confirmation, was bad for being conditional: Alexander v. Simpson, 38 W. R. 161, 43 Ch. D. 139.

Ingle Joyce, for the defendant Henderson, stated that he had done what he thought best for the company.

Renshaw, Q.C., and G. F. Hart, for the defendant Schlesinger, argued that the real ground of the decision of the Court of Appeal in Kaye v. Croydon Tramways Co. was that the agreement submitted to the meeting was in reality a twofold agreement (on the one hand for sale, and on the other for the compensation of the officers) which was not properly set out in the notice, and the court in consequence thought it bad. Schlesinger did not get any personal profit from his agreement with respect to underwriting. He was a stockbroker, and acted wholly for the benefit of his clients.

They also referred to Grant v. United Kingdom Switchback Railways Co., 37 W. R. 312, 40 Ch. D. 135, per Cotton, L.J., at p. 139.

Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Austen Cartmell, for the Violet Co. and its liquidator.

KEKEWICH, J.—It has always seemed to me that the application of the doctrine of Foss v. Harbottle, 2 Hare 461, to joint-stock companies involves, as a necessary corollary, the proposition that the vote of the general meeting, which binds a dissentient and an absent minority by a majority, must be a vote given with the utmost fairness; that not only must the matter be fairly put before the meeting, but that the meeting itself must be conducted in the fairest possible manner. The well-known case of Menier v. Hooper's Telegraph Works, 22 W. R. 396, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 350, illustrated that; and it may be that the law, which is not, I think, in a satisfactory condition as regards the exceptions to the general rule, may be elucidated by the Court of Appeal in the case of Hovenden v. Wallis, which was before me not very long ago. Then I may hazard the hope that we shall have an exposition of the doctrine on the subject, because I do not think at present we know quite where we are. But I think that if you are to apply that rule in its entirety, as, of course, it is my duty and wish to do, that a vote of the majority controls the minority, and, of course, also the absent shareholder, it is a matter of absolute necessity that there should be the most perfect straightforwardness and openness throughout. The question is whether each shareholder as and when he received the notice of the meeting, in which I include the circular which was of the same date, and I suppose sent at the same time—whether as each shareholder received those documents he had fair warning of what was to be submitted to the meeting. A man may with great propriety throw a notice of that kind into the waste-paper basket. He does not do that prudently without reading it, but if when he reads it he sees that it is a matter which he does not care to take any personal interest in, but is willing to leave it to the decision of the majority, no one can say that he is not acting prudently and safely. He is content to be bound by the vote of the majority, but he is content because he knows what the majority are to vote about, and what the matter is before the meeting; and if he does not know that, then he has not a fair chance of determining what is his duty to himself—that is to say, whether he ought to attend the meeting, whether he ought to make further inquiries, or whether he may leave it to others to determine for him.

It has been argued on behalf of the defendants by Mr. Renshaw that there is no necessity for a director to disclose his interest to a general meeting. I observe that that point, or a point of that kind, was argued in the case of Kaye v. The Croydon Tramways Co., because it is alluded to by Lindley, M.R., in his judgment. The question which, it seems to me, I have to consider here is whether a director's interest must be disclosed, not because it is his duty to disclose his interest, but because it is the duty of the board to tell the shareholders precisely that, or fairly that, about which they are to vote. I have before me the notice of the 7th and the circular, which I think must be treated as one document. There is no inconvenience, irregularity, or impropriety in supplementing, as is often done, a notice by an explanatory circular; and the shareholder, though perhaps strictly he might say, "Why trouble me with a circular? What I am entitled to is a notice," still I think may be fairly entitled to look at the two as one document, and he has both before him for his consideration. The notice in this particular case tells us nothing really except a resolution to be proposed. With that I pass over that part of the compound document. The circular does tell us a great deal more, and it is important to notice that it does expressly say that a call on shares is reserved as to 50,000 for the managers and issuing company, and as to the remaining 50,000 for the guarantors, which has to be exercised at par within three years from the date of the formation of the new company. Then a little further down in the next paragraph but one there is a statement that the full issue of the debentures has been guaranteed by the Henderson's Transvaal Estates (Limited) the result being that the call of 50,000 shares is stated to belong to Henderson's Transvaal Estates (Limited). It is a little more difficult to understand from the circular what is to be done with the other 50,000 shares. They are to be reserved for the managers and issuing company—the managers are the Consolidated Gold Fields of South Africa (Limited), but I do not myself find any mention of the issuing company, and that seems to me a fault in drafting the circular. But that is, to my mind, of little importance, because the issuing company might be any company, and it is not suggested here—at least, I do not understand it to be suggested—that the issuing company were the Henderson's Transvaal Estates (Limited), and as long as there was some company issuing and they, with the managers—namely, the Consolidated Gold Fields of South Africa (Limited), had the call of 50,000 shares, this circular, though not quite plain and explicit, is sufficiently plain for practical purposes. Then we come to this, that Mr. Henderson was the chairman of Henderson's Transvaal Estates (Limited) and he was a very large shareholder in that company, and he was to receive considerable benefit, or was likely to receive considerable benefit, from the adoption of this scheme. It is said that it was well known, at any rate to a large number of the shareholders, that he occupied that position; and I think it must be taken to be well known that Henderson's Transvaal Estates (Limited) was largely interested in the reconstruction of the company—largely interested, that is to say, in the company, reconstructed or not reconstructed. I am not disposed to attach much weight to the position of Mr. Henderson. I think it would have been better, and made the thing more clear, if that had been dwelt upon; but if that stood alone I do not think that that would be sufficient to justify me in saying that this circular was not thoroughly explicit so as to put the thing fairly before the shareholders.

But two other directors were distinctly interested. Mr. Van Ryn had agreed to underwrite a certain number of the debentures. I will take it from his own affidavit. He says: "I agreed to underwrite or guarantee the subscription of a portion of the debentures, and was to receive as commission or remuneration for so doing a call on certain shares of the new company in the same proportion as others who were willing to underwrite the debentures." It seems that later he withdrew from that, and there was no binding contract, but when the notice was issued it undoubtedly was his own statement that he had made what he calls an agreement, and what ordinary persons call an agreement, although it may not be enforceable in a court of law, to underwrite the debentures and to receive a commission for the same, and that fact was not disclosed. Mr. Schlesinger, another director, was still more largely interested, practically in the same way. He was a stockbroker, he had clients who were largely interested in this company, and he busied himself on behalf of his clients. He says that he was to receive no benefit from it himself, that he only did it on behalf of his clients. It seems to me impossible to go into that. The man who really entered into the agreement by which he was to receive a large benefit—namely, a call on shares to the extent of 12,500, a fourth of the 50,000, was Mr. Schlesinger, and how he was to distribute them among other people seems to me to be perfectly immaterial. He was the only man known to the directors—the only man known to those who were craving this reconstruction scheme. Who his clients were was not stated, and was not inquired into by anyone. That is a fact which is left out again; and therefore the shareholder who receives this circular is told, no doubt, that there is to be a call on 50,000 shares for the managers and the issuing company and another 50,000 for the guarantors; he is told that the 50,000 are going to the guarantors, he is told that the other 50,000 are going to the Consolidated Gold Fields of South Africa (Limited), either that company or some other company which is the issuing company; but he is not told that some of his own directors, the persons whom he is trusting to put this before the meeting, are themselves largely interested in this, and that they are to have a portion of the call on these shares. We must regard the shareholder as a man of ordinary prudence. Treating it as a commercial matter, he has invested his money in this company; the company is in difficulties, and reconstruction is necessary, and what he has to consider when the notice and circular come to him is whether, on the whole, this is the best thing that can be done. He is either to vote himself in person or by proxy, or he is to leave it to the majority to decide. It seems to me impossible to exclude from the matters which he ought, as a prudent man to consider, the question whether some of his directors should be remunerated by the means of this call on shares. It is really the same thing which occurred in Kaye v. The Croydon Tramways Co. There is a passage in Rigby, L.J.'s, judgment which I only read because he expresses agreement with what the Master of the Rolls said in his own language, and so one has the conjoint opinion. On p. 373 of [1898] L. R. 1 Ch. he says: "I quite agree with what the Master of the Rolls has said, that no man of business would ever come to the conclusion that when a meeting was summoned for the purpose of sanctioning a sale from the company to a purchaser, it was also intended at that meeting to do so different a thing as to sanction the payment of a portion of the consideration that was to proceed from the purchaser, not to the company, but to the directors of the company." It seems to me that with a very slight change of words you may apply that directly to this case. Why should any shareholder reading this think for a moment that two of his directors (I am including Mr. Henderson) were to have a large proportion of the 50,000 on which there was to be a call in favour of the guarantors? He is told that the guarantors were Henderson's Transvaal Estates (Limited). He is not told that the guarantors were to be some of his own directors, and that they were to derive a personal benefit. Of course I am told—and with perfect honesty, I have no doubt—that these gentlemen only wished to do the best for the company, that they were largely interested in it, and they thought it the best thing to do. True; but they did so for a commission or for remuneration, and they were not prepared to do the best they could without being paid for it—neither Mr. Schlesinger nor Mr. Van Ryn, and those facts were not stated in the circular. If a meeting properly convened, and properly instructed as to the purpose for which it is convened, chooses to assent to this, there is no reason on earth why they should not; but I think they ought to have the opportunity of considering it. The man I am protecting is not the dissentient shareholder, but the absent shareholder—the man who is absent because with more or less care—perhaps less, but still, having received this, and looked at it, comes to the conclusion that on the whole he would not oppose; he would leave it to the majority. I cannot tell—none can tell—whether he would have left it to the majority of the meeting to decide if he had known the real facts. He did not know the real facts; and therefore I think the resolution is not binding upon him.

[On the second point his lordship was of opinion that Alexander v. Simpson was entirely different from the present case, and continued:] The second part of the meeting was to be held at a certain place, at a certain time, on a certain date. I think that the shareholder had ample notice of what was intended to be done, that there was nothing conditional to affect his mind.

But, on the other ground, I think the plaintiffs are entitled to an injunction restraining the defendants and each of them until the hearing of this action or further order from acting upon or carrying into effect the three resolutions referred to in the indorsement on the writ. The liquidator will also be restrained.

SALTON v. NEW BEESTON CYCLE CO. (a.)

Company—Director—Qualification—Implied contract to acquire—Remuneration—Apportionment.

The terms of the implied agreement between a director who has accepted office and acted, and the company—viz., on his part to serve the company on the terms of the articles, and on the company's part that he shall receive the remuneration provided by the articles—are cross-contracts, and are not interdependent.

An article providing that the office of a director shall be vacated if he cease to hold the due qualification, does not apply to the case of a qualification never possessed.

An article providing a sum for the remuneration of the board in each year applies to every member of the board, including a de jure director who has not acquired his qualification shares under the articles.

The omission to apply for and obtain such shares from the company is not such a breach of duty as to constitute a defence to any claim for remuneration.

Where the articles provide a sum for the remuneration of the board "in each year," no remuneration can be claimed except for a complete year, and there is no apportionment in respect of an incomplete year.

Action.

The above-named company was incorporated under the Companies Acts on the 3rd of June, 1886, with a nominal capital of £1,000,000, divided into 100,000 shares of £10 each.

By article 79 of the articles of association the first directors were to be nominated in writing by the subscribers to the memorandum of association, and Lord Norreys, one of the defendants in the above action, was one of the persons nominated.

Articles 80 and 81, upon which the questions arising for decision mainly turned, were as follows: "80. The qualification of a director shall be the holding of shares of the company of the nominal amount of £250. A first director may act before acquiring his qualification, but shall in any case acquire the same within one month from his appointment, and unless he shall do so, he shall be deemed to have agreed to take the said shares from the company, and the same shall be forthwith allotted to him accordingly. 81. The board shall be entitled to receive by way of remuneration in each year £5,000. Such remuneration shall be divided among the directors in such proportion and manner as they shall from time to time agree, or, in default of agreement, equally. The company in general meeting may increase the amount of such remuneration, either permanently or for a year or longer term." And by article 92 the office of a director was to be vacated, inter alia, if he "ceased to hold the due qualification."

Lord Norreys did not acquire any shares before the end of the month from his appointment, but in March, 1897, he acquired twenty-five shares, not from the company, but from the promoter, and that, as the court held, plainly did not satisfy the requirements of article 80.

The capital subscribed was only £140,000, a sum which was inadequate for the purposes of the company. The company was accordingly wound up in November, 1897.

Between June, 1896, and November, 1897, Lord Norreys attended eight meetings of the board, and that was all he appeared to have done in his character of director. Mr. Jarratt, one of the original directors, retired on the 18th of November, 1896, and the directors (including Lord Norreys) resolved to pay him £100 as remuneration for his services, and this sum was paid by the company. It was suggested that on that day Lord Norreys and the other directors agreed to make no claim for remuneration, but the evidence did not suffice to prove this. Jarratt's place was not filled up, and there were thenceforward only six directors. At a meeting of the board of directors on the 14th of July, 1897, at which Lord Norreys was not present, the other directors resolved not to claim remuneration.

The above action was by a party claiming as mortgagee of Lord Norreys to recover the moneys alleged to be due to Lord Norreys from the company in respect of his director's fees and remuneration.

Eve, Q.C., and T. L. Wilkinson, for the plaintiff.—Lord Norreys was not a party to the resolution by which the other directors agreed not to claim remuneration, and anything which he has done or omitted to do cannot deprive him or the plaintiff, who stands in his shoes, of the right to receive his directors' remuneration under the articles in respect of the full period from June, 1896, to November, 1897, during which the company was in existence.

Younger, for the company.—Lord Norreys is not entitled to any remuneration. The contracts to take qualification shares and for remuneration are mutual, and only a duly qualified director can claim it: Eley v. Positive Assurance Co., 24 W. R. 338, 1 Ex. D. 88: Swabey v. Port Darwin Gold Mining Co., 1 Megone, 385; see also Isaacs' case, 40 W. R. 518, [1892] 2 Ch. 158, 164; Archer's case, 40 W. R. 212, [1892] 1 Ch. 322, 337. There is at anyrate no liability to pay more than a year's remuneration. There is no apportionment of directors' remuneration: Lowndes v. Earl of Stamford, 18 Q. B. 425.

Eve, in reply.—Lord Norreys was not disqualified. Forbes' case shows that article 92 does not touch him: L. R. 8 Ch. App., at p. 768, 775. Isaacs' case defines his position, and is not in favour of the defendant. See also Hutchinson's case, 43 W. R. 267, [1895] 1 Ch. 226. The contracts for acquiring qualification shares and for remuneration are separate and not interdependent. As to the amount of remuneration the meaning of the articles is that it is to be at the rate of £5,000 per annum: In re Peruvian Guano Co., 43 W. R. 170, [1894] 3 Ch. 690.

March 23.—COZENS-HARDY, J., after stating the facts of the case, said: Lord Norreys having accepted the office of director and acted as such, I must infer an agreement between him and the company, on his part that he will serve the company on the terms as to qualification and otherwise contained in the articles, and on the part of the company that he shall receive the remuneration provided by the articles for the directors: see Isaacs' case. I think these must be regarded as cross-contracts and not as interdependent contracts. The resolution of the 14th of July, 1897, in no way bound Lord Norreys or his mortgagee. It remains therefore, to consider what are the legal rights of Lord Norreys against the company, for the plaintiff cannot stand in a better position than Lord Norreys. It was argued by counsel on the part of the company that Lord Norreys vacated his office of director at the end of the first month, so that no remuneration could be claimed for more than one month. It seems to me, however, that it is an unnatural interpretation of article 92 to say that Lord Norreys "ceased to hold" the due qualification when in fact he never had any qualification. The article contemplates the use of a qualification once possessed and subsequently lost, but not the case of a qualification never possessed. It was next contended that article 81, according to its true construction, could only apply to a board of duly qualified directors, and that, therefore, Lord Norreys could not claim any remuneration. If Lord Norreys had only been a de facto director and never a de jure director I think there might have been force in this contention, but it seems to follow from what I have held on the first point that Lord Norreys, not having ceased to be a director, must be regarded as still a member of the board, and as such entitled to remuneration. It was further contended that the omission to apply for and obtain shares from the company was such a breach of duty on the part of Lord Norreys that it might be available as a defence to any claim for remuneration. I think, however, that this is not the true view, and that, although the company may have a cross-claim against Lord Norreys for £250, they cannot deny his title to some remuneration. The plaintiff contended that Lord Norreys was entitled to one equal sixth share of remuneration at the rate of £5,000 a year from the incorporation of the company to the date of winding up after deducting from the total remuneration the £100 paid to Mr. Jarratt, he never having concurred in any other division. Against this it was urged that at the utmost only one year's remuneration could be claimed, and that there is no apportionment in respect of an incomplete year. This seems to me to be right. Article 81 does not give remuneration at the rate of £5,000 a year, but only provides that the board shall be entitled to receive by way of remuneration in each year £5,000. I see no ground for extending this language or for holding that any remuneration can be claimed except for a complete year. It follows, therefore, that Lord Norreys can only claim against the company one-sixth of £4,900. I was asked by the company's counsel at the bar to allow an amendment of the defence by claiming a set-off in respect of the £250 due from Lord Norreys to the company for the shares which he has been liable to take and pay for since July, 1896. I allow the amendment, and I think the company is entitled to the set-off as against the plaintiff, Lord Norreys' mortgagee. The result is that I must give judgment for the plaintiff for £816 13s. 4d., less £250—that is to say, for £566 13s. 4d.—and the company must pay the costs of the action, such costs not to be increased by reason of the joinder of Lord Norreys as a defendant.

EATON v. TAPLEY. (a.)

County court—Practice—Notice of statutory defence—Statute of Limitations—County Court Rules, 1889, 1895, ord. 10, rr. 14, 14a, 18a—Form 95a.

In a county court action a notice of a defence under a statute of limitation, filed under ord. 10, r. 10, is sufficient if it complies with ord. 10, r. 14a, and Form 95a, and need not set forth the particular statute relied on nor the date from which it began to run. Ord. 10, r. 18a, does not apply to defences under statutes of limitation.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from a county court.

The respondent brought an action in a county court against the appellant for money lent. The appellant, within five days of the return day, filed a notice that he intended to rely upon the defence of a statute of limitation. The notice was in accordance with form 95*a* of the County Court Forms, 1895.

The county court judge held that the notice was insufficient, and gave judgment for the respondent.

Ord. 10, r. 10, of the County Court Rules, 1889, provides as follows: "Where the defendant intends to rely upon any of the grounds of defence mentioned in rules 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, and 20 of this order, or upon any counterclaim, he shall file a notice stating thereon his name and address, together with a concise statement of such grounds, five clear days before the return day; . . ."

Ord. 10, r. 14, is as follows: "When a defendant intends to rely on the defence of any statute of limitations, he shall in his statement specify the date from which he alleges that the statute began to run."

Form 95 of the County Court Forms, 1889, paragraph 3, which is the part applicable to ord. 10, r. 14, is as follows: "Take notice, that the defendant intends at the hearing of this action to give in evidence and rely upon the following ground of defence. . . . That the claim for which the defendant is summoned is barred by a statute of limitation. [Here set forth the statute and the date from which it began to run]."

Ord. 10, r. 14*a*, made in 1895, is as follows: "Ord. 10, r. 14, and the third paragraph of form 95, are hereby annulled; and where a defendant intends to rely on the defence of any statute of limitations, his statement shall be according to form 95*a* in the appendix."

Form 95*a* (County Court Rules, 1895) begins like form 95 of the Rules of 1889, and proceeds: "That the claim for which the defendant is summoned is barred by a statute of limitation."

Ord. 10, r. 18*a*, is as follows: "When in any action the defendant relies upon any statutory defence, or any defence of which he is required by any statute to give notice, he shall in his statement set forth the year, chapter, and section of the statute, or the short title thereof, and the particular matter upon which he relies."

Loehnis, for the appellant.—The notice of special defence is sufficient. It is not now necessary in giving notice of a defence under a statute of limitations to set forth the statute or the date from which it began to run, because rule 14*a* of order 10 expressly annuls rule 14 and substitutes a new form in which the directions to set forth the statute and the date are omitted. The history of the rules shows that ord. 10, r. 18*a*, was not intended to apply to defences of a statute of limitation.

Sims Williams, for the respondent.—The notice was insufficient because it did not comply with the provisions of ord. 10, r. 18*a*: see Brutton v. Branson, [1898] 2 Q. B. 219, 46 W. R. Dig. 41, and Pullen v. Snelus, 27 W. R. 534, 48 L. J. Q. B. 394.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—No one can say that this point is plain. But it is unnecessary to follow Mr. Loehnis through the history of this evolution of confused forms. I give my judgment upon a construction of the rules of 1895 as compared with those of 1889. Under ord. 10, r. 14, there is an obligation to set forth the statute of limitation which is relied on and the date from which it began to run. The rules were reframed in 1895, and rule 14*a* is substituted for rule 14, and rule 14 is annulled. A new form is given in which the words "here set forth the statute and the day from which it began to run" are omitted. If the matter stood there it would be too clear for argument. But then comes ord. 10, r. 18*a*. How is rule 14*a* to be reconciled with rule 18*a*? In this way. Out of the operation of rule 18*a* you are to except cases provided for by rule 14*a*. The learned county court judge was wrong in holding that the defendant had not complied with the rules, and the case must be remitted to him.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. Ord. 10, r. 18*a*, might well have been thought to apply to defences under statutes of limitation if provision had not already been made in the case of such defences in rule 14*a* of the same order. It is impossible to suppose that, having provided in one rule that one thing shall be done, the framers of the rules intended in another rule to order that a perfectly different thing should be done.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree with the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice.

Appeal allowed.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, M.R., and Rigby and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.) — Jan. 25; Feb. 16.

In re WREXHAM, MOLD, AND CONNAH'S QUAY RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Railway company—Unauthorized borrowing—Interest on debenture stock—Overdrawn banking account—Subrogation of lender to rights of creditors—Secured creditors.

A railway company having power to borrow money by the creation of three classes of debenture stock, A, B, and C, had exhausted its borrowing powers, and then applied to its bankers for a loan in order to pay the half-yearly interest then due on the debenture stocks. The bank made the requisite advance. Shortly afterwards a judgment creditor of the company petitioned for and obtained the appointment of a receiver. The A stock had priority over the B and C stock, and the B stock over the C stock.

It subsequently came to the knowledge of the bank that the income of the company in the receiver's hands was sufficient to pay the next half-year's interest on the A stock, and part of the interest on the B stock.

Held, affirming Romer, J. (ante, p. 172), on the application of the bank, that the bank was not entitled to be repaid in priority to the B stockholders, even to the extent of the interest on the A stock paid out of the bank's money.

If a lender advances money to a company which has exhausted its borrowing powers, he is only entitled to have that portion of the advance actually expended in payments of debts of the company treated as a valid advance.

No right of subrogation to the securities or priorities of creditors paid off out of moneys borrowed in excess of borrowing powers can be justified in principle.

Appeal of the North and South Wales Bank from Romer, J. (reported ante, p. 172).

(a.) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Wrexham, &c., Railway Co. had power by their Act of 1883 to create and issue debenture stock to the extent of £175,000 by A stock, £175,000 by B stock, and by a further Act of 1888 to the extent of £145,000 by C stock. The A stock had priority both in principal and interest over the B and C stocks, and the B stock had a similar priority over the C stock.

In July, 1897, the borrowing powers of the railway company being exhausted, they applied to their bankers, the North and South Wales Bank, for an overdraft with which to pay the interest becoming due on the 1st of August on the debenture stocks. A sum of £9,672 was thus advanced, of which £3,850 was used for the payment of interest on the A debenture stock.

On the 5th of August, 1897, the Great Central Railway Co. obtained judgment against the Wrexham Co. for a sum of £59,128, and on a petition under the Railway Companies Act, 1867, obtained an order for the appointment of a receiver on the 12th of August.

The current account of the Wrexham Co. was discontinued by the receiver on the 5th of November, 1897, when the debt due to the bank amounted to £7,601.

The bank claimed to be entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the debenture stockholders, first of all, to the full extent of the £9,672 which they had paid to the debenture stockholders, in priority to any payment to be made by the receiver to the debenture stockholders. Romer, J., disallowed this claim on the 1st of November.

The bank then claimed to be subrogated to the extent of the £3,850 paid by them to the A stockholders, and to be entitled to payment out of any surplus in the receiver's hands in priority to any payment to the B and C stockholders. Romer, J., disallowed this claim also.

The bank appealed.

Neville, Q.C., Methold, and Danckwerts, for the appellants, used the same arguments as in the court below.

Frederick Thompson, for the A and B debenture-holders.

Theobald, Q.C., for the C debenture-holders.

R. J. Parker, for the Wrexham Co.

Mark Romer, for the judgment creditors, the Great Central Railway Co.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 16.—The following written judgments were delivered:

LINDLEY, M.R.—Agreeing as I do with Romer, J., and with the judgments which my brothers have prepared, and which I have read, I should say nothing more if it were not that I think I ought to express my dissent from the observations of Fry, L.J., on which the appellants base their contention. The decision of the court in Baroness Wenlock v. River Dee Co., 35 W. R. 822, 19 Q. B. D. 155, was quite right, and the judgment in it is very valuable. Fry, L.J., who delivered it, was the very last person to shut his eyes and not get at the real facts and substance of any case before him. But in dealing with that case the lord justice says (p. 165) that "the court closes its eyes to the true facts of the case." I cannot help thinking that this is incorrect. A prohibition against borrowing more than a given sum is only in reality and substance disobeyed when an obligation to pay more than that sum is contracted. Courts of equity have always looked into the facts to see whether the prohibition has been really disobeyed or not. If it is disobeyed, and to the extent to which it is disobeyed, the prohibition is enforced. But if the facts when ascertained show that in truth it has not been disobeyed, an advance of money is treated as not prohibited, although it may at first sight appear to be so, because it is beyond the limited amount. The application of the money borrowed shows whether the obligations of the borrowing company have been increased or not, and the extent, if any, to which they have been increased. So far as such money has been applied in discharging debts or liabilities which could be enforced against the company, the prohibition against borrowing does not apply to it, and the courts have so decided. The subrogation theory has been had recourse to in order to account for the decisions ultimately arrived at; but the theory was really not wanted in order to justify them. It was, however, adequate for the purposes for which it was used, and as applied to the cases before the courts it led to just results. But, if logically followed out in other cases, it leads to consequences not only not foreseen by those who had recourse to it, but to results so startling that I cannot accept the theory as sound. There is no decision yet in which it has been applied so as to defeat any innocent person, nor so as to place the lender in a better position than he would have been in if his loan had not been prohibited. But that would be the result in this case if we adopted that theory and pushed it to its logical consequences, as the appellants contended we ought.

The Legislature (30 & 31 Vict. c. 127, s. 26) has recognized and partially acted upon the true principle in enacting that money borrowed and applied in paying off existing statutory mortgages or bonds shall, so far as the same is so applied, be deemed money borrowed within and not in excess of its statutory powers. This principle obviously cannot in reason be confined to statutory bonds or mortgages; and courts of equity have acted upon the principle, and have not confined its application within arbitrary limits, but have enforced it more widely than the Legislature, in order to prevent great injustice. They have done so, however, not by closing their eyes to the real facts and acting on a fiction, but by diligently ascertaining the real truth and by attending to the real substance of each case. Even if the fiction of subrogation were correct, the maxim In fictione juris semper existit æquitas would prevent its application to this case.

RIGBY, L.J.—The only questions arising on the present appeal are as to the right of the North and South Wales Bank to rank in priority to the claim for interest of the debenture stockholders of the railway company, or some of them, in respect of payments of past interest on debenture stock already paid by the bank at a time when the railway company had exhausted its borrowing powers. There are three classes of debenture stock, A, B, and C, all charged on the undertaking of the company, but ranking thus in order of priority—first A, second B, and third C. Under a judgment creditor's petition, presented in pursuance of the Railway Companies Act of 1867, a receiver has been appointed; and by the Act it is provided, section 4, that all moneys received by him after due provision for the working expenses of the railway and other proper outgoings of the undertaking are to be applied and distributed, under the direction of the court, in payment of the debts of the company, and otherwise according to the rights and priorities of the persons for the time being interested therein. Subject to the claim of the bank, the debenture stockholders are without question entitled according to their priorities, inter se, to be paid, in preference to all other claimants, the interest now due to them, and there is sufficient in the receiver's hands to satisfy the whole interest payable on stock of class A, and part, but only part, of that payable on stock of class B. The bank claim, first, to have priority in respect of all their advances which have been applied in payment of interest or debenture stock over all interest payable in respect of debenture stock; or, secondly, priority in respect of all advances applied in payment of interest on stock of class A over interest payable in respect of classes B and C; and similarly as between classes B and C for priority so far over interest on class C for advances applied in payment of interest on class B. The claim in each case is rested on a supposed subrogation and right to stand in the place of, and with the right to the securities and priorities of, the creditors paid off; and this is the only claim which I propose to deal with.

I do not think that any right of subrogation to the securities or priorities of creditors paid off out of moneys borrowed in excess of borrowing powers has ever been allowed or can be justified in principle. I will first deal with the authorities cited before us. I put aside the German Mining Co.'s case (2 W. R. 543, 4 De G. M. & G. 19) as being a decision only on the ordinary partnership rights of directors and shareholders in an unlimited company in the special circumstances arising, and found as facts by Knight Bruce, L.J., in that case. With regard to all the following cases it is no doubt the fact that expressions pointing to some sort of subrogation or other are used by the learned judges in delivering judgment; but it is necessary to examine closely what was actually decided in the different cases.

The first case is that of In re The Cork and Youghal Railway Co., 18 W. R. 26, L. R. 4 Ch. App. 748. There a claim was made for payment out of a surplus by holders by deposit of Lloyd's bonds of sale moneys arising from a sale of the company's undertaking under statutory authority. This surplus under the statute was to be applied thus: "The surplus shall be subject to all the rights, equities, priorities, claims, and demands, whether of preference or ordinary shareholders, bondholders, or others, to which the property would, in case this Act had not been passed, have been subject, and shall be applied accordingly." No question was dealt with, or, indeed, arose except as between the claimants and the shareholders. The order actually made ran as follows: "Declare that the receipt and expenditure by the directors of the company, in payment of any sums recoverable from the company of moneys advanced on or procured by means of the deposit of the alleged bonds (i.e., the Lloyd's bonds) was pro tanto an adoption by the company of the transactions; and, having regard to the representations contained in the alleged bonds, the moneys so expended constituted debts owing from the company." Then followed an inquiry which, shortened only for clearness, ran as follows: Whether the company had the benefit of any expenditure in payment of sums recoverable from the company of moneys advanced on or procured by the deposits of the alleged bonds, and whether any of the sums so expended still remained unpaid by the company. In this order there is nothing of the nature of subrogation to the rights of creditors, and, of course, no subrogation either to their securities or priorities if they had any. The primâ facie illegal Lloyd's bonds are held to be evidence of debts to the extent only to which the transaction amounted to a borrowing with one hand and expenditure in reduction of the liabilities of the company with the other, the company being pro tanto treated as not borrowing in excess of their powers, and, therefore, capable of adopting the transactions. This is, in substance, the explanation of the case given in the judgment of the Court of Appeal delivered by Lord Selborne in the case of The Blackburn Building Society v. Cunliffe, Brooks, & Co., 31 W. R. 98, 22 Ch. D. 61, at p. 71, to which reference will be made below.

That action was one for, amongst other matters, the recovery by the official liquidator of certain assets of the company—viz., deeds deposited with Cunliffe, Brooks, & Co., their bankers. The defence to this part of the action, with which alone the Court of Appeal was concerned, was that the defendants had a lien for moneys owing on their banking account. The Vice-Chancellor of the court of the County Palatine, from whom the appeal was brought, had disaffirmed the lien on the ground that the overdrafts on the banking account constituted an illegal borrowing by the society, which had no power to borrow. The Court of Appeal (22 Ch. D., p. 71) reversed this order and remitted the case to the Duchy court, with directions and declarations, of which the following is the most material: Declare that at the date of the petition to wind up the society, the appellants were entitled to hold the title-deeds and documents in the pleadings mentioned as a security for repayment of so much, and so much only, of the moneys advanced by them from time to time to the society as were applied in payment of the debts or liabilities of the society properly payable, and had not been subsequently repaid to the appellants, if at the time appointed anything which had been so applied remained due. This was in substance following the cases of In re The Cork and Youghal Railway Co. It gave effect to a part of the security given to the bank, but not by way of subrogation to the right of creditors paid off their securities or priorities. The grounds on which it is based were explained by the Lord Chancellor at p. 71 of the report. There was an appeal by the bankers from the order in this case to the House of Lords, but no cross-appeal, so that the equitable doctrine acted upon did not come into question: see 33 W. R. 309, 9 App. Cas. 857. Lord Blackburn did indeed guard himself against expressing any opinion on the question now being discussed.

There was a second action in The Blackburn Building Society's case, which was an action for a general account of all moneys received by the bank and the application thereof, as distinguished from the action for redemption already dealt with; and in that second action the question as to the allowance to be made to the bank took a wider form. The case in the Court of Appeal is reported 29 Ch. D. 902, 34 W. R. Dig. 25. One equity there allowed the bankers was to follow their money when they could show it to have been invested in, and get the benefit of, any securities which the society would not have had but for the investment of the money so followed. With this equity we have nothing to do. The other equity was that they were allowed the benefit of money applied in payment of withdrawing members who had been paid off by means of that money, and who would not have been paid but for it. This is no extension, but a mere application of the rule laid down in the first case, when once it was admitted, as it had to be, that these payments were liabilities which the society were bound to pay before paying anything to the continuing members. The withdrawing members had no priority as between themselves and other creditors, and no securities, but came in after all outside creditors as themselves—creditors or quasi-creditors: see Walton v. Edge, 33 W. R. 417, 10 App. Cas. 33. There could therefore be no subrogation in their case to any securities or priorities, and it became a matter of indifference whether the bankers were said to stand in their place, or whether, as I think is the better way of stating it, the discharge of the liabilities of the company to them validated the overdraft of the company on the bank in the banking account to the extent of the moneys so applied.

The remaining case, and, so far as I know, the only one material to be considered, is that of the Baroness Wenlock v. The River Dee Co. in its various stages. It was not reported in the Law Reports on the first hearing in the Court of Appeal, but the judgments are given in 36 Ch. D. 675n. The company was a going company. The action was one by the personal representative of Lord Wenlock to recover on a covenant money to a large amount lent by him to the company. Baron Huddlestone on the trial had given judgment for the plaintiff to an amount not less than £85,000. The Court of Appeal held that the company had no borrowing power beyond £25,000, but decided that the plaintiff had a right to recover up to the amount of that £25,000, and to the extent to which she could show that the moneys advanced had been expended in paying off debts and liabilities recoverable against the company; thus following the first Blackburn Building Society case. No doubt in the judgments of Lord Esher and Cotton, L.J., there are expressions which seem to found the equity that they were administering as depending upon a right to stand in the place, and as assignees of, the creditors paid off; but I do not think that they intended to differ from the grounds laid down in the first Blackburn Building Society's case. Bowen, L.J., in so many words, refers to and professes simply to follow that case. No question of securities or priorities of creditors paid off arose in that case, and in such circumstances it makes practically no difference whether the equity is described as a right of subrogation to creditors, or as it was described by Lord Selborne at 22 Ch. D., at p. 71. The case was taken on appeal to the House of Lords, but the only question there dealt with was the company's power to borrow, as to which the decision of the Court of Appeal was affirmed. Before the referee, to whom the inquiries directed by the Court of Appeal were referred, a question arose whether the creditors paid off must be creditors who were creditors at the time of the advances being made, or whether the payment of creditors whose debts became due after the advances made might not also fall within the scope of the inquiry. Again, no question arose as to securities held by or priorities of the creditors paid off. The Court of Appeal, both on the form of the inquiry already directed, and on principle, held that creditors fell within the scope of the inquiry, whether their debts became due at or after the time of the advances out of which they were paid. The case at this stage is reported at 19 Q. B. D. 155. The judgment of the court was delivered by Fry, L.J., and it is upon a passage in this judgment that the appellants place their chief reliance. That passage, see p. 165 of 19 Q. B. D., is as follows: [His lordship read the passage, and continued:] Now, the first observation on that part of the judgment is that it has nothing to do with any securities held by the creditor, nor, as I think, with his priority over other creditors. If it did refer to securities or priorities of the creditors it would be an obiter dictum only. If the equity extended to securities it would probably, in most cases, be impossible to give effect to it, as the creditor paid off, not knowing where the money to pay him off came from, would give up the securities and the company would deal with them in the ordinary course of business long before the quasi-lender could assert his rights. If it extended to priorities it would in many cases work injustice. It cannot be suggested that the quasi-lender gets any equity as against the creditor paid off, for the latter does not know where the money comes from; still less, if it were possible, can he have an equity against creditors who have no part in the transaction, to be ranked before them. I do not think that it would be fair to suppose that the Court of Appeal intended to lay down any new law or make a statement in any way at variance with the authority which they were following. The statement, it seems to me, ought to be confined to the equity so far, if at all, as it depends upon subrogation. Indeed, the judgment goes on to quote with approval the very passage from Lord Selborne's judgment at 22 Ch. D. 71, which I have already quoted, and to apply it in exactly the same way as Lord Selborne had done. If the equity, so far as it depends upon subrogation, is founded upon a fiction, and involves a closing of the eyes of the court to the true facts, so far as it is expounded by Lord Selborne, it depends upon the real facts and requires a complete examination of them.

I think that the great preponderance of authority shows that the doctrine of subrogation has very little, if anything at all, to do with the equity really enforced in the cases, and that there is, at any rate, no authority for any subrogation to the securities or priorities of the creditors paid off. Dealing with this case independently of the authorities, I see no reason why the parties to an illegal lending should have anything more than bare justice dealt out to them, and this they get if they are allowed, as they have hitherto been allowed, to have that portion of the advance actually expended in payment of debts of the company treated as a valid advance. If the advance had been within the borrowing powers of the company, the bank could have had no right to the securities or priorities of the creditors paid off. It seems to me that it would be unjust to other creditors that a fiction should be invented for the purposes of making an invalid loan more valuable than a valid one. I entirely agree with what Romer, J., has said about the unsatisfactory way in which such a doctrine as is contended for by the appellants would work in practice, and I do not consider it necessary here to repeat what he said.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The question in this case is a question as to what is the position of the North and South Wales Bank (Limited), which has advanced money to the Wrexham, Mold, and Connah's Quay Railway Co. for the purpose of, and which has been applied to, paying the half-yearly interest due to the holders of certain debenture stock. And the first question to be decided is the position of the bank in relation to the railway company, which, although it is now insolvent, and although a receiver has been appointed at the instance of the Great Central Railway Co., who are judgment creditors, is nevertheless an existing railway and a going concern. At the date when the bank supplied the money which was paid to the debenture stockholders no receiver had been appointed. The debenture stockholders are divided into three classes—series A, series B, and series C. Series A is entitled to be paid in priority to series B, and series B is entitled to be paid in priority to series C.

Generally speaking, if a company which has exhausted its borrowing powers purports to borrow further money, and thus obtains a supply of money, the contracted loan is void and ultra vires, and the lender has no right of action against the company. But nevertheless, in some cases, the person supplying the money is able to obtain recoupment from the funds of the company. And the question to be determined in this case may be stated generally to be, what is the principle upon which the person supplying the money is entitled to recoupment as against the company; and what is his relation in regard to priority to the various classes of creditors of the company? Now, there seem to me to be two principles upon which the right of recoupment may be enforced against the company which has exceeded its borrowing powers by the person supplying the money.

The one principle is that, although the borrowing power is exhausted, and the transaction which purported to be a loan to the company is as such ultra vires, and therefore null and void, so that the would-be lender can neither enforce repayment of the loan nor rely upon the securities which he has taken for the loan, yet if the company apply the money in their hands to the payment of debts actually owing by them, there is thereupon a new transaction between the company and the person who has paid the money for the purpose of the ultra vires loan. If the ultra vires loan is to be treated as an illegal prohibited transaction, as distinguished from a contract into which the company have no capacity to enter, there is no action at law or in equity by which lenders can recover back moneys which they have paid over in pursuance of the illegal contract. If on the other hand the ultra vires loan is to be treated merely as something ultra vires and not as an illegal transaction, there is no reason why the lenders should not recover the money thus paid from the company as money received to the use of the lenders by reason of the failure of consideration arising out of the incapacity of the company to borrow, provided always that the dealing by the company with the money has not been such as to show that, nothwithstanding the form of action adopted, the money has really been so dealt with by the company as that in the interval between the lending of the money and the bringing of the action the company has increased its borrowing obligations beyond its borrowing powers. In order to make more clear this statement of what I conceive the position of the company to be in a case where the loan can properly be treated as an ultra vires as distinguished from an illegal loan, I will put a hypothetical concrete case. Suppose a company purport to borrow a sum of money in excess of their borrowing powers, and before they have in any way made use of the money an action is brought to recover it as on failure of consideration for which it was paid, the money would be recoverable; or, again, suppose the company has applied the money in the payment of pre-existing debts, the money would be recoverable; because in each of these cases there has been no real excess of the powers of the company, and the form of action is not made a cloak to cover a transaction which is really ultra vires. It is like the case of money in the hands of a stakeholder before it has been dealt with in accordance with the result of the wager. But if the company, instead of either refraining from adopting the loan or applying it in such a manner as that their total indebtedness shall remain unchanged, apply it, say, to the purchase of new property, the company cannot, after so doing, be sued in any form for a return of the money since the money has been dealt with under the contract of loan, and to allow the company to repay it would simply be to allow the company to carry through an ultra vires transaction. I do not know that the distinction between an illegal and an ultra vires contract really makes much difference in the present case; for, in my judgment, on the facts there never was a moment of time during which the loan was illegal or ultra vires, because the loan took the form of a request by the company to the bank to pay the interest—i.e., the debt to the holders of the debenture stock warrants and a payment by the bank direct to the holders. But in considering the decisions which base the right of the lenders to recoupment upon some new contract between the company and the lenders for the application of money paid as and for a performance of the ultra vires contract, it is desirable to consider how far the money so paid continues in the hands of the company to be the money of the lenders, and how far the court is justified in implying a new bargain for the application of the money which has thus been dealt with by the order of the company; and if the court is justified in so doing, whether this involves the assumption of an assignment to the bank by the debenture stockholders of their rights in respect of which they have received payment from the bank.

The other principle upon which the right of recoupment has been allowed to be enforced against a company in a case where the borrrowed money has been applied in payment of debts of the company is to subrogate the lender to the rights of the creditor of the company who has been paid off, and to treat the lender of the money as the assignee of the debt which has been paid off.

I propose now to go through the authorities and see what are the principles in each case upon which the rights of the lenders to recoupment have been enforced against the company. The first case, The German Mining Co's case, seems really only to decide that an ordinary company is liable to pay the debts contracted by the manager. The second case, In re The Cork and Youghal Railway Co., was a case in which the Cork and Youghal Railway Co., after it had exhausted its borrowing powers, issued to one Lewis, Lloyd's bonds to enable Lewis to raise money for the purposes of the company. Lord Hatherley, when that case came up on appeal from Malins, V.C., in his judgment pointed out that the judgments of Crompton and Blackburn, JJ., in Chambers v. The Manchester and Milford Railway Co., 12 W. R. 980, 5 B. & S. 588, made it clear that where a company is authorized only to raise a given amount of capital by shares and a certain other sum by debentures or mortgages, then the company cannot issue any debenture or loan note or any security of that description for the mere purpose of raising money, and that such instrument would be just as void in equity as at law, being contrary altogether to and absolutely forbidden by the statute (7 & 8 Vict. c. 85). Accordingly, the Lloyd's bonds in that case not being issued in respect of debts actually due, but simply issued for the purpose of raising money were held to be null and void and instruments to which no legal validity could be attributed. The inference which I draw from the judgment of Lord Hatherley is that he thought that the borrowing of money by the company for the purpose of paying off debts of the company was not, in a case where the money was so applied an ultra vires borrowing at all, and I do not quite understand why Mr. Lewis who lent the money should not have sued at law for the money so lent, in so far as the money was lent for the payment of the legitimate debts of the company and so applied. In the actual case before the court it was not Mr. Lewis who was seeking to recover the money advanced, but the persons from whom Mr. Lewis had raised the money which was thus applied. And it may be that it was the absence of privity between these persons and the company which made Lord Hatherley think it necessary to say that these persons were entitled to obtain repayment from the company of the moneys so advanced by virtue of their standing in the shoes of the creditors whose debts were paid off. But undoubtedly he does base their right on this consideration. I observe that Giffard, L.J., in his judgment (p. 762) speaks of the bondholders as the assignees of Mr. Lewis, and not as the assignees of the creditors of the company whose debts had been paid off, and it seems to me that this is a more correct way of stating the position. But in the present case the bank are in the position of Mr. Lewis, and I cannot understand why there is any need to invent any fiction whatever to give the bank the right of action, or any necessity to vest in the bank the rights of the creditors who have been paid off. If, however, there is any necessity, these judgments seem authority for the proposition.

The next case to be considered is the Blackburn Building Society v. Cunliffe, Brooks, & Co. in the Court of Appeal. In that case the building society had overdrawn their account to a large amount, and by a memorandum of agreement had purported to give their bankers security for the balance from time to time due on certain deeds deposited with them. That overdrawing of the bankers' account was ultra vires, and it was held that the bankers had no lien under the agreement on the deeds deposited, but that they were entitled to use the deeds for such part of the money advanced by them as had been applied in payment of the debts and liabilites of the society properly payable. Lord Selborne, after pointing out that the transaction was ultra vires, and that the bankers had no lien on the deeds under the agreement, says at p. 70 of 22 Ch. D.: [His lordship read the passage from Lord Selborne's judgment dealing with an equitable principle, and continued:] Now, it does not seem to me that the equity relied on by Lord Selborne involves in any way an assumption that the debts of the creditors of the company who have been paid off are to be treated as assigned to the lenders who provided the money; for, although he states it to be the equity established by The Cork and Youghal Railway Co.'s case, this does not involve the assumption of an assignment, for he seems to treat that part of the judgment of Lord Hatherley and Giffard, L.J., as not being essential to the judgment. It is right, however, to point out that Lord Blackburn in the House of Lords in dealing with an appeal which did not go to the main question itself, seemed to regard the position of those who pay off the creditors as being that of standing in the shoes of the creditors paid off.

The next case is Baroness Wenlock v. The River Dee Co. In that case there can be no doubt that the Court of Appeal did treat the right of the lender of money borrowed by the company ultra vires, to recoupment, as being based upon subrogation to the rights of the creditor paid out of such money, and also held that the right to recover from the company the amount of their debts or liabilities so paid off is not confined to the amount of debts and liabilities existing at the time of the advance, but extends to debts and liabilities accruing subsequently to and paid out of such advance. Fry, L.J. thus states at p. 165 of 19 Q. B. D. the equity upon which the right of the lenders is based: [His lordship read the same passage as Rigby, L.J., had read, and continued:] It is to be observed that Fry, L.J. does not purport to be going beyond the judgment in The Blackburn Building Society v. Cunliffe, Brooks & Co. It seems to me that there is no trace in that judgment of the benevolent equity spoken of by Fry, L.J. There is some trace perhaps of the assumption of an assignment, but it does not seem to me that either in this case or in that of In re The Cork and Youghal Railway Co. the assumption of an assignment of the debts of the creditors paid off is in any way essential to the equity on which the judgment is based. No case is to be found in which the lenders have ever in fact succeeded in enforcing the securities of the paid off creditors.

I have thus dealt with the authorities at length in order to arrive at the principles upon which the courts have gone in cases of this character; but I do not think that all the difficulties which the courts had to deal with in these other cases arise in the present case, for in the present case the bank simply lent money for the payment of a half-year's interest due to the debenture stockholders, and paid the money direct to those stockholders. I do not believe that this transaction was ultra vires at all, and if so I cannot understand why an action for money paid should not successfully be brought by the bank. The money never was in the hands of the railway company. There was no interval of time after the money was lent during which it was uncertain how the money would be applied; and this being so I see no need for the invention of any fiction whatever. I very much doubt whether at law or in equity a man who pays off a debt at the request of another is necessarily to be treated as the assignee of that debt, but a very little evidence will be sufficient to establish that as between himself and the person at whose request he has paid off the debt it was intended that he should be treated as the transferee of the securities, if such there be, in the hands of the creditor. In the present case, however, there are no such securities. The discharged interest certificate is not such a security, and I do not see what right the company and the person who supplies the money to pay off the creditor, have to say that the debt which has been paid off shall be treated as if it had not been paid off. There has been no assignment in fact by the creditor, and I do not see that the justice of the case in any way requires that the court should assume, contrary to the fact, that there has been such assignment. My judgment, so far, assumes that in the circumstances of this case there has been no borrowing in excess of the powers of the company, and that no occasion arises for the application of any equitable principle to do justice between the bank and the company.

But if my conclusion as to this is wrong and the directors did assume to do an act ultra vires of the company in getting the bank to pay these interest warrants, equity will treat the illegal or ultra vires transaction entered into by the directors, under which the company has received the money, as being an intra vires transaction to the extent to which the borrowing of which the company have had the benefit could have been effected as an intra vires transaction at the moment of the making of the payment of which the company have had the benefit; and this whether the original contract purported to be made was merely ultra vires or illegal. The principle is not unlike that adopted at law, where money paid for the purpose of an illegal transaction is held to be recoverable, so long as the contract is executory or in fieri. This equity as defined in the earlier cases cited seems to involve no assumption of assignment or subrogation as Fry, L.J., seems to have assumed in Baroness Wenlock v. The River Dee Co. I should shrink myself from saying that the state of things assumed in equity for the purpose of doing justice between the parties must not be carried to its logical results. If equity requires you to assume a contract where none has been executed, it seems to me that equity as well as law must govern the relations between the parties to the assumed contract on the basis that there was a contract in fact. Nor do I see that pushing the equity to its logical conclusion would do any injustice to innocent persons. It makes no difference to the other creditor whether the creditor having priority is the warrant holder or the bank.

Appeal dismissed.

WALLER v. ATKINSON. (a.)

Married woman—Will—Assent of husband—Husband proving will—Practice of Probate Division.

Where a married woman, who had no power of disposition by will except with the assent of her husband, bequeathed all her property to her husband, subject to the payment of a legacy of £10,000, and appointed him sole executor,

Held, that, as probate of a married woman's will is now granted only in general terms, the husband did not by merely proving the will thereby assent to the dispositions it contained.

Held, also, on the construction of the will, that, whether or not the husband had assented, it did not dispose of the property, which would have gone to the husband if the testatrix had not made a will.

Decision of Stirling, J. (46 W. R. 439), affirmed.

Appeal against a decision of Stirling, J. (46 W. R. 439).

By her will dated the 6th of May, 1880, Amelia Atkinson gave all the personal estate of which by virtue of any power or authority, or of any separate right of property, or otherwise howsoever, she was competent to dispose, including her portion or fortune and other interest (if any) under the will of her late father, James Shaw Taylor, unto her husband, Joseph Beaumont Atkinson, for his own absolute use and benefit, subject nevertheless to the payment thereout of the pecuniary legacy thereinafter bequeathed by that her will, and also of any legacies bequeathed by her by any codicil to that her will, together with the expenses (but not including legacy duty) incident to the discharge of such legacies. The testatrix further bequeathed to Lavina Waller the sum of £10,000 in manner therein mentioned; but, if the said Lavina Waller should die in the testatrix's lifetime, she gave the same legacy or sum of £10,000 to such person or persons as at the time of the testatrix's death would have been Lavina Waller's next-of-kin, and entitled to her personal estate under the statutes for the distribution of the personal estate of intestates, if she had died immediately after the death of the testatrix. The testatrix appointed her husband the sole executor of her will.

Mrs. Atkinson died in February, 1892, and her husband proved her will in general form in May of the same year. Her property other than that which she took from her father was of very small amount.

At the time of Mrs. Atkinson's death, proceedings with reference to the estate of her father, J. S. Taylor, were pending in the State of New York. J. S. Taylor was an Englishman, but had considerable property in the United States. One of his executors was resident in New York, and had instituted a suit there for the purpose of having the estate within the control of the New York court administered by that court. To that litigation the next-of-kin of Lavina Waller (who had died in the lifetime of the testatrix) and Mr. Atkinson were parties. It was decided that Mrs. Atkinson had no power of disposition over the property which she took from J. S. Taylor, and could not dispose of it by will without the assent of her husband. The next of kin of Lavina Waller then took out before Stirling, J., an originating summons against Mr. Atkinson, asking for payment to the plaintiffs of the legacy of £10,000 bequeathed by the will of Mrs. Atkinson. The question before Stirling, J., was, had Mr. Atkinson assented to the disposition contained in the will so as to bind himself? Stirling, J., decided that he had not so assented, and the next-of-kin of Lavina Waller appealed. In the Court of Appeal, at the request of the appellants, further evidence of assent by Mr. Atkinson was admitted; and the question whether on the true construction of Mrs. Atkinson's will it disposed of property which, in the absence of disposition, would have gone to Mr. Atkinson, was raised for the first time on the argument of the appeal.

Butcher, Q.C., and T. T. Methold, for the appeal referred (in addition to the authorities cited below), to Selwood v. Mildmay, 3 Ves. jun. 306 (commented on in Miller v. Travers, 8 Bing. 244, at pp. 252-3).

Jenkins, Q.C., and Stewart Smith, for the defendant, were stopped.

LINDLEY, M.R.—I do not think that when this case is thrashed out, as it has now been, there is really any difficulty in coming to a decision upon it. The practical question is whether the plaintiffs are entitled, under this will and in the events which have happened, to the legacy of £10,000. That is the real question. They place their title upon the provisions of the will of Mrs. Atkinson, and upon the assent of her husband at her death to the bequest which she had made. Mrs. Atkinson, the testatrix, was married about 1868, and during her coverture she made a will. In my view that will was in the ordinary form of a will made by a married woman.

A married woman in those days could not make a valid will of property, unless it was settled to her separate use, without the assent of her husband. The effect of that assent is discussed by Lord Selborne, L.C., in Noble v. Willock, 21 W. R. 711, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 778, at p. 789, where the Court of Appeal and then the House of Lords, had to consider the effect of the Wills Act upon dispositions by married women. Lord Selborne says: "What is the doctrine of law as to the husband's assent? As I understand all the authorities and all the cases, it means neither more nor less than this, that as to all the property of the wife of which the husband is purchaser, which, if reduced into possession during the marriage, becomes by law his, and which, if it remains not reduced into possession when the marriage is dissolved by the wife's death becomes also by law his (subject indeed to the necessity of taking out administration to the wife); as to all this property, vested in him in his marital right, he may, if he pleases, waive his right, and so waive it as to give effect to a will made by his wife during the coverture in derogation of his marital right." As I understand the authorities, the husband is at liberty during the life of his wife to give her leave, or to license her to make a will, and may nevertheless revoke that licence; but if after her death he has really assented to the will he cannot revoke that assent. Before Stirling, J., this case was argued on the assent of the husband, and on the ground that he had proved the will, and that that amounted to an assent to the dispositions it contained. Under the old law I suppose that would have been an assent to the will. It would not, of course, have affected the construction of it, but it would have been an assent to it. The question on the construction of this will does not appear to have been brought before Stirling, J.; and the learned judge decided—in my opinion quite rightly decided, having regard to the alteration of the law as to proving of wills by husbands—that the mere fact of the husband proving the will does not amount to an assent to it. Formerly, proving the will did amount to an assent, because there were two steps in the probate, one as to what the wife could dispose of, and had disposed of by will, and the other as to the rest of her property. Now, there is only one step, and if the husband proves at all he must prove in the general form. That being the case, the inference which would at one time have been drawn from the fact of the husband proving can no longer be drawn; and so far as Stirling, J.'s, judgment was concerned that concluded the matter.

But in this court the case has been argued on further materials. We have admitted a very important letter of October, 1893, which, taken in connection with the other evidence to which our attention was called by Mr. Butcher, raises a strong inference that the husband did assent. I do not decide that he did, because we have not heard Mr. Jenkins, or have not given him an opportunity of explaining that letter. In my view, it is unnecessary to explain it. As the case now stands, I think I should incline to the view that the husband did assent; but, apart from the fact of obtaining probate, the evidence of assent before Stirling, J., was quite insufficient. On the evidence which is now before us I should incline to the view that the husband assented to the will of his wife. But what is that will? It is the will of a married woman giving property to her husband subject to the payment of a legacy of £10,000. The question which you have to consider in regard to that will, before you begin to talk about assent, is this: Is there anything in it which, if it is fairly construed, leads you to take the view that the testatrix was disposing of that property which her husband would take if there was no disposition by her? I cannot find any such thing at all in this will. I do not think she was in fact making a will of the property which would pass to her husband without her assistance. What she says is, I give all the property which I am competent to dispose of, including my portion or fortune and other interest (if any) under the will of my late father, to my husband, subject nevertheless to the payment of (in substance) the legacy of £10,000. Let us look at the language fairly—not hypercritically, for I never like that way of construing documents—and ask ourselves this question: Can we fairly come to the conclusion that the testatrix was dreaming at all of disposing of the property which would pass to her husband if she did not make a will? It seems to me plain that throughout she assumed that the property she was dealing with would not go to her husband if she made no will, but that it was property which she could somehow dispose of. It appears to me that it would be forcing her language, and putting quite an unfair construction upon it, to hold that it amounts to a disposition by her to her husband of property which he could claim if she did not make any disposition of it at all. That view of the meaning of her will is absolutely conclusive of this case. Whatever the husband may have assented to, it could be nothing which would affect the right he now asserts. He certainly cannot have assented to more than she has done. I cannot help thinking that his assent was given upon the supposition that the wife had, under the powers conferred on her by her father's will, made a valid disposition; and, if so, it was of course given upon an entire misapprehension, and it would be a piece of sharp practice if the next-of-kin of Lavina Waller were to take advantage of that. I think that on the true construction of this will the plaintiffs are not entitled to payment of the sum of £10,000 which they claim, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I agree in all respects with the Master of the Rolls.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

HASLUCK v. CLARK. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Administration—Insolvent estate—Execution creditor—Completion of execution—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 45, 125.

Section 45 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which disentitles an execution creditor to retain the benefit of his execution against the trustee in bankruptcy of the debtor unless he completes the execution before the date of the receiving order, is not applicable to an administration of the estate of a deceased debtor under section 125.

Appeal from the judgment of Wright, J., on the trial of an interpleader issue, reported [1898] 2 Q. B. 28.

On the 29th of September, 1897, a judgment was obtained by Isabella Clark against Joseph Metz for £4,488 18s. 3d. On the 18th of October Metz died. On the 22nd of October the goods of the deceased judgment debtor were seized in execution under a writ of fi. fa., but they were not sold. On the 3rd of November letters of administration were granted to the judgment debtor's widow. On the 19th of November an order was made, with the concurrence of the widow, for the administration of the estate of the deceased debtor under section 125 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The sheriff, having received notice of this, interpleaded, and an order was made for the trial of an interpleader issue, in which the official receiver was to be the plaintiff, and the execution creditor defendant, to determine the question whether at the time of the seizure the goods seized were the property of the official receiver, as the trustee of the estate of the deceased, as against the execution creditor. Subsequently Hasluck was appointed trustee in the place of the official receiver, and was substituted for him as plaintiff in the issue.

Wright, J., held that the goods were not the property of the trustee as against the execution creditor, and gave judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiff appealed.

The arguments on the appeal were heard before the Earl of Halsbury, L.C., A. L. Smith, L.J., and the late Chitty, L.J.

Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie, for the plaintiff.

A. T. Lawrence, Q.C., and T. W. Chitty, for the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

March 17.—A. L. SMITH, L.J., read the following judgment: This is an interpleader issue, and the material facts are these. [His Lordship stated the facts, above set out, and continued]. The question is. Do the goods seized and held by the sheriff vest, under the administration order of the 19th of November, 1897, in the trustee Hasluck freed and discharged from the execution, so that the execution creditor is thus deprived of her right to the proceeds of the goods so seized and held by the sheriff in execution upon her judgment? Apart from the bankruptcy of an execution debtor intervening between seizure and sale of goods by a sheriff, and apart from the question raised in this case, the answer would clearly be No.

By the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 26, which re-enacts a provision in the Statute of Frauds, it is enacted that a writ of fi. fa. shall bind the property in the goods of the execution debtor as from the time when the writ is delivered to the sheriff to be executed. By section 125, sub-sections 1 and 2, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the true construction of which has now to be decided, it is enacted that a petition, in certain events which exist here, may be presented praying for an order for the administration of the estate of a deceased debtor according to the law of bankruptcy, and that an order for the administration in bankruptcy of the deceased debtor's estate may be thus obtained. Now, upon such an order being obtained, what is to happen as to the property of the deceased debtor? Sub-section 5 deals with this, and enacts that upon an order being made for the administration of a deceased debtor's estate the property of the debtor shall vest in the official receiver, and he shall forthwith proceed to realize and distribute the same in accordance with the provisions of the Act. What does this mean? Does it mean that the property of the deceased debtor, bound as it is by the execution levied thereon, shall vest in the official receiver, or that the property of the debtor, unbound by the execution, is to vest in him? In this sub-section 5 of section 125, which is the vesting section, I cannot find words which show that the property of the debtor, unbound by the execution, is to vest in the official receiver. It is the property of the debtor,—which may be either bound or unbound by an execution when the order for an administration is obtained,—which is to vest and which is to be administered under the administration order. If it is bound it vests subject to the fetter; if it is unbound it passes as it is. Then comes sub-section 6 of section 125. It enacts that, "with the modifications hereinafter mentioned" (these will be found in sub-section 7 and post, and do not affect this case), "all the provisions of Part III. of this Act relating to the administration of the property of a bankrupt shall, so far as the same are applicable, apply to the case of an administration order under this section in like manner as to an order of adjudication under this Act." This, I think, means, as Fry, L.J., has pointed out in In re Gould, 35 W. R. 569, 19 Q. B. D. 92, that the section applies to the mode of administration and not to the subject-matter to be administered.

I have already dealt with what is the property of the deceased debtor which vests in the official receiver or, as in this case, in the trustee, and which is to be administered. Part III. embraces sections 37 to 65 inclusive, amongst which is section 45. This section enacts that "where a creditor has issued execution against the goods . . . of a debtor . . . he"—that is, the creditor—"shall not be entitled to retain the benefit of the execution . . . against the trustee in bankruptcy of the debtor unless he has completed the execution . . ."—that is, by seizure and sale—"before the date of the receiving order and before notice of the presentation of any bankruptcy petition . . . against the debtor or of the commission of any available act of bankruptcy by the debtor."

It is argued that an order for the administration of the estate of a deceased debtor under section 125, if not a receiving order, a bankruptcy petition, or an act of bankruptcy within the meaning of those terms, is equivalent thereto. If the Legislature had intended that this should be so, I should certainly have expected to have found it enacted that an administration order was to have the same effect as, or be equivalent to, a receiving order, a bankruptcy petition, or an act of bankruptcy; but no such words are to be found. I do find, however, in the Act what effect an administration order is to have, for by sub-section 9 of section 125 it is expressly enacted that notice to the legal personal representative of a deceased debtor of the presentation by a creditor of a petition for an order for administration, in the event of such order being obtained, shall be deemed to be equivalent to notice of an act of bankruptcy, so that after such notice no payment or transfer of property shall operate as a discharge to such personal representative. Nowhere in the Act is it enacted that notice of a petition for administration shall be equivalent to notice of an act of bankruptcy to an outside execution creditor, so as to take away the right he possessed to have the goods in the hands of the sheriff sold and applied to the payment of the judgment debt. I would also point out that in sub-section 13 of section 18 of the Act of 1883, where the Legislature, as regards Part III., intended that particular words should have particular meanings, it specifically enacts that they shall have such meanings. No reference is made therein to the case in hand.

If the contention of the trustee be correct, a different asset would have to be administered when an administration of an insolvent debtor's estate takes place in the Chancery Division and when an administration of such an estate takes place in the Court of Bankruptcy, for in the one the estate bound by the execution would be what was to be administered, and in the other the estate freed from the execution would be the available asset. It is not disputed that if the estate of the deceased insolvent debtor were being administered in the Chancery Division the estate bound by the execution would be what was to be administered, and it has been held by the court, in the case of In re Withernsea Brickworks, 29 W. R. 178, 16 Ch. D. 337, that under section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, which imported some of the bankruptcy rules in the winding up of companies, the rule as to execution being avoided where the goods had been seized but not sold was not imported into the winding-up proceedings.

As before stated, if the appellant's contention be correct the estate which would have to be administered would depend upon which tribunal happened to have the administration, and I cannot think that this is correct.

Moreover, it has been held by Cave, J., in the case of In re Gould, 19 Q. B. D. 92, at p. 93, that section 47 of Part III. of the Act of 1883, which deals with the avoidance of voluntary settlements, was not applicable to section 125, and he gives fully his reasons for so holding. I do not repeat them, for they will be found in the report of his judgment. He also said, though this was obiter, that section 45 did not apply. Upon appeal (ibid, p. 98) his decision as to section 47 was upheld in this court, and Lord Esher stated that he agreed with every reason given by Cave, J. The groundwork of the decision of the Court of Appeal, which will be seen especially from Fry, L J.'s, judgment, was that section 125 dealt with the mode of administration and not with the subject-matter to be administered, and that it dealt with the deceased debtor's estate and nothing else.

Although in In re Gould it was the property of third persons—namely, the trustees of the settlement, which was attempted to be dealt with under section 125, yet the reasoning to be found in that judgment appears to me to apply to this case—namely, that rights of third parties are not to be affected unless the intention is expressed in plain terms; and surely this cannot be found in section 125.

Mr. Chitty for the execution creditor pointed out that, with the judgments in In re Withernsea Brickworks, and those of Cave, J., and the Court of Appeal in 1887 in In re Gould standing unimpeached, the Legislature in the year 1890 passed sub-sections 1 and 2 of section 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, wherein it expressly dealt with the duties of sheriffs as regards goods taken in execution both before and after sale, and that there is in these sections no indication that the Legislature desired to alter what had been said and held in the prior cases, for it again dealt with the effect of receiving orders and petitions in bankruptcy and with them alone, and not with the effect of orders of administration under section 125.

In my judgment, if an order for administration under section 125 is to be the equivalent of a receiving order or a petition in bankruptcy or an act of bankruptcy, it is for the Legislature and not for a court of law to say so.

I am aware that there are dicta of Vaughan Williams, L.J.—then Vaughan Williams, J.—in Watkins v. Barnard, 46 W. R. 156, [1897] 2 Q. B. 521, which indicate his dissent from what Cave, J., has said and held—affirmed as it was in this court in the case of In re Gould—and he pointed out what he should do when occasion arose, though he decided that in the circumstances of the case before him neither section 45 of the Act of 1880 nor section 11 of the Act of 1890 were applicable to section 125 of the Act of 1883. For the reasons above I think the judgment of Wright, J., should be affirmed, and this appeal dismissed with costs.

A. L. SMITH, L.J., then, by consent of counsel, read the following judgment of the late CHITTY, L.J.: I am of the same opinion. The question is whether the order for the administration of the deceased debtor's estate under the 125th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, has taken away the right which, apart from that section, the execution creditor possessed to have the goods in the hands of the sheriff sold and applied in payment of the judgment debt It is not a question whether the property in the goods passed to the trustee under the administration order, but a question whether they passed free from the right of the execution creditor.

The state of the law prior to the passing of the Act of 1883 was this. Before the Judicature Act, 1875, the personal estate of a deceased debtor which fell to be administered under an administration decree was the estate which vested in the legal personal representative of the deceased. All subsisting liens, charges, and rights, whether legal or equitable, remained undisturbed. Then came the Judicature Act, 1875, which by the 10th section imported certain bankruptcy rules into the administration of the estates of deceased insolvent debtors and the winding up of insolvent companies. The section was ill-framed, and there was much difference of judicial opinion as to its true effect. Ultimately it was decided that the section did not enlarge the estate of the deceased insolvent debtor, or of the insolvent company in the winding up. It will suffice to refer to two authorities, both decided before 1883. In In re Withernsea Brickworks (decided in 1880) the question was whether the then existing bankruptcy rule avoiding an execution, where the goods had been seized but not sold, was imported into the winding up of an insolvent company, and it was held by the Court of Appeal that it was not. In In re D'Epineuil, 30 W. R. 423, 20 Ch. D. 217 (decided in 1882), the question was whether the rule avoiding an unregistered bill of sale in bankruptcy was imported into the administration of the estate of a deceased insolvent debtor, and it was held that it was not. Such, then, was the known state of the law when the 125th section of the Act of 1883 was passed.

The question turns on the true construction of the 125th section. The appellant relies on the 6th sub-section. It is very loosely worded. Instead of pointing out, as might have readily been done, what provisions of Part III. are to be applied, it leaves it to the court to discover which of the provisions are applicable. The precise question is whether section 45, which occurs in Part III., is applicable. Now, apart from the 6th sub-section, I think it is clear that the subject-matter dealt with by the 125th section is the estate of the deceased debtor in the sense in which that term is invariably used—namely, the property to which he was entitled at the time of his death so far as it has not been lawfully dealt with since his death, before the order for administration is made, and subject to all liens, charges, and rights subsisting in other persons. The 1st, 2nd, 4th, 5th, and 8th sub-sections all speak of the deceased debtor's estate as that which is to be administered under the order for administration. The term "property of the debtor" also occurs in the 5th, 6th, and 7th sub-sections; but, in my opinion, that term is obviously employed in the same sense as estate. The provision for vesting is contained in the 5th sub-section. It enacts that, upon an order being made for the administration of a deceased debtor's estate, the property of the deceased debtor shall vest in the official receiver of the court as trustee thereof. The effect of this enactment on the personal estate of the debtor is to divest out of the legal personal representative the personalty vested in him at the time of the order and to vest the same in the official receiver. In support of this view I refer to the 3rd sub-section, which prohibits the making of an administration order until the expiration of two months from the grant of probate or letters of administration except with the concurrence of the legal personal representative, or unless the debtor committed an act of bankruptcy within three months prior to his decease. This sub-section has been in part repealed by section 21, sub-section 1, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, which in effect strikes out the period of two months. But the enactment as it stood, by postponing the jurisdiction to make the administration order for two months after probate or letters of administration, a period which might not expire until many months or even years after the debtor's decease, affords a strong reason against the incorporation of the 45th section. In ordinary course an execution would be completed long before the expiration of two months. Reverting to the vesting sub-section, I think that the ordinary rules of construction would not justify us in holding that it passed the goods seized freed from the rights of the execution creditor. What the trustee is by that sub-section directed to realize and distribute is the property of the deceased debtor, and nothing more. Then I come to the 6th sub-section itself. I think that the words "relating to the administration of the property of a bankrupt" mean what they say—that is, the property of the bankrupt, and not the property of third persons which is by express provisions swept into the fund distributable under a bankruptcy for the benefit of the creditors. Further, I think that the objections to holding that the provisions of the 45th section are applicable to an administration order under section 125 are insuperable. To hold that they are is to import into the 125th section words which are not there. I look in vain for any words which show that the administration order or any of the proceedings thereunder are, or are to be deemed to be, an equivalent for a receiving order, or for a bankruptcy petition, or an act of bankruptcy of the deceased. I concur entirely in the observations which A. L. Smith, L.J., has made on these points.

On the construction of the 125th section I think that the provisions of the 45th section are not imported into the 125th section, and that they are not applicable. To take away a right such as that of the execution creditor, plain words manifesting the intention of the Legislature are required, and I am unable to find them.

The contrast between the language of the 125th section and of the 18th section, sub-section 13, the authority of In re Gould, the dicta in Watkins v. Barnard, and the bearing of the 11th section, sub-sections 1 and 2, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, have already been dealt with so fully that I cannot usefully add anything on those points, save this: By the 21st section of the Act of 1890 the Legislature dealt expressly with the 125th section, and made certain amendments therein, but left In re Gould and the principle of that authority untouched. It also enacted by section 3, sub-sections 16 and 17 (I state the enactment shortly), that if under a composition a trustee is appointed, section 27 and Part V. of the principal Act should apply as if the trustee were a trustee in bankruptcy, and as if the terms "bankruptcy," "bankrupt," and "order of adjudication" included respectively a composition, a compounding debtor, and an order approving the composition, and that Part III. of the Act of 1883 should, so far as the nature of the case and the terms of the composition admit, apply thereto, the same interpretation being given to the words "trustee," "bankrupt," and "order of adjudication," as above stated: yet no corresponding amendment was made in the 125th section.

It is plain that if the order for administration had been made in the Chancery Division the rights of the execution creditor would have remained unaffected. It would be a strange result if her rights depended on the court in which the administration takes place. The 4th sub-section of section 125 barred the right to present a petition under that section where proceedings in any court of justice for the administration of the deceased debtor's estate had already been commenced, but conferred on that court a discretionary jurisdiction to order a transfer of the proceedings to bankruptcy where the estate is insolvent. No jurisdiction was given to the court exercising jurisdiction in bankruptcy to order the transfer. This seems to show that the Legislature considered it immaterial in which court the administration took place, and that the rights of persons interested would be dealt with on the same footing whichever tribunal controlled the administration. These observations are adverse to the appellant.

For these reasons I agree that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

The Earl of HALSBURY, L.C., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

A policy of insurance on a jeweller's stock-in-trade recited that the assured was desirous of effecting an insurance against "loss or damage by burglary and housebreaking as hereinafter defined." and in its operative part it insured him against loss of the property therein described "by theft following upon actual forcible and violent entry upon the premises wherein the same is herein stated to be situate." In the proposal for the insurance the assured stated that the premises were a shop, warehouse, and dwelling, and that they were protected by wood shutters and iron bars, and iron plates inside. The policy contained a condition that the assured should take all due precautions for the safety of the property insured as if the same were not insured as regards, inter alia, securing all doors, windows, and other means of entrance. During the temporary absence of the porter, who was taking down the shop shutters in the morning, the front door being shut, but neither locked nor bolted, a thief opened the door by turning the handle and entered the shop, and, having forcibly wrenched an iron plate and padlock off an inner door of the shop-front, stole therefrom part of the insured jewellery.

Held, that the loss was not covered by the policy.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Wills and Kennedy, JJ.) on a special case stated by an arbitrator: reported 46 W. R. 557, [1898] 2 Q. B. 136.

On the 24th of December, 1891, the respondent, A. A. George, who carried on business as a jeweller and pawnbroker at 78, Strand, effected a policy of insurance on his stock-in-trade with the appellants, the Goldsmiths and General Burglary Insurance Association (Limited). The policy recited that the assured was desirous of effecting an insurance "against loss or damage by burglary and housebreaking as hereinafter defined," and in its operative part it insured him against loss of the property therein described "by theft following upon actual forcible and violent entry upon the premises wherein the same is herein stated to be situate." Certain conditions were indorsed on the policy, the second of which was as follows: "It is a condition of this policy that the assured shall take all due precautions for the safety of the property insured as if the same were not insured, as regards selection and supervision of employés, securing all doors, windows, and other means of entrance or otherwise." The proposal for the insurance signed by the respondent, which was agreed to be the basis of the contract, contained answers to certain questions. The answer to a question as to the nature of the premises was "shop, warehouse, and dwelling." The answer to the question, "How are the premises protected on basement, ground floor, and roof lights?" was "Wood shutters and iron bars, and iron plates inside."

On the morning of the 12th of March, 1897, the policy being still in force, in the temporary absence of the porter in charge of the premises, who was engaged in removing the shutters of the shop to the rear of the premises, the front door being shut, but neither locked nor bolted, a thief opened the door by turning the handle and entered the shop, and, having forcibly wrenched an iron plate and padlock off an inner door of the shop-front, stole therefrom part of the insured jewellery.

The respondent having claimed under the policy to recover from the appellants the value of the jewellery so stolen, the matter was referred to arbitration, and the arbitrator made his award in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court. The Divisional Court gave judgment in favour of the respondent.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 24.—Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—This is an appeal from a judgment of a Divisional Court, by which it was determined that the respondent was entitled to recover from the appellants a sum of money, being the amount of a loss within the terms of a policy effected by him with them. The respondent carried on business as a jeweller and pawnbroker in premises at 78, Strand. The entrance to that part of the premises which was devoted to the jewellery business was by means of a door leading straight from the Strand, the entrance to the pawnshop was in a side street, and was towards the back of the premises. The policy was effected on the 24th of December, 1891, and on the 12th of March, 1897, soon after 8.30 in the morning, a thief entered the shop by the front door, which was then closed—that is to say, it was put to, but it was capable of being opened by turning the handle. Having so entered, he took advantage of the absence of the porter, who was putting away the shop shutters, to break into a showcase or partition, in which was placed a quantity of jewellery, with which he made off. The question is whether such theft was one for the consequences of which the appellants are liable under the policy. The learned judges in the Divisional Court held that the appellants were liable. I desire to say that no question of principle or general interest is involved in this case; the question is simply as to the true construction of this particular contract.

Two propositions were put forward on behalf of the respondent. The first was that an entry effected by the exercise of any force was sufficient to constitute an entry within the meaning of the policy. It was said that pushing a door open if it was ajar or turning the handle of a door if it was shut but not locked, would be sufficient to bring a case within the policy. The second was that even if this was not so, if the original entry was not effected by force within the meaning of the policy, yet, inasmuch as the thief, having entered without force, prized off the iron plate and padlock which secured the shop-front within, the terms of the policy were satisfied. The first of these propositions was adopted by the Divisional Court, and on the second they offered no opinion.

The policy recites that the assured is desirous of effecting an insurance "against loss or damage by burglary and housebreaking as hereinafter defined." The risk to be guarded against by this insurance therefore is not burglary and housebreaking as defined by the criminal law, but as defined by the parties in this policy. It proceeds to make the proposal and answers on which the policy was effected part of the contract. Then comes the operative part of the policy, which says that "if at any time after the date hereof, and during the continuance of this policy, the property above described or any part thereof shall be lost by theft following upon actual forcible and violent entry upon the premises wherein the same is herein stated to be situate," then the assured shall be entitled to be indemnified. The second condition indorsed on the policy has some importance. The effect of it seems to be that if the loss had happened in the night-time and in consequence of the assured not having taken due precautions for the safety of his property, he could not recover under the policy. That seems to show that the parties had in view the risk of a forcible burglarious entry by night or of a forcible entry in the day-time under such circumstances that in the absence of due precautions such an entry might be effected.

Now, taking the words of the policy, that the assured is to be protected against loss "by theft following upon actual forcible and violent entry upon the premises," could anyone in good sense apart from technicalities of the law as to burglary, and applying its ordinary meaning to ordinary language, suppose that an entry by turning the handle of the shop door was a forcible and violent entry within the meaning of the policy? It seems repugnant to common sense to say so. I think that the view of the learned judges in the Divisional Court was that it was intended to guard the assured against loss by burglary and housebreaking in the technical and often subtle senses in which the criminal law uses those terms. The fault of that appears to me to be that it is a restricted view, and one which fails to give the controlling words "as hereinafter defined" the effect which they ought to have. I think that the parties to this contract did not desire to involve themselves in the subtleties of the criminal law as to burglary and housebreaking, but that they intended to cover a theft following upon entry effected by violence, not by stealth.

The argument on the part of the respondent was put in two shapes. It was said in the first place that the effect of the words "actual forcible and violent entry" is to be found in the word "actual," and and that the intention was to prevent the policy covering an entry effected by fraud, as constructive forcible entry. The word "actual" may have that effect, but it seems to me that what is contemplated is an entry not by technical violence, but by real violence. It was said that any force was sufficient, and that if the door was closed, and it was only necessary to turn the handle in order to open it, such turning of the handle was sufficient. To carry the case further, if the door was ajar and it was pushed open, would that be sufficient to constitute actual forcible and violent entry? Or again, if the door was partly open so that a boy or a thin man could enter without moving the door, but a fat man could not, would the question whether it was an actual forcible entry depend on the particular person who entered? Such considerations show that the line of reasoning adopted by the respondent is not satisfactory. In my opinion the policy is directed to insuring against an entry effected by real violence in contradistinction to an entry effected by stealth and without violence, as I think this was. Secondly, it was said that an unlawful entry was enough to satisfy the words of the policy, although there was no violence. I think that argument cannot be accepted. It would make the policy include the case of a man entering a shop in broad daylight without any impediment with intent to commit a felony, and then effecting a theft while the shopman was at a distant part of the premises.

As regards the second proposition the argument is this, that assuming that the entry by turning the handle of the door was not an "actual forcible and violent entry" within the meaning of the policy, what followed did constitute such an entry. The man, having entered by stealth, proceeded to prize off the iron plate and padlock which secured the shop-front, and so got possession of a quantity of jewellery and made off with it. In my judgment that was not an entry upon the premises within the meaning of the policy. The policy speaks of an entry upon the premises wherein the property insured is situate—i.e., the premises, 78, Strand. The second condition shows more clearly what is meant by the premises, for it provides for due precautions being taken by the assured for securing doors and windows and other means of entrance. I think entrance means entrance into the shop from outside. The answers contained in the proposal form support this view. I have come to the conclusion that the respondent has not by either of his contentions made out that his loss comes within the policy, and that the appeal must therefore be allowed.

Bankruptcy—Sheriff—Possession for fifteen months—Act of bankruptcy, when committed—Possession money—Consent of execution creditor and execution debtor—"Costs of execution"—Order of 31st of August, 1888, under Sheriffs Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 55)—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), ss. 1, 11 (2).

Where the sheriff seizes goods and remains in possession for a period greatly exceeding twenty-one days (e.g., fifteen months) there is, under section 1 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, one act of bankruptcy, which is committed at the expiration of twenty-one days, but not a continuing act of bankruptcy or a succession of such acts.

In such a case, therefore, if both execution creditor and execution debtor assented to the sheriff retaining possession, he will be entitled, under section 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, to possession money for the whole time he remained in possession, notwithstanding that the debtor has been made a bankrupt on a petition presented more than three months after the expiration of the twenty-one days. The only cases in which the sheriff would not be so entitled are cases coming within the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, as to reputed ownership and the relation back of the trustee's title, and cases to which the Act 13 Eliz. c. 5 applies.

Appeal from Wright, J.

On the 27th of July, 1896, the sheriff levied execution on goods belonging to the debtor for a judgment debt of £90 17s. 6d. At the request of the debtor, and with the consent or at least by the connivance of the creditor, the sheriff remained in possession till the 27th of October, 1897. Before the end of 1896 the whole of the judgment debt, except a small balance of less than £4, had been paid. On the 27th of October, 1897, a receiving order was made against the debtor on his own petition, and on the 28th the sheriff sold the goods. The sheriff's costs, as allowed on taxation, amounted to £105 18s. 6d., the greater part of which consisted of possession money. The Board of Trade applied to review the taxation, and contended that the sheriff had remained an unreasonably long time in possession, and that possession money for the whole of such a period could not be included in the "costs of the execution," which are a charge on the debtor's goods under section 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890. Wright, J., decided that, as no bankruptcy could now relate back to the act of bankruptcy constituted by the seizure and holding for twenty-one days by the sheriff, In re Hurley, 41 W. R. 653, 10 Morrell 120, governed the present case, and the possession money must be allowed.

The Board of Trade appealed.

Sir Richard Webster, A.G., and Muir Mackenzie, for the appeal, contended that In re Hurley was wrong, and that after the expiration of the first twenty-one days, so long as the sheriff remained in possession, there was a continuing act of bankruptcy; or alternatively, that there was a succession of acts of bankruptcy, a new act of bankruptcy being completed every twenty-one days.

They also referred to the order of the 31st of August, 1888, made under the Sheriffs Act, 1887 (Annual Prac. 1899, pp. 236-239); section 1 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890; section 45 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and section 11 of the Act of 1890; Masters v. Lowther, 11 C. Sir Richard Webster, A.G., replied.

LINDLEY, M.R.—I do not think that when this case is thrashed out, as it has been, there is any real difficulty in coming to a proper conclusion; and the conclusion which Wright, J., came to appears to me to be the proper one.

It appears that a writ of fi. fa. upon a proper judgment was executed against the judgment debtor, who is now bankrupt, on the 27th of July, 1896, and for twenty-one days after that the sheriff was in possession and nothing was done. Under section 1 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1890 that was an act of bankruptcy, and, if within three months after that the debtor had become bankrupt, the consequence would have been that the title of the trustee in bankruptcy would have related back, and, unless the transaction could have been protected, he would have been in a far better position than in the circumstances the trustee in this bankruptcy is.

There was no act of bankruptcy within the three months. That depends, of course, on the true construction of section 1 of the Act of 1890; but that is the view that I take of it for the reasons which I will give. There being no act of bankruptcy, the execution debtor and the execution creditor were in the position of ordinary execution debtors and execution creditors, and there was no right of the trustee or of any other creditors which had to be considered in determining how long the sheriff should remain in possession or how soon he should go out. If the execution debtor chose, for his own convenience, to consent to the sheriff retaining possession, the possession money would as against the execution debtor be costs of execution. I do not mean to say it would be as against other people—the execution creditor, for instance, if he did not consent—because no arrangement between the sheriff and the execution debtor could deprive other people who did not consent to it of their rights; but, as regards the execution debtor, the costs of the continued possession would be costs of execution. I have not the slightest doubt about that.

If that is so, in what better position is the trustee in the bankruptcy of the debtor? On general principles applicable to bankruptcy, the trustee in bankruptcy is in no better position than the bankrupt, except, so far as I know, in three classes of cases. He has under the reputed ownership clause a right to override transactions which the bankrupt could not impeach; he has under those sections which introduced the doctrine of relation back, a right to impeach transactions which the bankrupt could not; and, of course, under the statute of 13 Eliz. c. 5, the trustee in bankruptcy can impeach transactions on the ground that they are frauds against creditors, which the bankrupt cannot impeach. But, eliminating those classes of cases—and we have nothing to do with them here—the trustee in bankruptcy is in no better position than the bankrupt himself. The consequence of that is that the trustee in this bankruptcy is not in a position to say that this possession money is not, as against him, what it would be as against the bankrupt—namely, costs of execution.

That is the short answer which I give to this case. That is the view, as I understand it, on which the case of In re Hurley proceeded. Of course the consent to continued possession might be impeached on the ground that the trustee was not bound by it, either because his title related back, or because of the statute of Elizabeth, but, unless he can impeach it, the possession money does not cease to be as against him what it would be as against the debtor.

The two sections of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, which it is important to consider are the 1st and the 11th. Section 1 would avail the trustee if it could be read so as to make the act of bankruptcy come down to October, 1897, or within three months of it. But the dates are important. The fi. fa. was executed, and the sheriffs took possession on the 27th of July, 1896, and twenty-one days after that would expire on the 17th of August, 1896, and the receiving order, the title of the trustee, did not occur until October, 1897. Is it possible fairly to construe section 1 so as to make a continued possession for more than twenty-one days either a continued act of bankruptcy, or, if there should be a succession of periods of twenty-one days, a succession of acts of bankruptcy? I do not think that is consistent with the language. We know perfectly well that acts of bankruptcy have to be regarded critically and carefully. Nothing is an act of bankruptcy except what the statute declares to be one; and when the statute says that an act of bankruptcy is committed if an execution has been levied by seizure and the goods have been either sold or held by the sheriff for twenty-one days, that means that the seizure and the holding for twenty-one days are essential for the constitution of an act of bankruptcy. It seems to me that it would be straining this section beyond all reason to say that there was a succession of as many acts of bankruptcy as there were periods of twenty-one days, or that there has been one continued act of bankruptcy running over a year and a-half. That appears to me not to be the true construction of the section. There is, therefore, no act of bankruptcy under which the title of the trustee can relate back; a most important point, to my mind.

because, if the trustee's title related back, we should have to consider the matter on totally different grounds.

The other section of the Act of 1890 material to be considered is section 11. Both in sub-section 1 of that section, which does not relate to this case, and in sub-section 2, which does, there is the same expression, "costs of the execution." Here the sheriff has sold the goods, and he has deducted, as costs of the execution, the whole of his possession-money. The answer to any objection as to that is, that he could have done it as against the debtor in the circumstances of this case, and the trustee is in no better position. It appears to me, that is the short answer to this case; and for these reasons I think that the appeal should be dismissed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The case turns on the question of what costs are costs of execution. To my mind those are costs of execution which would have been costs of execution if certain circumstances had actually happened. I do not think that by the statute it was intended to depart from that.

Reference was made to the practice in interpleader cases, but that practice is founded upon the fact that the interpleader order really puts an end to the execution, and the sheriff thenceforth holds, if he holds at all, on the terms contained in the interpleader order. It seems to me that the costs of execution must be, unless impeached before the taxing-master, as they may well be on some proper ground, the costs of execution as between the parties I say nothing about other people being bound. In certain cases clearly they would not be, as, for instance, where the receiving order was made within three months, and it turned out that the debtor had been dealing with property which no longer belonged to him, but was dealing with other people's property. That, however, is a very different case.

In the circumstances of this case I cannot see my way to limiting the words "costs of execution" contained in the Act in the way which has been suggested.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I entirely agree. There can be no doubt whatsoever that these costs of possession, apart from the act of bankruptcy or the making of a receiving order, would be costs which the sheriff would be entitled to take out of the proceeds of the levy. Of course I am speaking of costs which are bonâ fide incurred in the course of levying the execution.

That being so, I agree with the Attorney-General that the right of the sheriff to these costs does not depend upon the ordinary statutes governing the right of the sheriff to his fees and costs, but depends upon section 11 of the Act of 1890. That section says that the costs of execution shall be a first charge on the goods or money delivered up to the official receiver, and the only question really that we have to decide in the present case is what costs are covered by or included in those words in this section, "costs of the execution"? Does that mean the same costs as would have been recoverable by the sheriff apart from the bankruptcy, or does it mean only a portion of those costs? Speaking for myself, I do not see a word in the section to lead one to suppose that the words "costs of the execution" there mean anything else than the costs of execution to which the sheriff would have been entitled apart from the bankruptcy. Of course, if there is an earlier act of bankruptcy prior to the realization of these goods under the execution, the goods would cease to be subject to execution, because they would cease to be the goods of the bankrupt, and the title by relation back, of the trustee in bankruptcy would prevail. But apart from that it seems to me perfectly clear on these words that the costs of execution cover all the ordinary costs which a sheriff would be entitled to if such costs were bonâ fide incurred in the course of execution.

I have only one word to add, and that is as to whether the act of bankruptcy here by seizure and the possession for twenty-one days is either a continuous act of bankruptcy for the whole term of possession, or an act of bankruptcy which will be repeated each time that there is a fresh period of twenty-one days of possession. I have no doubt myself that it is one act of bankruptcy. It is not a continuous act of bankruptcy, nor is it a repeated act of bankruptcy on the happening of each fresh period of twenty-one days. I know what has been said by the Master of the Rolls as to the words of the section, and I entirely agree with what he has said; but I wish to add one observation. Until the recent legislation there was no such act of bankruptcy as this act of bankruptcy constituted by seizure and remaining in possession for twenty-one days, or any other time. The act of bankruptcy was by execution for a certain amount followed by a sale, and it is that which has been extended. One finds in this section two things put together, and I have no doubt myself that if, as the Legislature intended, the act of bankruptcy defined in respect of the seizure and sale be one act, done at the instance of the execution creditor for the purpose of the realization of his security—a security gained by seizure—or in respect of the continuing possession, the act of bankruptcy takes its origin at the seizure, and whether the seizure be followed by sale or whether it be followed by possession for twenty-one days, there is only one act of bankruptcy, which dates from the seizure; and if there is no fresh seizure there is no fresh act of bankruptcy.

In re TROTTER.
TROTTER v. TROTTER. (a.)

Will—Attesting witness taking benefit—Codicil—Republication—Wills Act, 1837 (7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 26), s. 15.

The effect of a codicil to republish a will, and thus validate a gift under the will to a witness attesting such will, but not attesting the codicil, will not be rendered void by the attestation by such witness of a second codicil to such will, such witness being able to point to a proper instrument under which he takes the benefit, not attested by himself.

Summons.

This was a summons raising certain questions in the administration of the estate of Charles V. Trotter, deceased.

The following point alone calls for a report. By his will, bearing date the 6th of February, 1878, the said C. V. Trotter declared that John Trotter, a solicitor, one of the executors and trustees of the said will, should, notwithstanding his trusteeship, be allowed all professional and other charges for his time and trouble, which, if employed as solicitor to his trustees without being himself a trustee, he would have been entitled to make. The said John Trotter attested the will.

On the 1st of May, 1881, testator added a codicil to to his will, wherein he referred to his will and made certain different dispositions of parts of his estate in no way affecting the benefit previously conferred on John Trotter. This codicil was not attested by John Trotter.

In November, 1881, testator added another codicil, whereby he again varied the disposition of certain parts of his estate; but not so as to affect the benefit previously conferred on John Trotter, and testator expressly confirmed his will and the first codicil thereto in every other detail and respect. This codicil was attested by the said John Trotter.

The question raised by the plaintiff was whether the defendant John Trotter had lost his right to the benefit conferred on him under the will by his attestation of such will, and of the second codicil thereto.

Levett, Q.C., and H. Fellows, for the plaintiff.—The authority to charge profit costs is practically a legacy, and it arises under a will which the legatee attested. It is true that if there had been no second codicil the defendant would have been entitled—under Allen v. Maddock, 6 W. R. 825, 11 Moo. P. C. 427; Anderson v. Anderson, 20 W. R. 313, L. R. 13 Eq. 381—but the effect of the second codicil is to deprive him of the right. If the will and codicils are regarded as one instrument, it is clear that he is not entitled. To hold that he is, is to treat the will as consisting of two instruments—one the will and the first codicil; secondly, the second codicil—which is impossible.

Theobald, Q.C., and Fischer Williams, for the defendant.—The fact that one codicil unattested by the witness intervenes, is sufficient to establish the gift, as the first codicil operated as a republication of the will, and the defendant's attestation of the second codicil will not deprive him of the benefit.

They referred to the cases above-mentioned, and Gurney v. Gurney, 3 W. R. 353, 3 Drew. 208, and In re Marcus, 57 L. T. Rep. 399, 36 W. R. Dig. 322.

Levett, Q.C., replied.

BYRNE, J. (after stating the facts).—Had the matter rested upon the will and the first codicil alone, it is clear, upon the authority of Anderson v. Anderson, that John Trotter would have been entitled to the benefit of profit costs. But the question remains whether he is so entitled, having regard to his execution of the second codicil. The ground of decision in the case of Anderson v. Anderson was, that, as had been held in Allen v. Maddock, the due execution by a testator of a codicil amounts to the republication of a former will, if the codicil refers to such former will, and that without any regard to the fact whether or not the paper referred to complied with the requirements of the law as to execution or attestation of such paper, and the Vice-Chancellor held that it would be as much beyond the provisions and the contemplations of the statutes as it would be opposed to good sense and reason to hold that the codicil duly executed and attested had not the effect of republishing the will and making it a new and original disposition by the testatrix at the date of the codicil of the estate of which she had dealt by the will. In Gurney v. Gurney the testator had given benefits by his will to two persons who did not attest the will, but who did afterwards attest two codicils. Kinderaley, V.C., decided that the word "thereby" in section 15 of the Wills Act must be construed to mean by the same testamentary instrument which is attested, and that it does not apply to the case where the legatee has not attested the same instrument by which he takes. This points to the will and codicil being treated as separate instruments for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not an attesting witness to either of such instruments can take. In In re Marcus, North, J., upon the authority of Gurney v. Gurney, held that a legatee who had witnessed a will and codicils could not take; but that another who had not witnessed the will by which the benefit was given, but who had witnessed the codicils could take, and the learned judge applies the same test which was applied in Gurney v. Gurney in reference to the legatee who witnessed the will and both codicils. He says: "As he cannot point to an instrument under which he claims, which he did not witness, I think he cannot take." Allen v. Maddock shows that an instrument invalid in itself as a will may be incorporated and rendered valid by a subsequent codicil duly and validly attested and referring to the will, the two documents taking effect as one instrument. Gurney v. Gurney and In re Marcus show that a gift by will not witnessed by a legatee is not rendered invalid as to the gift to such legatee, by reason of his attesting a subsequent codicil, and Anderson v. Anderson decides, upon the principle laid down in Allen v. Maddock, that a gift by will to the husband or wife of an attesting witness (which stands on the same footing as if the gift had been made to the attesting witness), though invalid if the will had stood alone, is valid by a subsequent codicil not attested by the husband or wife of the legatee, the testator having referred to his will in making his codicil, thereby incorporating and republishing his will with the new codicil. I think that these points in respect of wills made since the Wills Act have been established: (1) That a will invalid in itself may operate as a valid instrument when referred to and incorporated in or with a subsequent and validly executed codicil. (2) That a valid gift by will to a legatee is not rendered invalid by reason of his subsequently attesting a codicil, although the codicil has the effect of republishing and incorporating the will. (3) That although a gift by a valid will to an attesting witness is utterly null and void, such gift may be rendered effectual if the will is republished by a codicil referring to the will, but not attested by the legatee. (4) That the legatee must be able to point to an instrument giving him his legacy not attested by himself before he can establish his rights to his legacy.

Bearing in mind these principles the question appears to be, whether or not John Trotter can point to an instrument not attested by himself and giving him the benefit which he claims. It cannot be to the will alone, for though a valid instrument it is utterly null and void so far as the disposition in his favour is concerned. But just as, had the original will been altogether void, he would have been able to point to a codicil republishing and incorporating the whole of it, and as validating the whole of the dispositions intended to be made by the said will, so in like manner I think he can point to the first codicil—republishing and incorporating an instrument valid as to some of its dispositions, but invalid as to the dispositions in his favour—being the instrument under which he claims. I think that the true view is that where the original gift is by section 15 of the Wills Act utterly null and void, the will is pro tanto null and void, as it would have been if unattested null and void altogether, and that just as in the latter case the whole will would, if referred to in a duly executed and duly attested codicil, operate in its entirety as from the date of the codicil, so where void in part as to its dispositions by reason of improper attestation, it will so far as void operate for the first time by the incorporation and republication effected by the due execution of the codicil. I think that John Trotter is entitled here to point to the first codicil as the instrument conferring upon him the benefit in question, inasmuch as the codicil incorporates the whole will, including the originally void disposition; and this being so, upon the authority of Gurney v. Gurney and In re Marcus, he has not lost the benefit by reason of his having subsequently attested the second codicil.

HOPE v. WALTER. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Specific performance—Rescission—"Eligible for investment"—House used as brothel—Defect unknown to vendor.

If at the time of the contract the vendor himself was not aware of any defect in the estate, the purchaser must take the estate with all its faults.

Where a house, described in particulars of sale as an eligible property for investment, was, after the sale, alleged by the purchaser to have been used by the tenant as a disorderly house at and some time before the date of the contract, but neither the vendors nor the purchaser knew of such user at the time of the sale,

Held, on the above principle, that that circumstance—assuming it to be true in fact—did not give any ground for rescission, or even constitute a defence to the vendors' action for specific performance of the contract.

Action by vendors for specific performance.

The property, the subject of the above action, was one of several lots put up for auction at the mart by the plaintiffs on the 1st of December, 1897, described in certain particulars of sale and subject to the conditions attached to such particulars. Lot 1, being the property in question, was described in the particulars of sale as "eligible freehold property for investment, comprising brick-built corner house and shop," and was stated to contain (inter alia) "on the ground floor double-fronted shop," and to be "let on a quarterly tenancy under agreement dated the 20th of July, 1895, at a rent of £55 per annum," as was the fact. This agreement contained a covenant by the tenant not to keep the house as a disorderly house, and a power of immediate re-entry on breach of any of the covenants.

The defendant bought lot 1 at the auction, and paid a deposit, and signed a memorandum in the usual way. By the fourth condition of sale each lot was sold subject to the existing tenancies, and by the third condition of sale, after stating that counterparts or copies of the leases or agreements of tenancy might be inspected for five days prior to the sale, it was provided that each purchaser should be deemed to purchase with notice of and to take subject to the terms of all tenancies and the state of the property, notwithstanding any partial or incomplete statement in the particulars. The purchase was to be completed on the 8th of February, 1898, at the office of the vendors' solicitors. It appeared that the premises prior to and at the date of sale were used as a coffee tavern.

On the 20th of December, 1897, the defendant's solicitors sent a letter with their requisitions on title suggesting that the house was used for an immoral purpose, and that the defendant might therefore refuse performance of the contract. The plaintiffs denied knowledge of any such user as was alleged by the defendant. On the day fixed for completion the defendant's solicitors wrote that he had determined not to purchase owing to the alleged immoral user of the premises. The writ in the above action was thereupon issued. The defendant counterclaimed for rescission of the contract and return of his deposit.

Astbury, Q.C., and Yardley, for the plaintiffs, stated the contract.

Eve, Q.C., and Tomlin, for the defendant.—Since the contract the defendant has ascertained that the tenant was convicted at a police court in January, 1897, of keeping the premises as a disorderly house, and the court ought not to force the contract on the purchasers. [Astbury, Q.C., referred to Lucas v. James, 7 Hare 410, at p. 418.] The dictum in that case is wrong. Beside it does not apply here. The property not being an eligible investment, as both sides thought at the sale, the case is one of mutual mistake, and not of a mere defect in the property. Durham (Earl) v. Legard 13 W. R. 959, 34 Beav. 611, shows that this entitles the purchaser to rescind. The case would be one of such hardship that equity would not enforce the contract: Wedgwood v. Adams, 6 Beav. 600, at p. 604, approved in Falcke v. Gray, 7 W. R. 535, 4 Drew. 651, 659. The purchaser will be placed under a criminal liability by the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, s. 13 (3)—Gully v. Smith, 12 Q. B. D., 121, 32 W. R. Dig. 88—unless he turns the tenant out. Clay v. Yates, 4 W. R. 557, 1 H. & N. 73, shows that where by reason of circumstances unknown at the date of this contract a party might be involved in an illegal act, he is not bound.

No reply was called for.

COZENS-HARDY, J., after reading the description in the particulars of sale, continued: Now, every word of that description is true. This case has been argued on the assumption, and I shall assume, but, of course, for the purpose of this case only, that at and some time before the date of the contract the house was used as a disorderly house, and that the tenant was convicted at the police-court of keeping the house as a disorderly house. It is not contended that the vendors knew this at the time of the sale, it was in fact admitted by the purchaser that the plaintiffs were as ignorant of the circumstances as the purchaser. But it is said: First, that this circumstance is a ground for rescinding the contract; and secondly, if that is not so, that specific performance should be refused. There has, it is said, been a mutual mistake, and the contract ought therefore to be rescinded; and, again, there would be such hardship in enforcing the contract that at any rate specific performance ought not to be enforced. In my opinion all these contentions fail. At an early period of the case the attention of counsel was called to a passage in Lucas v. James, 7 Hare 410, at p. 418. The contract there was for the sale of a house in which the defendant intended to reside, and which proved not to be suitable for a residence for his family. Wigram, V.C., there stated it as settled law "that if the vendor, at the time of the contract, does not know of the existing defect in the estate, the court will enforce the contract." It is true that in that case the nuisance was in the adjoining houses, but the Vice-Chancellor treated the law as perfectly settled in the case where the nuisance existed without the knowledge of both parties in the house itself the subject of the contract. I cannot treat the matter on the footing that there was a mutual mistake in regard to the subject-matter of the contract. It is not unimportant to observe that the property is described to be and is let on a quarterly tenancy, and the tenant can be turned out at once. There is, then, no ground for rescission. Is there any ground for refusing specific perform ance? A strong and clear case is required for that purpose. That the defendant as an honourable and respectable man may have to turn out the tenant at once is not sufficient to constitute such a case. The plaintiff therefore succeeds on the claim and the defendant fails on his counterclaim.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

Company — Winding up — Private examination under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862—Subsequent proceedings—Interrogatories—Right to inspect depositions—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 115—Companies (Winding-up) Rules, November, 1895.

A witness is not now entitled as of right to see the depositions of his examination under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, but must obtain the leave of the court to do so; and even if the court considers that the witness ought to be allowed to see his depositions, it does not follow that such leave will be granted to him at any moment which he may choose, but the court will consider the circumstances of each case.

This was a summons by Mr. Duncan Davidson, one of the directors of the company, for leave to inspect and take an office copy of the depositions taken in December, 1897, at his private examination, under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, before having to answer interrogatories which had been administered to him in an action commenced by the liquidator of the company against Davidson and his co-directors for alleged misfeasances. The directors had put in separate defences.

By rule 11 of the Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1892, all "depositions . . . and other proceeding of the High Court in a winding-up matter" were to be kept on the file, and were, by rule 32, open to the inspection of anyone who had been a director of the company, who might also take an office copy of them at the same time.

The Companies (Winding-up) Rules, November, 1895, however, by rule 1, order that "the notes of the depositions of a person examined under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, shall not be placed on the file of proceedings or be open to the inspection of any creditor, contributory, or other person, except the official receiver or liquidator, unless and until the court shall so direct, and the court may from time to time give such general or special directions as it shall think expedient as to the custody and inspection of such notes and the furnishing of copies of or of extracts therefrom."

W. F. Hamilton, for the applicant.—It was held In re Standard Gold Mining Co., 44 W. R. 63, [1895] 2 Ch. 545, that the rule of 1862 gave an absolute right to inspect the depositions made under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, but the rule of November, 1895, took away the absolute right but gave the court a discretionary power. The application should be granted. In Ex parte Pratt, 31 W. R. 189, 21 Ch. D. 439, the Court of Appeal granted leave in a bankruptcy case, and In re Beall, [1894] 2 Q. B. 135, it was held that the bankrupt had the right under rule 12 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1886, to inspect depositions taken at a private examination. Here it is only fair that the applicant should have an opportunity of inspecting the deposition of an examination made more than a year ago. Both sides should have an equal opportunity of inspecting the deposition.

Daniel Jones, for the liquidator.—The rule of 1895 has restored the old practice, and in place of an absolute right to inspect has given the court a discretionary power. In this case it is most important that the applicant should not see his deposition, as his co-directors could also see it and so concert their answers to interrogatories.

Hamilton, in reply.—We will give you an undertaking not to reveal the deposition to the other defendants.

WRIGHT, J.—This is a case of considerable importance. Since rule 1 of November, 1895, it seems to me that, generally speaking, depositions taken under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, ought to be treated as private and ought not to be shown without some clear reason being given for it. I think the cases would be few in which it would be right to allow anyone to inspect the depositions generally. A separate case ought to be made for the inspection of each deposition, although, of course, the same reason might be sufficient in the case of two or more depositions. Here there is only one application, which is by Mr. Davidson for liberty to see his own deposition. The reason is that an action has been brought against him and the other directors, in which an order has been made that he should answer certain interrogatories, and before doing so, he is naturally desirous of knowing precisely what he said at his private examination. The examination was taken more than a year ago and related to matters which occurred at a still earlier date, and on the occasion of his examination he had no opportunity of making any note or taking a copy of what he said. In fact he would not, I presume, have been allowed to do so if he had wished. It is obvious that prima facie he ought to be allowed to see what he said. That was the view taken in 1882 in Ex parte Pratt by Sir George Jessel and Brett and Cotton, L.JJ., and in 1895 by Vaughan Williams, J., in In re Standard Gold Mining Co. I should have thought that, if that were all, it would be almost a matter of course to allow the applicant to see his deposition. I confess, however, that I was rather impressed with the argument on the other side. Of course it does not follow that because he is entitled to see his deposition he ought to be allowed to do so at any moment he may choose. And here it is said in substance that he ought not to be allowed to see his deposition until after he has put in his answers to the interrogatories. If he had not put in a defence, or had put in what might be called a blank defence to be filled up afterwards, I should be inclined to hold that the liberty to inspect ought to be postponed. But here the applicant has put in a defence to the action which does not appear in any way to be a blank defence, and in the circumstances he says that he is now entitled to see his deposition. Then comes the further objection from the liquidator that the action has been brought against a number of directors, each of whom has put in a separate defence and been interrogated, and each of whom had previously been examined separately; that each of them is, therefore, very much in the dark as to what the others have said; and that there is more chance of the truth being arrived at and any falsehood detected if each of them has to answer the interrogatories before he sees what the others have said in their depositions. I feel there is very great force in that argument. In certain states of fact I am not sure that such an objection ought not to prevail, but I do not think that primâ facie it ought to do so, and I do not think it ought to prevail in the present case. If the applicant is primâ facie entitled to inspect his deposition, I do not think that the mere fact that he is charged with something in an action against himself and other persons ought to deprive him of his primâ facie right of inspection unless I can find a conspiracy to misrepresent the facts of the case. I do not see anything of the sort here, and I think I should be acting with too much suspicion if I held that none of the defendants should see the depositions until all had answered the interrogatories. I think, therefore, that the applicant must be allowed to see his own deposition. As the applicant has offered to give an undertaking to use his best endeavours to prevent the communication of the deposition to any other defendants or their solicitors or counsel, I think the undertaking may be accepted. The liquidator must pay the applicant's costs, and may retain the amount and his own costs out of the company's assets.

The adoption and confirmation by directors of a contract made before the formation of a company by persons purporting to act on behalf of the company does not create any contractual relation between the company and the other party to the contract.

Where a sum is payable by a shareholder in cash to a company it is sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the 25th section of the Companies Act, 1867, if the company agrees with the shareholder to accept, as a set-off and discharge, a like sum then payable by the company to the shareholder.

The judgment of their lordships (Lords MORRIS and DAVEY and Sir RICHARD COUCH) was delivered by Lord DAVEY.—This is an appeal by the officia liquidator of the North Sydney Investment and Tramway Co. (Limited) (now in liquidation) from an order of the Supreme Court of New South Wales in Equity made on the 8th of November, 1895, dismissing an application by the liquidator by way of summons that a call of £66 13s. 4d. be made on the contributories of the company. The real question involved is whether certain shares in the company held by and registered in the names of the respondents respectively had or had not been paid for in cash within the meaning of section 57 of the Companies Act of the Colony, which is substantially in the same terms as section 25 of the Imperial Companies Act, 1867.

The facts on which the answer to this question depends are somewhat complicated but are not in dispute.

By contracts made in March and April, 1888, one Charles Arthur Moresby Billyard contracted for the purchase of a tract of land in North Sydney. The aggregate purchase-money was £134,000, and of this amount it was agreed that £35,000 should be satisfied by partly paid-up shares of a company to be formed to work and acquire the property. Billyard's object was to sell the property to such a company at an enhanced price, and his ideas as to the profit obtainable seem to have grown from time to time as matters proceeded.

Shortly afterwards a prospectus was issued of a syndicate which has been called in the argument Syndicate No. 1. It is entitled "Syndicate prospectus of the North Sydney Investment Co. (Limited), capital £300,000, in sixty shares of £5,000 each, payable one-third in cash one-third months" (the words "in three" are accidentally omitted) "interest six per cent added. The balance is not likely to be required. Two and a-half per cent. upon the subscribed capital will be charged to cover all preliminary expenses in connection with the syndicate. Provisional directors, C. A. M. Billyard, J. W. Cliff, Alick Osborne." The prospectus then states that the syndicate is formed for the purpose of acquiring the lands described, being those comprised in Billyard's contracts, and after stating the character and advantages of the property and other details not material for the present purpose concludes thus: "The terms of purchase are as follows: Total purchase-money, £300,000, payable one-third in cash, one-third by promissory note at three months, with six per cent. added, balance can remain for three years at the lowest bank rate of interest if required, and the owner will join in the conveyance of any portion sold. Immediately the full number of shares has been subscribed it is proposed to place the property in the English market and it is thought that with the names associated and the soundness of the undertaking there will be no difficulty whatever in disposing of the property at a sum decidedly not less than half-a-million."

This syndicate was not registered as a joint-stock company with limited liability. The whole of the shares were subscribed by various persons, including

Higgins and Hogan, two of the respondents, who paid in cash one-third of the amount of three shares, and gave promissory notes for another third with 6 per cent. interest added. The receipt given to the respondent Higgins is headed "North Sydney Investment Co. (Limited)," and the sum of £1,666 13s. 4d. is thereby stated to have been paid as a deposit on one share in the above company—i.e., in the company to be registered with limited liability. The promoter determined to change the name of the intended company and to increase the nominal capital and the amount of the purchase-money. Accordingly he shortly afterwards issued another prospectus of what has been called Syndicate No. 2. This document is in the following terms: "Syndicate prospectus of the North Sydney Investment and Tramway Co. (Limited), to be registered under the Companies Statute, 1871. Capital, £500,000 in 100 shares of £5,000 each, one-third payable in cash, one-third in three months, interest six per cent. added; the balance is not likely to be required. Two and a-half per cent. upon the subscribed capital will be charged to cover all preliminary expenses in connection with the syndicate." The names of the provisional directors and description and particulars of the property and the terms of purchase (substituting £500,000 for £300,000) are then set forth as in the former prospectus. It then states: "The contract with the vendors and the memorandum and articles of association may be inspected at the office of the solicitor to the company." Attached to the second prospectus was a form of receipt. The form filled up and given to the respondent Allcock was as follows:

"Received the sum of ten thousand pounds, being first and second payments (latter with interest deducted) for three shares in within syndicate as per prospectus. This receipt to be returned upon receipt of share certificate in limited company from Jas. Service & Co. (Signed) J. Woolf, solicitor for the Melbourne portion of the syndicate and (by his request) for the vendor."

No doubt the arrangements for obtaining the share capital of the company were not made so carefully or skilfully with a view to the exigencies of the law as they might have been. But on a careful consideration of the language of these documents their lordships come to the conclusion that both prospectuses were and were intended to be an invitation to subscribe for shares in a joint-stock company then about to be registered with limited liability, the memorandum and articles of association of which were offered for inspection in the second prospectus with a view to the purchase by that company of the property in question, and that consequently the money paid by the subscribers on the terms of the prospectuses was intended to be applied in payment up of shares in the company when formed, and further, that the promoter who issued the prospectuses and received the money of the subscribers was bound so to apply the amounts paid by them and to procure share certificates to be issued to the several subscribers in exchange for the receipts held by them. The subscribers on the first prospectus might have raised, and (as will presently appear) did raise questions as to their position under the second prospectus, but (as will also appear) they accepted the position of shareholders in the company and for valuable consideration waived any such questions.

A contract purporting to bear date the 26th of March, 1888, was made between one John William Cliff, described as the vendor, and certain persons described as "trustees for the company hereinafter mentioned," whereby after reciting that a company with limited liability was about to be formed having for its objects, amongst other things, the purchase of the lands in the schedule (being those purchased by Billyard) under the name of the "North Sydney Investment and Tramway Co. (Limited)," it was agreed that the vendors should sell and the company should purchase the lands in question for £512,500, to be paid as follows—viz., £171,100 in cash on the signing of the agreement, a further sum of £171,000 at three months from the date of this agreement with interest at 6 per cent. per annum, and the remaining sum of £170,500 to remain on security of the property with interest at the same rate. Cliff (who was named as one of the provisional directors in both prospectuses) was admittedly the nominee and agent of Billyard, the vendor and promoter. The addition of £12,500 to the purchase-money obviously represents the 2½ per cent. charged for the expenses of the syndicate. Mr. Cozens-Hardy contended that the contract was not executed until after the date which it purports to bear. This may very likely be so, but in the view which their lordships take the point is immaterial.

On the 5th of May, 1888, the North Sydney Investment and Tramway Co. (Limited) was registered with the object (amongst other things) of adopting and carrying into effect the contract dated the 26th of March, 1888, and with a capital of £1,000,000 divided into 200 shares of £5,000.

The first meeting of the directors of the company was held on the 22nd of May, 1888. The secretary placed before the meeting a document signed by Cliff which is of the greatest importance. This document is in the following terms:

"North Sydney Investment and Tramway Co. (Limited). I, John William Cliff, the vendor in contract dated the 26th day of March, 1888, hereby acknowledge to have received from each of the following shareholders in this company the respective sums of ( ) amounting in all to £333,333 6s. 8d." Then follows a schedule of the subscribers to the syndicate (including the present respondents) in alphabetical order with denoting numbers against their several names of their shares, amounting in all to 100 shares, and showing the number of shares subscribed for by each of them.

The minutes of the directors' meeting record that "The secretary reported the present position of the company and exhibited the vendor's receipt to the shareholders for the sum of £3,333 6s. 8d. per share, making in all a payment of £333,333 6s. 8d., which was accepted by the board and initialled by the chairman." The contract of the 26th of March, 1888, was then "adopted and confirmed." Two directors and the secretary were directed to sign "the share certificates," and an appointment was made for their so doing on the following day, also for the affixing of the company's seal thereto. And the secretary was directed before issuing the share certificates to obtain from each shareholder his syndicate receipt and also to obtain his signature to the articles of association. But no allotment was made by the directors in express terms of any shares in the company.

The secretary proceeded to act on these resolutions. All the respondents received in exchange for their syndicate receipts certificates of the corresponding shares in the company which were certified as paid up to the amount of £3,333 6s. 8d. per share. And the names of the respondents were severally entered in the register as holders of their shares (described as allotted on the 22nd of May) with that amount paid. The acceptance by the respondents of the shares removes any difficulty as to Cliff's authority to apply for shares in their names or in consequence of the increase of the nominal capital to £1,000,000, or as to the directors' authority to allot them. Their lordships are disposed to think that Cliff had an implied authority to apply for shares in the names of the subscribers, but it is not necessary to decide the point.

In October, 1888, each of the shares of £5,000 was subdivided into fifty shares of £100 each with £66 13s. 4d. per share paid thereon. Calls to the amount of £16 and £17 6s. 8d. have been paid before and since the liquidation, and the demand of the liquidator is therefore for the sum originally credited on the shares, which he contends has not been paid in cash as required by the statute.

The learned judge in the court below has on these facts decided in favour of the respondents, holding, 1st, that by the directors adopting and confirming the contract of the 26th of March the company made it their own contract; 2nd, that the acceptance by the company of Cliff's receipt amounted to an acknowledgment that the money had been paid to the company in cash; 3rd, that there was on the 22nd of May a present debt due to the company, and also a present debt due by the company which could be set off one against the other in such a way as to support a plea of payment in law. For the reasons presently stated their lordships do not differ from the conclusion of the learned judge although they cannot assent to the grounds of his judgment. Their lordships do not think that the adoption and confirmation by directors of a contract made before the formation of the company by persons purporting to act on behalf of the company creates any contractual relation whatever between the company and the other party to the contract or imposes any obligation whatever on the company towards that party. They think the proposition maintained by the learned judge is opposed both to principle and authority, and that the judgment in the case of In re Johannesburg Hotel Co., 39 W. R. 260, [1891] 1 Ch. 119, referred to by the learned judge is to the contrary effect. Nor can their lordships hold that the acceptance by the directors of Cliff's receipt was an acknowledgment of payment of cash, and even if it were, the question under the statute is whether cash has been paid, not whether a receipt has been given or payment has been acknowledged.

The inaccuracy of Cliff's document and the irregularity of the directors' proceedings are patent. Cliff had not received the money of the subscribers as vendor to the company, but he or his principal, Billyard (the promoter), had received it on the terms of the prospectus—i.e. (as their lordships have already said) for the purposes of the subscribers becoming shareholders of a company which should acquire the property, and obtaining for the shareholders share certificates in exchange for their syndicate receipts. Nor could Cliff retain the subscribers' money in part payment of the purchase-money payable by the company (if they should purchase) because it was not the company's money, and would not become so until the shares were allotted and the money paid or properly credited to the company in payment up of the shares. Looking at the facts by the light of the previous documents and dealings and the relation of the parties to each other, their lordships think that Cliff's document was in substance and effect an application for and on behalf of the persons named in the schedule for shares, and that the directors acted upon and accepted that application by putting the names of those persons on the register and giving them notice they had done so, which superseded the necessity for any formal allotment. Their lordships also think that Cliff's document was an acknowledgment that he had received £333,333 6s. 8d. from the subscribers appropriated to the payment up of their shares in the company, but he was wrong in stating that he had received that sum as vendor or in claiming to retain it as part of his purchase-money as against the company who had not at that time entered into any contract with him or his principal, Billyard. Their lordships do not think that in these circumstances Cliff's acknowledgment of having received the £333,333 6s. 8d. amounted to payment in cash to the company, and consequently the directors were wrong in crediting the shareholders with the payment of that amount on their shares as on the 22nd of May. But their doing so was evidence of the amount to be paid on the shares on allotment.

However, on the 29th of September, 1888, the property was conveyed to the company by four documents of that date. The purchase-money of £512,500 was paid and discharged by the appropriation and retainer of £333,333 6s. 8d. in Cliff's hands and two mortgages dated the 1st of October, 1888, and the 22nd of October, 1888, made by the company to Billyard and Cliff for £149,166 13s. 4d. and £30,000, making together £179,166 13s. 4d. The two sums of £333,333 6s. 8d. and £179,166 13s. 4d. make together £512,500. In other words the company gave credit to Cliff and his principal Billyard for the £333,333 6s. 8d. in Cliff's or Billyard's hands specifically appropriated to the payment up of the subscribers' shares in the company, and got credit for that amount of the purchase-money. Their lordships think that this transaction was a payment in cash on the subscribers' shares on that date, which would satisfy the statute in accordance with the decisions of the English courts in Spargo's case, 21 W. R. 306, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 407, and Ferrao's case, 22 W. R. 386, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 355, and the decision of this board in Larocque v. Beauchemin, 45 W. R. 639, [1897] A. C. 358. There was a sum payable by Cliff to the company for the specific purpose of paying up the shares, and there was a like sum payable to the vendor for purchase-money, and it was not necessary that the parties should go through the form of handing the money over and receiving it back, or giving cross cheques. It is sufficient if the shareholders can show that their shares are paid up to the extent of the money in Cliff's hands although the payment was not made at the time or in the manner erroneously imputed by the directors.

One other point which was made by counsel should be mentioned. It appears that in the year 1889 certain of the subscribers on the terms of the prospectus of Syndicate No. 1, including the respondents Higgins and Hogan, claimed to participate in the enhanced price obtained by Billyard above £300,000. This claim was compromised by the payment of a sum of money and the transfer of certain shares in the company by Billyard to the objecting shareholders. A release was executed in which the members of the syndicate in some respects treated themselves as vendors to the company. Mr. Cozens-Hardy argued that this document was evidence of the true position of the parties and that they were precluded by it from saying that the moneys paid by them were paid as a deposit on the shares in the company to be registered. The release, however, was certainly not an estoppel as between the respondents parties to it and the liquidator, and their lordships do not think that they are precluded by the form of the release from showing the terms upon which they really paid their money as appearing from the receipts given and the other documents. The compromise was subsequent to the completion of the purchase and the payment up of the shares, and was in truth res inter alios acta.

Their lordships will therefore humbly advise Her

Majesty that the appeal must be dismissed. The appellants must pay the costs of it, but there will be only one set of costs between all the respondents.

JONES v. OCEAN COAL CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Master and servant — Employer's liability — Accident to workman—Amount of compensation — "Average weekly earnings" — Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), Sched. I., cl. 1 (b).

By Schedule I., clause 1 (b), of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, the compensation under the Act shall be, "(b) where total or partial incapacity for work results from the injury, a weekly payment during the incapacity after the second week not exceeding 50 per cent. of his average weekly earnings during the previous twelve months if he has been so long employed, but if not, then for any less period during which he has been in the employment of the same employer, such weekly payment not to exceed one pound."

A workman was injured by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. During the year preceding the accident the workman went out on strike, and his employment was thereupon terminated. After the strike was over he went back into the employment of the same employer under a new contract of employment, and remained there until the accident happened.

Held, that, in ascertaining the average weekly earnings for the purpose of assessing compensation, inasmuch as the employment before the strike was terminated, the period of employment subsequent to the strike could alone be considered.

Appeal from the award of the judge of the Merthyr Tydvil County Court upon proceedings to assess compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The appellant, Thomas Jones, was a workman in the employment of the respondents, the Ocean Coal Co. (Limited), on the date of the accident, the 3rd of October, 1898. The appellant had for some months prior to the 1st of April, 1898, including the month of October, 1897, worked for the respondents under an agreement of the 1st of January, 1892. This agreement was terminated by six months' notice given by the men under a clause to that effect in the agreement, and the individual contracts between the employers and workmen were terminated by notice given by the employers under another clause in the agreement, which notice expired on the 31st of March, 1898. The South Wales strike or lock-out then intervened, and lasted from the 1st of April, 1898, to the 5th of September, 1898. The appellant resumed employment with the respondents on the 12th of September, 1898, under a new contract containing new terms, and signed the contract book. The appellant having been injured by an accident on the 3rd of October, 1898, arising out of and in the course of his employment, the respondents contended that in order to ascertain the appellant's average weekly earnings the two periods of employment before and after the strike during the twelve months preceding the accident must be taken together, upon which basis the award would be 8s. 6d. a week. The appellant contended that the period from the 12th of September, 1898, to the date of the accident should be taken, upon which basis the award would be 15s. 9d. a week.

The county court judge adopted the respondents' contention, and assessed the compensation at 8s. 6d. a week.

Cripps, Q.C., and W. D. Benson, for the appellant.—Schedule I., clause 1 (b), contemplates continuous employment. The word "period" is in the singular, and the twelve months' period means a period of twelve months' continuous or consecutive employment, and the less period also means a period of continuous or consecutive employment. In the present case the employment before the strike was terminated, and a new employment on new terms began after the strike. The appellant might have got employment elsewhere, and need not have returned to the respondents' employment. It was not a mere break in the employment caused by the workman taking a holiday, as in Keast v. Barrow Hematite Co., 15 Times L. R. 141. The average weekly earnings must therefore be taken during the period from the 12th of September to the 3rd of October, 1898.

They also referred to Price v. Marsden & Sons, ante p. 274, [1899] 1 Q. B. 493.

Ruegg, Q.C., and Arthur Lewis, for the respondents.—If the employment has been with the same employer during the twelve months preceding the accident though the workman may have ceased to work during part of that period, the number of weeks during which he has been at work during that period must be the factor for arriving at the average weekly earnings. The average weekly earnings are not to be calculated upon a small period of exceptional earnings. The appellant here always intended to resume employment with the respondents when the strike was over and was not engaged during the strike in any other employment. The county court judge was therefore right.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This case raises a short point upon Schedule I., clause 1 (b), of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. Prior to the 1st of April, 1898, the appellant was in the employment of the respondents under the terms of an agreement of the 1st of January, 1892. The county court judge has found as a fact that this agreement was terminated by six months' notice given by the men, and the individual contracts between the employers and workmen were terminated by notice given by the employers, which notice expired on the 31st of March, 1898. In face of that finding we cannot hold that there was a continuous employment from the 3rd of October, 1897, to the 3rd of October, 1898. When the men went out on strike, the appellant and the other men need not have come back to the same employers again, but might have got other employment. The employment was therefore terminated on the 31st of March, 1898, and the appellant remained out on strike until the 5th of September, 1898, and on the 12th of September was taken back again into the respondents' employment under a new contract containing new terms. The accident happened on the 3rd of October following. The amount of compensation payable depends upon Schedule I., clause 1 (b). In my judgment, "during the previous twelve months" means a continuous employment during that period. So also with regard to the other limb of the clause, "for any less period during which he has been in the employment of the same employer," the employment must be continuous. The appellant has not been in the employment of the respondents continuously from the 3rd of October, 1897, to the 3rd of October, 1898, but only from the 12th of September to the 3rd of October, 1898, and this latter is the period over which the average weekly earnings are to be taken. The appeal must, therefore, be allowed, and the award must be amended by inserting 15s. 9d. for 8s. 6d.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree. The facts of this case make the case easy of decision. I do not know whether, in what I am going to say upon the general construction of the enactment, I may or may not take a view somewhat different from that of my brother A. L. Smith. It seems to me to be a difficult Act to construe, and as I have not until the present sittings been called upon to construe the Act, and as my brother has been a party to all the decisions upon it from the beginning, I should be sorry to differ from him, more especially as I should regret if there were any breach in the continuity of those decisions. I should like first of all to say a few words upon the facts as I understand them. The appellant was employed at the commencement of the strike under an agreement of the 1st of January, 1892, which, as I understand it, contained the general terms of the contract agreed upon between the masters and men, such as the rate of wages, and that agreement could be put an end to by a six months' notice. I do not, however, understand that the agreement of the 1st of January, 1892, governed the actual employment, which was a weekly or a monthly employment. The effect of giving the six months' notice was that the agreement came to an end, but I do not understand that a six months' notice was necessary to determine the employment of the individual workmen. Now, upon the facts before us there was a period during the twelve months preceding the date of the accident when the appellant did not choose—to my mind it is immaterial whether it arose from a strike or from some other cause—to work for the respondents. After that period was over the appellant came back and again entered into the respondents' employment under a new contract, and a few weeks afterwards the accident happened. The question before us is whether the average weekly earnings are to be calculated during the period of employment subsequent to the 12th of September, 1898, or whether the two periods of employment during the previous twelve months before and after the strike are to be taken together so as to arrive at the average weekly earnings. We have arrived at the conclusion that the last period of employment from the 12th of September to the date of the accident is to be treated as the period during which the average weekly earnings are to be ascertained.

I proceed now to state the reasons which have induced me to arrive at that conclusion. I understand Schedule I., clause 1 (b), to mean that, whether one is dealing with a period of twelve months or a less period, in either case the employment must be a continuous employment with the same employer. The employment, however, need not, in my opinion, be a continuous employment without any break in point of time. In nearly every employment there must be some break in time. The question is whether the relation of master and servant substantially existed during the whole period, whether the period be twelve months or less. If the state of work were such that the master could only give three days' employment in each week to his men, it would still be true to say that the employment was continuous during the period because the relation of master and servant existed during the whole time. The question is whether there has been any break in that relation. To answer that question, one must test it thus: Are the facts such that if called upon the workman is willing to work, and if the workman asks for work the employer, if he has it to give, is willing to give it. If there is a time during which that cannot be affirmed, the relation of master and servant has not during that time existed. The relation will in such a case have been broken. The present does not seem to me a case where for a time there was no work for the men to do, but during a certain time the relation of master and servant ceased, because the employers were not willing to employ the men and the men were not willing to work. The conclusion, therefore, at which I have arrived is that in ascertaining the appellant's average weekly earnings only that period of employment subsequent to the strike can be taken into consideration, because when the strike commenced the relation of master and servant came to an end.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree with the view expressed by A. L. Smith, L.J., with regard to the construction of clause 1 (b) of Schedule I. I will first take that part of the clause which deals with the period of twelve months, if the workman has been so long employed. It seems to me to be reasonably clear that the employment therein referred to means a substantially consecutive or continuous employment—that is to say, the workman must have been in a substantial sense in the employment of the same employer for the period of twelve months. For instance, if at the commencement of the twelve months the workman had worked for a time for an employer, and had then gone for a time into the employment of another employer, and had towards the end of the period returned to his former employer, the employment could not be said to have been continuous during the twelve months. Now I come to the second part of the clause, which deals with employment for any less period during which the workman has been in the employment of the same employer. In my opinion that also means a period during which the workman has been substantially in the continuous employment of the same employer up to the time of the accident. The word "period" is used in the singular. One is not to go back to a former period of employment which has been put an end to and add it to the period of employment immediately preceding the accident. This second part of the clause means that if the workman has not been in substantially the same consecutive employment for the twelve months preceding the accident, then the average weekly earnings must be calculated upon the period less than twelve months during which he has been in substantially the same consecutive employment. I think that the word "substantially" is important. I agree with my brother Vaughan Williams in regard to that. If, for instance, holidays intervened, the employment would not thereby cease to be substantially consecutive. If, again, the workman could not for some time get work from his employer on account of the slackness of trade, though willing to work, I should not let that circumstance weigh with me in deciding whether the employment was or was not consecutive. In the present case, during the strike the appellant was in no sense in the employment of the respondents.

HALL v. SNOWDON, HUBBARD, & CO. (No. 2). (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accidental injuries—Factory—Wharf—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7, sub-section 2—Factory and Workshop Act, 1878 (41 Vict. c. 16), s. 68—Factory and Workshop Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 37), ss. 18, 23.

A workman was killed by an accident which happened in a public street just outside his employers' wharf, while he was leading a horse and cart out of the wharf in the course of his employment. The wharf was a simple yard by the side of a canal, and no machinery of any kind was used on it.

Held, that the wharf was not a factory within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, for it did not come within the definition of "factory" in section 7, sub-section 2, as being a wharf to which any provision of the Factory Acts was applied by the Factory Act, 1895.

The provisions of section 18 of the Factory Act, 1895, with respect to accidents were not applied to it by section 23 of that Act, for no accident had occurred on the wharf; neither were the provisions of section 68 of the Factory Act, 1878, with respect to the powers of inspectors thereby applied to it.

Appeal from the decision of the judge of the Bloomsbury County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant was the sole dependant of Charles Hall, who had met with his death in consequence of accidental injuries while in the employment of Snowden, Hubbard, & Co. The employers were contractors, and were the occupiers of a wharf called Platt's Wharf abutting on the Regent's Canal, which they used for the purpose of loading liquid mud and road sweepings into barges lying in the canal. The wharf was simply a yard, and no machinery of any kind was used on it. Access to the wharf was obtained from the King's-road through a gateway. Opposite the gateway on the other side of the King's-road was one of the entrances to the St. Pancras Electric Lighting Station. At the time of the accident another firm of contractors, Read Brothers, were engaged in laying down water pipes between the canal and the electric lighting station, and these pipes passed through the gateway and across the wharf.

Snowden, Hubbard, & Co. had entered into a contract with Read Brothers to remove the loose earth which was dug up in the course of making the trench in which the pipes were laid. The deceased, who was a carter, was engaged in the work of removing this earth. He had loaded one of his employers' carts with earth on the wharf, and was leading the horse and cart through the gateway into the King's-road, and was himself walking backwards. A trolly laden with water pipes was standing in the road, but the deceased, not observing this, continued walking backwards and came against the pipes, and was crushed and killed.

The county court judge held that the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment of the deceased, but that Platt's Wharf was not a factory within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act. He accordingly decided that the applicant was not entitled to compensation.

The applicant appealed.

C. A. Cripps, Q.C., and Bailhache, for the appellant.—This wharf is a factory within the meaning of the Act. By section 7, sub-section 2, "In this Act 'factory' has the same meaning as in the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1878 to 1891, and also includes any dock, wharf, quay, warehouse, machinery, or plant to which any provision of the Factory Acts is applied by the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895." This leads us back to section 23, sub-section 1, of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, which enacts as follows: "The following provisions, namely: (i.) Section eighty-two of the principal Act; (ii.) the provisions of the Factory Acts with respect to accidents; (iii.) section sixty-eight of the principal Act with respect to the powers of inspectors; (iv.) sections eight to twelve of the Act of 1891 with respect to special rules for dangerous employments; and (v.) the provisions of this Act with respect to the power to make orders as to dangerous machines shall have effect as if—(a) every dock, wharf, quay, and warehouse, and, so far as relates to the process of loading or unloading therefrom or thereto, all machinery and plant used in that process . . . were included in the word factory." The provisions contained in sub-headings (i.), (iv.), and (v.) would not apply to any wharf on which there was no machinery and on which no dangerous employment was carried on. But the provisions contained in sub-headings (ii.) and (iii.) are just as applicable to an ordinary wharf as to a wharf to which dangerous machinery is attached. This wharf, therefore, is a wharf to which some of the provisions of the Factory Acts are applied by section 23 of the Act of 1895, and it is consequently a factory within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act. Secondly, on the true construction of section 7, sub-section 2, the words "to which any provision of the Factory Acts is applied by the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895," refer only to "machinery or plant," and the words "any dock" include every dock.

Bray, Q.C., and Herbert Smith, for the respondent.—This wharf is not a factory within the meaning of the Act. Section 7, sub-section 2, does not make "factory" include every wharf, but only certain wharves—viz., any wharf to which any provision of the Factory Act is applied by the Factory Act, 1895. It is said that by section 23 of the Factory Act, 1895, the provisions of the Factory Acts with respect to accidents are made to apply to every wharf. The provisions with respect to accidents are now to be found in section 18 of the Act of 1895, and that section only deals with the case of an accident occurring "in a factory or workshop;" it does not extend to the case of an accident occurring in or about a factory or workshop. In this case the accident did not happen on the wharf, but just outside the wharf. Therefore it cannot be said that this is a wharf to which the provisions of the Factory Act with respect to accidents are applied. Neither is section 68 of the principal Act with respect to the powers of inspectors applicable to this wharf. It is absurd to suppose that an inspector could enter and examine this wharf under that section.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The county court judge held that this wharf was not a factory within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act. It was an ordinary wharf by the side of a canal, used for the purpose of loading barges. No machinery of any sort was used on it. The deceased met with his death not on the wharf but just outside it, as he was going from the wharf into the street. If the wharf was a factory, and if we had to determine the question whether the accident could rightly be said to have happened "on or in or about" the wharf, I should be inclined to think that the place where the accident happened was sufficiently contiguous to the wharf to bring the case within the Act. But we need not determine that question. The question is, Was the wharf a factory within the meaning of the Act? Section 7, sub-section 2, gives a definition of "factory," and makes it include "any dock, wharf, quay, warehouse, machinery, or plant, to which any provision of the Factory Acts is applied by the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895." I think that the words "to which any provision, &c.," apply to the whole budget of words that go before, and not merely to machinery and plant. This wharf was not a factory per se, and it can only be brought within the meaning of "factory" by showing that some of the provisions of the Factory Acts are applied to it by the Factory Act, 1895. It is said that provisions with regard to two matters are made applicable to it by section 23 of the Factory Act, 1895. In the first place it is said that the provisions of section 18 of the Act of 1895 with regard to accidents are so made applicable to it. I think that a good answer was given to this—viz., that the provisions of that section only come into operation when an accident has occurred in a factory. Here no accident happened on the wharf. Then it is said that section 68 of the Act of 1878, which deals with the powers of inspectors, is made applicable to this wharf. I cannot see that that section has any application to such a place as this wharf. I therefore think that the county court judge was right.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Application for a new trial or judgment in two actions tried together before Bigham, J., and a jury.

The actions were brought against two underwriters at Lloyd's on a contract whereby they had guaranteed the solvency of Sir Frederick Seager Hunt to the extent of a promissory note for £15,000 drawn by Major-General Barwell in favour of the plaintiff, payment of which had been guaranteed by Sir Frederick Seager Hunt. The circumstances under which the contract was underwritten are set out in the judgment of A. L. Smith, L.J. The promissory note was not paid at maturity, and Sir Frederick Seager Hunt had been obliged to call a meeting of his creditors.

The defence was that the contract was a policy of insurance, and that the defendants had been induced to subscribe it by misrepresentations of fact and concealment of material facts.

At the trial the following questions were left by the learned judge to the jury: (1) Was the guarantee transaction one of exceptional risk? (2) Did the plaintiff and those acting for her know it to be so? (3) Did the conduct of the plaintiff amount to a representation that it was not a transaction of exceptional risk? (4) Did the defendants in taking the risk act upon that representation? The jury answered the first question in the negative. The fourth question was also put to them, and they answered that, assuming any representation to have been made, the defendants relied both on that representation and on information which they themselves procured from a banker.

Bigham, J., directed judgment to be entered for the plaintiff.

The defendants applied for a new trial or judgment. The main question argued was whether the contract sued upon was one to which the doctrine of concealment applied.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 25.—A. L. SMITH, L.J., read the following judgment: This is an action against underwriters at Lloyd's to recover the sum of £15,000 underwritten by them, and they seek to have a verdict which has passed against them set aside and judgment entered for them, or a new trial, on the ground of misdirection and that the verdict was against the evidence. As, for the reasons I am about to give, the case will have to be retried, I will touch as lightly as possible upon the undisputed facts so as not to prejudice the re-trial, but I must refer to some of the facts in order that I may explain the reason why I have arrived at the conclusion which I have. It will be sufficient to state that it appears from the undisputed evidence that in the month of December, 1897, the plaintiff, who is a married lady, advanced by way of loan to Major-General Barwell the sum of £12,375 in cash, taking from him his promissory note at six months for £15,000, and that at this time the credit of the major-general was such that she not only charged him between 39 and 40 per cent. interest for the loan, but in addition thereto she took the guarantee of Sir F Seager Hunt to secure its repayment. This loan was composed of the £12,375 cash and £2,625 interest, making £15,000 in all. Not content with this promissory note of the major-general and the guarantee of Sir F. Seager Hunt (in neither of which was the amount of interest she was charging mentioned), the plaintiff proceeded to insure with underwriters at Lloyd's the solvency of Sir F. Seager Hunt to the extent of £15,000. For this purpose she employed a Mr. Lion to act on her behalf and to get a policy effected for her at Lloyd's undertaking the risk. She told him nothing as to the interest she was charging for the loan to the major-general, nor as to the way the £15,000 was made up. Mr. Lion accordingly saw some leading underwriters upon the matter, and one thing he said to them—and this is undisputed—was that Sir F. Seager Hunt was a man of wealth, and that the money was being advanced by a lady who was a friend of his, and this he no doubt honestly believed, though as a matter of fact upon the 11th of March, 1898, about three months after the policy was effected, Sir F. Seager Hunt called his creditors together and failed for a very large sum of money. Now, this case must be dealt with as if Mrs. Seaton had gone herself direct to the underwriters at Lloyd's to effect this insurance knowing right well the way the £15,000 was arrived at, and that, with the additional security of Sir F. Seager Hunt's guarantee, she would only lend money to the major-general at just under 40 per cent., and had herself stated to the underwriters what Mr. Lion stated to them. Upon these facts, and they are not in dispute, it appears to me that the following, amongst other questions, certainly ought to have been left to the jury—viz., whether, taking into account the statement made to the underwriters, it was a concealment of a material fact not to disclose to them the circumstances in which the loan to the major-general had been made and the rate of interest which was demanded and obtained. That these facts were known to the assured and not to the underwriters is beyond dispute. It is said on behalf of the plaintiff that the document sued on is not a policy of insurance, but a guarantee, and that different considerations arise, and that the non-disclosure of material facts forms no defence to an action upon a guarantee, even although it be a guarantee of the kind contained in the document now in suit. In the view I take of this case I do not propose to discuss this point which was so much debated at the bar, though I do not desire to be thought as agreeing to the proposition, for I have no doubt that the document taken from the underwriters is a policy of insurance, and that the principles applying to all policies of insurance apply to the present case. The parties to the contract (for they are many) have throughout dealt inter se as though the document was a policy of insurance. Moreover, it guarantees no debt, for it only covers the risk of Sir F. Seager Hunt becoming insolvent. Although, if neither the major-general nor Sir F. Seager Hunt repaid the loan, that would not affect the underwriters unless the latter became insolvent, yet the circumstances attending the loan to the major-general might well be material for the underwriters to know, for if the major-general or Sir F. Seager Hunt was a person likely to repay, and did repay, the loan, that would end the matter so far as the underwriters' liability was concerned. In form, too, the document is that of a policy of insurance, and the cases of Dane v. Mortgage Insurance Corporation, 42 W. R. 227, [1894] 1 Q. B. 54, and Finlay v. Mexican Investment Corporation, [1897] 1 Q. B. 517, 45 W. R. Dig. 76, show that it is so. Now, the plaintiff by her agent applied direct to the underwriters at Lloyd's to underwrite the risk she desired to cover, and the underwriters in the ordinary course first initialled a slip and then followed it up by the policy, the underwriters thereby accepting the separate risks of their respective lines in consideration of the premiums paid by the plaintiff. In the circumstances it was argued on behalf of the plaintiff that, though this might be a policy of insurance, yet it was not a marine, fire, or life policy, and that it is only in actions upon such policies that the defence of concealment of a material fact avails an underwriter. I do not understand the validity of this argument, or why, when a person insures his ship, or his house, or his life, he should be bound to disclose material facts of which he is cognizant and the underwriter is not, and yet not be bound to disclose such facts when an underwriter is asked to take a risk upon, say, the soundness of a racehorse; and indeed from what Lord Cranworth said in Dalglish v. Jarvie, 2 Mac. & G., 231, at p. 243, and Sir George Jessel in London Assurance v. Mansel, 27 W. R. 444, 11 Ch. D. 363, there does not appear to be any such distinction as is now contended for. The well-known case of Carter v. Boehm, 3 Burr. 1905, is very instructive upon this matter. The question which was left in the present case by the learned judge to the jury—viz., was the guaranteed transaction one of exceptional risk—appears to me not to adequately cover the case, and it apparently was framed upon the assumption that the document was a guarantee, not a policy of insurance, and is taken from what is to be found in the case of Hamilton v. Watson, 12 Cl. & F. 109. If the document were a guarantee and not a policy of insurance, I should have to discuss the question as to whether, upon such a guarantee as this, non-disclosure of material facts may not afford a defence to a surety, but, however that may be, there still would remain the objection to the direction taken by the defendants' counsel, that the learned judge did not expound to the jury the meaning of the term "exceptional risk." If the term means a risk not often accepted, and the jury had answered as they did, "No," I can understand the answer; but if it means a risk which in the circumstances in which it was tendered to the underwriters was exceptional in the sense that it in fact differed materially from what the underwriters on the facts disclosed might naturally suppose it to be, and the jury said "No," that is an answer which upon the facts appears to me to require reconsideration. I have now dealt with this case sufficiently to show why I think that it must go down for a new trial. I cannot enter judgment for the defendant, as I have been invited to do; for whether the non-disclosure of the circumstances attending the loan to the major-general was material or not to the risk underwritten is a question of fact which a jury must determine, and not of law; and, moreover, as to this there must be taken into consideration by the jury what the underwriters did when they applied to Mr. Shand, of Parr's Bank, for information as to what he knew of Sir F. Seager Hunt's paper, as it is called, being afloat, and also the materiality of the loan not having been made at the time the policy was effected, if a representation to that effect were proved. In my opinion the questions which should be left to the jury should embrace the following considerations: Whether, taking what was stated with what was left unstated, there was a concealment designed or undesigned varying materially the risk understood to be run; whether there was any misstatement of a material fact, and, if so, were the defendants influenced by such misstatement in underwriting the policy. The costs of the first trial must abide the event of the second trial; and as the defendants did not protest, but rather acquiesced in the question being left to the jury by the learned judge in the way it was, I think that the costs of this appeal should also abide the result of the second trial.

ROMER, L.J., read the following judgment: I agree that in this case there should be a new trial. Upon the special circumstances I do not think it necessary to add anything to what has been said by A. L. Smith, L.J. But I desire to make some remarks upon the question of general importance raised in this case with reference to the contract of insurance or guarantee. There are some contracts in which our courts of law and equity require what is called uberrima fides to be shown by the person obtaining them; and as that phrase is short and convenient I will continue to use it. Of these, ordinary contracts of marine, fire, and life insurance are examples, and in each of them the person desiring to be insured must, in setting forth the risk to be insured against, not conceal any material fact affecting the risk known to him. On the other hand, ordinary contracts of guarantee are not amongst those requiring uberrima fides on the part of the creditor towards the surety; and mere non-communication to the surety by the creditor of facts known to him affecting the risk to be undertaken by the surety will not vitiate the contract, unless there be fraud or misrepresentation, and misrepresentation undoubtedly might be made by concealment. But the difference between these two classes of contract does not depend upon any essential difference between the word "insurance" and the word "guarantee." There is no magic in the use of those words. The words, to a great extent, have the same meaning and effect; and many contracts, like the one in the case now before us, may with equal propriety be called contracts of insurance or contracts of guarantee. Whether the contract be one requiring uberrima fides or not, must depend upon its substantial character and how it came to be effected. There is no hard-and-fast line to be drawn between contracts of insurance and contracts of guarantee for the purpose for which I am now considering them; and certainly the rule as to contracts of insurance is not limited, as contended, to the three forms of marine, life, and fire insurance: see the observations of Jessel, M.R., in London Assurance v. Mansel. Now, when contracts of insurance are considered it will be seen that, speaking generally, they have in common several features in their character and the way they are effected, which distinguish them from ordinary contracts of guarantee. Contracts of insurance are generally matters of speculation, where the person desiring to be insured has means of knowledge as to the risk, and the insurer has not the means or not the same means. The insured generally puts the risk before the insurer as a business transaction, and the insurer on the risk stated fixes a proper price to remunerate him for the risk to be undertaken; and the insurer engages to pay the loss incurred by the insured in the event of certain specified contingencies occurring. Now, on the other hand, in general, contracts of guarantee are between persons who occupy, or ultimately assume, the positions of creditor, debtor, and surety, and thereby the surety becomes bound to pay the debt or make good the default of the debtor. In general, the creditor does not himself go to the surety, or represent or explain to the surety the risk to be run. The surety often takes the position from motives of friendship to the debtor, and generally not as the result of any direct bargaining between him and the creditor, or in consideration of any remuneration passing to him from the creditor. The risk undertaken is generally known to the surety, and the circumstances generally point to the view that as between the creditor and surety it was contemplated and intended that the surety should take upon himself to ascertain exactly what risk he was taking upon himself. In all the reported cases of guarantees that I have been able to find in which it has been held that the party guaranteed owed no duty to the guarantor as to disclosure of material facts, the contracts, when examined, are found to have in substance, though, of course, not in every detail, the characteristics which distinguish contracts of guarantee from contracts of insurance, as above stated by me. Applying the above considerations to the contract in the case before us, it appears to me that the contract is one which required uberrima fides on the part of the insured.

Chan. Div. Stirling, J. — April 14, 21.

COOTE v. FORD. (a.)

Practice — Payment into court — Denial of liability — Acceptance by plaintiff — Admission — R. S. C., ord. 22, rr. 1, 5, 6, 7.

The object of payment into court, where all liability is denied, is to enable a defendant to deny a plaintiff's right to sue, yet to offer a sum as the price of peace and for the prevention of further litigation. Such an offer is not an admission of the plaintiff's title, and cannot be converted into such by the plaintiff accepting the sum paid in.

If the entire claim or cause of action is satisfied by payment into court, it would seem that the proceedings are not available for a plea of res judicata, but if either party were to attempt to reopen the matter, the appropriate defence of the other would be an application to the court to stay proceedings either under rule 6 of order 22 or as an abuse of the process of the court.

This was a motion to discharge an order made in chambers in the above action.

The action was brought by the plaintiff against nine defendants for trespass.

The statement of claim, paragraph 1, stated the title of the plaintiff to a close of land called Martin Down, part of the waste of the manor of Martin. It then continued:

"(2) On the 1st of September, 1898, the defendants wrongfully broke and entered the said close or piece of land in pursuit of game and rabbits, and did there kill game and rabbits.

(3) The defendants respectively wrongfully claimed to be entitled to enter upon the said close or piece of land and there to pursue and kill game and rabbits, and they respectively still persist in the said claim, and threaten and intend to repeat the acts complained of."

The plaintiff claimed damages and an injunction.

Paragraph 1 of the defence admitted the plaintiff's title to the land in question.

"(2) The copyholders of the said manor in right of their respective tenements are, by the custom of the manor, entitled to the right and privileges for themselves and their tenants in occupation of the said tenements to kill and take rabbits on and from the said lands by themselves or their servants, and their tenants or the servants of such tenants. Alternatively the tenants of copyhold tenements for the time being have the said right and privilege by virtue of their tenancy.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(3) The said copyholders and their tenants, and the respective predecessors in title of the said copyholders in their respective tenements, have exercised and enjoyed the right and privileges aforesaid from time immemorial, and also for the respective periods of thirty and sixty years without interruption before the commencement of this action."

The defence went on to allege that two of the defendants were tenants of copyholders, and two others servants of tenants of copyholders. Four of the defendants went on the land and killed rabbits, two as tenants of copyholders and two as servants of tenants of copyholders. All other allegations of the statement of claim were denied, and then by paragraph 7 it was pleaded that, "denying liability, each of the defendants brings into court the sum of 1s. and says that the same is sufficient to satisfy his liability to the plaintiff (if any) in respect of the matters complained of." Then the two defendants who were tenants of copyholders by a counterclaim repeated paragraphs 2 and 3 of the defence and asked for a declaration that they had in respect of their occupation of their copyhold tenements the rights and privileges in the said paragraph 2 mentioned, and an injunction.

The sum of 9s. was paid into court, and was taken out by the plaintiff, who gave notice, dated the 22nd of February, 1899, that he accepted the sum paid in satisfaction "of the claim in respect of which it is paid in." Subsequently an application was made in chambers to strike out the references in the counterclaim to paragraphs 2 and 3 of the defence on the ground that "they raise again upon the counterclaim matters already disposed of upon the claim."

The application was refused in chambers, and the present motion was made.

Butcher, Q.C., and Terrell, for the motion.—Our contention is that the payment into court by the defendants and acceptance by the plaintiff, amount to an admission of the plaintiff's right. [STIRLING, J.—The question is whether your entire claim and cause of action is satisfied?] We submit that it is.

They referred to Wheeler v. United Telephone Co., 33 W. R. 295, 13 Q. B. D. 597, and Goutard v. Carr, 32 W. R. 242 (13 Q. B. D. 598, in note).

Duke, Q.C., and D. M. Kerly, contra.—Payment into court can only be in respect of debt or damages. The real question is whether payment into court if accepted by a plaintiff amounts to a estoppel by way of record.

He referred to Steavenson v. Corporation of Berwick, 1 Q. B. 154; Hennell v. Davies, 41 W. R. 284, [1893] 1 Q. B. 367; Kingham v. Robins 5 M. & W. 94. [STIRLING, J., referred to Emden v. Carte, 30 W. R. 17, 19 Ch. D. 311.]

Butcher, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 21.—STIRLING, J., stated the facts and continued: The point which I have to decide is the effect of the acceptance of a sum paid into court with a denial of liability. The practice of pleading a payment into court with a denial of liability is of recent origin. It first arose under order 30 of the orders in the schedule to the Judicature Act, 1875. That order did not expressly permit a payment into court where there was a denial of liability, but the practice was established by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Berdan v. Greenwood, 26 W. R. 902, 3 Ex. D. 251. The grounds on which it was allowed are to be found at pp. 257 and 259 of the judgment delivered by Thesiger, L.J. [His lordship read the judgment, and continued:] It is admitted by the passage I have read, and was subsequently remarked that there is a want of logical consistency in allowing a defendant to say in one and the same breath that the plaintiff has no claim and yet to offer a sum in satisfaction.

In truth the practice is a concession to practical convenience at the expense of logic, and in such circumstances difficulties may easily arise as to the effect of it. In endeavouring to solve such difficulties recourse must be had to the rules on the subject, to be found in order 22 of the orders of 1883, which vary from those of 1875. Rule 1 shows that it only applies to actions to recover a debt or damages. If there is no denial of liability the rule expressly provides that the payment into court "shall be taken to admit the claim or cause of action in respect of which the payment is made." These words are new, and are not found in the rule of 1875. In such a case, under rule 5, the money in court may on his request be paid out to the plaintiff, unless the court otherwise orders. If the liability of the defendant is denied, then the payment into court is subject to rule 6, of which clause (a) is that which is material in the present case. This clause is not found in the rules of 1875. The consequence of acceptance is that "all future proceedings in respect of such claim or cause of action" (i.e., the claim or cause of action in respect of which the payment into court has been made) "except as to costs shall be stayed." It is to be observed that this provision differs very materially from that of rule 1 as to the effect of a payment into court without denial of liability. Under rule 1, a defendant making the payment is to be taken to admit the claim and cause of action; under rule 6 there is nothing said about any admission by the defendant, but it is provided that upon acceptance by the plaintiff all further proceedings in respect of the claim or cause of action are to be stayed, except as regards costs. Under rule 7, if the entire claim or cause of action is satisfied the plaintiff may proceed to tax his costs, and in case of non-payment of the costs for forty-eight hours after taxation may sign judgment for the costs so taxed. It is, therefore, clear that the defendant by promptly paying the costs may prevent judgment against him appearing on the record. I think the adoption of the course pointed out in this part of the rules is not intended to lead to any adjudication by the court, but on the contrary to prevent the necessity of any such adjudication. Under these circumstances I do not see how any such proceedings could ever be available as a ground for a plea of res judicata. If either party were to attempt to reopen the matter, the appropriate defence of the other would seem to be not a plea of res judicata, but an application to the court to stay proceedings either under the rule or as being an abuse of the process of the court; though I am not to be understood as saying that such a point could not be raised by a defence.

This being the general nature of the rules, how do they apply to the present case? The first point to be determined is in respect of what claim or cause of action the payment into court was made. The language of the defence in respect of the matter complained of is somewhat vague; but remembering that the payment can only be made in respect of damages, it seems to me that the matters referred to are those stated in paragraph 2 of the statement of claim. It is impossible, regard being had to the other allegations of the defence, to treat the payment in as intended to be a satisfaction of those alleged in paragraph 3, in respect of which the pleadings disclose the existence of a continuing cause of action. In support of that view I refer to Moon v. Dickinson, 38 W. R. 278, 63 L. T. Rep. 371.

It follows that the entire cause of action is not satisfied. There is nothing to prevent the plaintiff from proceeding to trial of his action as regards the matters alleged in paragraph 3 of the statement of claim. This being so, is the plaintiff prejudiced and embarrassed? He alleges that he is, because he says the counterclaim raises afresh matters disposed of on the claim. This contention is based on the ground that, having accepted the money paid into court, the plaintiff is entitled to treat the payment as an admission by the counterclaiming defendants that the plaintiff had a good cause of action as regards the matters complained of in paragraph 2 of the statement of claim, and consequently that the rights claimed by paragraphs 2 and 3 of the defence do not exist.

I do not think that the plaintiff is entitled to treat the payment into court as an admission of his title. The rules do not provide that the defendants should be deemed to have made any such admission: they appear to me studiously to avoid imposing any such obligation. The object of the rule is, in the language of Thesiger, L.J., to enable a defendant to deny a person's right to sue, yet to offer a sum as the price of peace, and for the prevention of further litigation. This object would be defeated by a provision that acceptance of the offer should be deemed to convert it into an admission of the right. All that can fairly be inferred is that as regards the matters complained of in paragraph 2 of the statement of claim both parties are willing that no further litigation should take place, but that at the same time the plaintiff insists on his right to relief in respect of the matters complained of in paragraph 3, while the defendants insist by way of defence on the right pleaded, and seek to establish that right by their counterclaim.

If, however, I am wrong in this, and the defendants are to be treated as having made some admission, I do not think it goes to the extent contended for by the plaintiff. It appears to me that all that ought to be inferred would be an admission, not that the right on which the defendants rely by way of justification is non-existent, but that notwithstanding its existence it for some reason fails to protect them on the particular occasion referred to in paragraph 2 of the claim. This may perfectly well be in many ways; for example, the right pleaded is only available for copyholders and their tenants and the servants of such. Five of the nine defendants are not shown to be such; presumably, therefore, they had no right to do what they are alleged to have done, but they may have been brought on the lands by the other defendants, who may be answerable for their acts. Or again, some of the acts complained of may turn out to have been done on land which is not subject to the rights of the copyholders. I do not think it necessary to discuss minutely the cases cited, because they all turned on the order of 1875, which does not contain the provisions found in those of 1883 on which I base my decision.

The result of what has been done is, in my opinion, that the matters stated in paragraph 2 of the claim have been taken out of the litigation and that between the parties peace with regard to them must prevail, but that this result has been attained in such a way that the plaintiff is not entitled to rely on it as an admission which affects that portion of the litigation which has not been put an end to—viz., the cause of action stated in paragragh 3 of the statement of claim and the rights stated in paragraphs 2 and 3 of the defence, and referred to in the counterclaim. In my judgment, therefore, the motion fails and must be refused.

I desire, however, to point out that my opinion turns upon the construction which I have placed on paragraph 7 of the defence, and which I understand to be the construction intended to be placed on it by the defendants. This, however, is less precise than could be desired, and I think that it should be amended or treated as amended by expressly limiting its operation to matters stated in paragraph 2 of the claim. If the plaintiff has been misled, then I think he ought to have an opportunity of replacing the money in court and withdrawing his notice. I also think that it would be desirable to get rid of the defendants other than those who counterclaim.

In re G. (INFANTS) (In Camerâ). (a.)

Infants—Direction to mother to maintain, educate, and bring up — Immoral home — Adultery of mother— Control of court.

A testator bequeathed the residue of his estate to his trustees upon trust to pay the income to his wife during her widowhood, "she maintaining, educating, and bringing up" unmarried infant sons and unmarried daughters.

The widow, while duly maintaining and educating the infant children, lived in adultery with a married man in the home which she provided for them.

Held, that the widow was not properly performing the obligation imposed upon her, and that, in the circumstances, the court had power to administer the fund.

Summons.

By his will a testator gave the residue of his estate to his trustees in trust for conversion and investment, with provision for a reserve fund to meet loss, and subject thereto "upon trust to pay the annual income of my trust estate to my said wife during her life if she shall so long continue my widow, she maintaining, educating, and bringing up such of my children as shall be under the age of twenty-one years and shall not have been married, and also maintaining such of my daughters as, being of the age of twenty-one years, shall not be or have been married." Subject thereto the trust estate was to be held in trust for the sons who attained the age of twenty-one years and the daughters who attained that age or married as tenants in common.

The testator appointed his said wife, two of his brothers, and his eldest son (on attaining twenty-one) executors and trustees of his will. The testator died on the 26th of August, 1894, leaving seven children, aged, at the date of the summons, 20, 19, 17, 16, 14, 11, and 7 years respectively. The said will was duly proved. The widow, while duly maintaining and educating the children, was living in adultery with a married man in the home she provided for them.

On the 14th of January, 1899, the brother trustees and the five younger children, by those trustees as their next friends, took out the present summons against the widow and the two elder children, asking (inter alia) for the removal of the mother from the office of guardian of the five younger children and the appointment of a proper guardian, or alternatively the appointment of a joint guardian, proper provisions for custody, liberty to the brother trustees to retain out of income and apply such sum as the court should allow for the maintenance and education of the five younger children, and so far as necessary administration of the trusts of the will. The three elder children were fully aware of all the circumstances, and the two elder children were strongly opposed to any interference with their home. All the children, except the third eldest—a son, who was not allowed to live at home—were on extremely affectionate terms with their mother and her paramour, the latter of whom they treated as their step-father.

The judge desired, before making any order, that the question of his power to deal with the fund, which produced about £417 a year net, should be argued.

Martelli, for the plaintiffs.—The will clearly imposes on the widow a trust which the court can administer: In re Booth, Booth v. Booth, 42 W. R. 613, [1894] 2 Ch. 282; Castle v. Castle, 5 W. R. 643, 1 De G. & J. 352, which also was a case of misconduct; and Longmore v. Elcum, 2 Yo. & Coll. Ch. 363.

P. F. S. Stokes, for the defendants.—The mother is properly maintaining, educating, and bringing up the children, and the court cannot interfere with her discretion merely on account of her immorality. She has a discretion as to the quantum and mode of maintenance, and she is not liable to account: Lambe v. Eames 19 W. R. 659, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 597; Thorp v. Owen, 2 Hare, 607; Jodrell v. Jodrell, 14 Beav. 397. I admit an obligation to maintain. [KEKEWICH, J.—This is equivalent to a trust. Might the mother exercise her discretion by bringing the children up as thieves?] She is not bringing them up to immorality. The present case differs from those cited against me because here there is no abandonment, and the mother is still willing to maintain the children.

Martelli, in reply.—The fact that the two elder children approve of their home tends to show that the mother is not bringing up the children properly, and the court ought to interfere.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 22.—KEKEWICH, J., after reading the trusts of the will above set out, continued as follows: It was urged on behalf of the children, and not denied on behalf of their mother, that the language just quoted imposes on the latter an obligation enforceable in this court, but the precise character of that obligation requires to be examined and defined. The question is, what is the nature and extent of the obligation, and that gives rise to some serious considerations. First comes the question what meaning is to be attributed to the expression "maintaining, educating, and bringing up"? I entirely agree that, although it of course includes providing such an adequate supply of house-room, food, and clothing as can reasonably be expected from a mother, having regard to the station in life of herself and children and the means available for the purpose, it cannot be restricted to that; and indeed this is sufficiently shown by the use of the word "educating," which must be taken to mean that the children are also to have a "proper" education—that is, "proper," having regard to the same circumstances as are regarded with reference to food and clothing. It is difficult to give any definite additional meaning to the words "bringing up," yet in common parlance they are taken to denote something not covered by "maintenance and education," which latter word is generally used in the limited sense. The sense, I mean, of such instruction as is given at school, or by those who occupy the position of schoolmaster at home in that character. But whether it depends on "bringing up" or not, I have no doubt that the clause must be read as if the word "properly" were there, and that, again, "properly" must be construed with regard to the position in life of those to whom reference is made. I ventured during the argument to illustrate this by saying that a mother would not be bringing up her children properly if she were teaching them to be thieves. That seems to me to be obviously clear. I think it is equally obvious and clear that the bringing up need not be such as to introduce the children to the criminal class in order to offend against the obligation imposed by the will. In my opinion a bringing up directly tending to make the children familiar with immorality and with familiarity to induce a fondness for and practice of it would be equally objectionable. Here on the mother's own confession we know that she is not only living with a man to whom she is not married, but that she is continuing to do so after she has discovered that he has a wife of his own. I am not sitting as a court of morals, nor am I exercising punitive jurisdiction, and there is no occasion to use words of censure or reproof, but I distinctly hold that a woman thus living in adultery cannot be treated as properly bringing up her children, however much she may do in the way of making them a comfortable home and giving them a proper education. The answer is, that only the three elder children know the real facts, and that the two elder of these are content, while the four younger children have been taught to regard the man as their stepfather and believe him to occupy that position, and have the affection for him which, as he apparently returns it, is natural in such circumstances. The answer does not satisfy me. I do not think that even if they are kept in ignorance, and the affection continues, the mother can be regarded as fulfilling her obligation. But there is a strong probability that they will sooner or later discover the truth, and I am invited to believe, and indeed to hope, that as and when they do they, like the two elder children, will be content to live in a home of immorality such as I have mentioned. My duty is to regard and, so far as possible, to provide for the welfare of the children, and I cannot think that I should be performing that duty if, any alternative being possible, I allowed these consequences to ensue. This conclusion is founded on principle and common sense, and does not require the support of authority; but one authority was cited which deserves notice—namely, Castle v. Castle. A careful examination of that case shows that the court was only dealing with the provision commencing with the words, "that if from any cause it should be necessary or advisable to discontinue the business of the said hotel," and read in that light the strong remarks in the judgments have a direct bearing on the case in hand. They show that in determining what is for the welfare of those whose welfare the court has to protect, moral considerations have weight, and the social misconduct of a mother in charge is a reason for interfering with her.

Here follows a question of greater difficulty and not less serious practical importance—namely, what is the beneficial interest which is thus placed under the control of the court to be administered by it instead of by the mother for maintaining, educating, and bringing up the children? The father left his whole estate to his wife during life or widowhood, and the annual income of that estate, which is proved to be now £417, is not, I conclude, likely in the future to exceed that sum. The widow has not apparently any other income. Can the whole of this be properly taken from her and applied for the benefit of the children elsewhere? In the other cases in which the jurisdiction now invoked has been exercised there have been words to express the intention of the testator that the person on whom the obligation of maintaining others is cast is herself intended to derive a personal benefit. The language has been "she maintaining thereout," or as in Booth v. Booth and Longmore v. Elcum, "for her use and benefit and for her maintenance," &c., from which there was a slight variation in Castle v. Castle, where the mother was allowed to retain one-third, though the other two-thirds were appropriated to the children. Such words are absent here; but I cannot doubt that the effect of the gift is the same as if they were present. The gift is to the widow coupled with an obligation; but it would, I think, be making that obligation too extensive to hold that it can be enforced even to the exhaustion of the beneficial character of the gift. It may be observed that in marrying again she loses all, but then, of course, it is assumed that she will be maintained by her husband, and, on the other hand, as the children attain majority and the daughters marry, the obligation diminishes, and ultimately she is given the whole income for her own benefit. What proportion of the income is to be retained by her and what applied for the benefit of the children must be carefully considered with other details of a scheme for the future maintenance, education, and bringing up of the children. But I intend to distinctly hold that, assuming the custody of all the children to be taken from the mother by reason of her misconduct, and their maintenance, education, and bringing up to be provided for elsewhere than under her roof, she will still be entitled to receive so much of the income as—as between her and her children, and having regard to the social position of the parties and the amount of available fortune—is adequate to her own personal maintenance and support.

JONES v. BARNETT. (a.)

Vendor and Purchaser—Sale under order of court—Purchaser for value without notice—Equitable execution—Judgments Act, 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 112)—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 70.

No estate or interest will be bound by section 70 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, which estate or interest would not, apart from such section, have been bound by an order of court dealing with such estate or interest, having regard to the terms of such order and the proceedings in which and the circumstances under which it was made.

Trial of action.

This was an action in which the plaintiff claimed, inter alia, possession of certain freehold and leasehold premises and a declaration that the premises were not liable to be taken in execution under a judgment of the High Court bearing date the 26th of February, 1895, in an action entitled Barnett v. Jones.

The facts of the case were these: By his will dated the 1st of August, 1886, John Williams, of Tymaen, Pyle, Glamorganshire, appointed his wife Elizabeth, his nephew Philip Jones—not the husband of the plaintiff—and his brother-in-law Edward Thomas executors and trustees thereof, and devised and bequeathed his real estate not thereby otherwise disposed of to his trustees upon trust to permit testator's wife to receive the rents thereof, and after her death, testator bequeathed his leasehold house and shop and devised his freehold cottages at Aberavon aforesaid to his nephew Isaac Jones, one of the defendants. Testator died the 18th of October, 1886, and his will was duly proved by his executors above named. At the date of the indenture next mentioned Isaac Jones was indebted to Philip Jones, husband of the plaintiff Mary Jones, in the sum of £350. By an indenture bearing date the 31st of May, 1894, and made between the said Isaac Jones of the first part, Philip Jones, husband of Mary Jones, of the second part, and Mary Jones of the third part, it was witnessed that in consideration of the sum of £350 so owing as aforesaid by the said Isaac Jones to the said Philip Jones, the said Isaac Jones as beneficial owner thereby assigned unto the said Mary Jones, and the said Philip Jones thereby confirmed all the share, right, title, and interest to which the said Isaac Jones in his right was then or should or might thereafter be entitled under the will of the said John Williams, to hold the same unto the said Mary Jones absolutely. The circumstances incidental to the execution of this indenture are stated in the judgment. On the 26th of February, 1895, Sol. Barnett, one of the defendants, obtained judgment in the said action of Barnett v. Jones, an action assigned to the Queen's Bench Division, against the said Isaac Jones for the sum of £450 6s. By an order in the action bearing date the 14th of March, 1895, a receiver was appointed of the reversionary interest of the said Isaac Jones in the leasehold and freehold premises aforesaid expectant on the death of the said Elizabeth Williams. But, and it was thereby provided, the receiver was not to sell the said property or any part thereof.

On the 10th of July, 1895, the said Sol. Barnett filed a petition in the Chancery Division (Chitty, J.), setting forth the proceedings last mentioned, and praying a sale of the interest of the said Isaac Jones in the said premises, and for the application of the money so arising in payment of the judgment debt, and for all proper accounts and inquiries.

On the 24th of July, 1895, Chitty, J., ordered the following accounts and inquiries:

(1) An account of what was due to the petitioner under the said judgment of the 26th of February, 1895.

(2) An inquiry what interest or interests of the defendant Isaac Jones had been delivered in execution by the appointment of a receiver under the order of the 14th of March, 1895.

(3) An inquiry whether there were any and if so what liens, charges, or incumbrances upon the said interest or interests in land of the said Isaac Jones, or on any and what part or parts respectively, and what were the priorities of such incumbrances and what was due on account thereof respectively, and in making such inquiries to ascertain which, if any, of the said liens, charges, and incumbrances had been created, prior to, and which, if any, subsequent to the order of the 14th of March, 1895, and as to those created subsequent to the said order, which of them were before the registration of the said order created in favour of a purchaser for value, and it was ordered that the said Isaac Jones should pay what should be certified to be due by the chief clerk's certificate within a month after the date thereof, and in default that the interest or interests in land which should have been certified to have been delivered in execution should be sold with the approbation of the judge free from all liens, charges, or incumbrances which had been created subsequent to the said order of the 14th of March, 1895, except such as were created in favour of a purchaser for value before the registration of the said order.

By his certificate filed the 20th of January, 1896, the chief clerk certified (1) that there was due to the said Sol. Barnett the sum of £509 19s. 0d. (2) That the interest or interests in land of the said Isaac Jones consisted in his reversionary interests in the freehold and leasehold premises above mentioned expectant on the death of the said Elizabeth Williams. (3) That there was not any lien, charge, or incumbrance upon the said interest or interests in land of the said Isaac Jones, or any part thereof respectively.

No payment was made in respect of the debt, and the said Sol. Barnett having obtained an order authorizing him to bid at the sale, purchased the premises for the sum of £375, and one John Thomas, under an order of the 19th of February, 1897, conveyed the premises to him by a deed dated the 4th of March, 1897. Until April, 1897 Sol. Barnett was unaware of the existence of the indenture of the 31st of March, 1894. The widow of the testator died on the 16th of March, 1897, and the said Sol. Barnett took possession of the premises.

The plaintiff, Mary Jones, shortly afterwards commenced this action for recovery of the premises, making the said Sol. Barnett and the said Isaac Jones defendants.

The defendant Sol. Barnett in his defence submitted, inter alia that the indenture of the 31st of May, 1894, was void under 13 Eliz. c. 5 as a fraudulent preference of one creditor, the said P. Jones, and counterclaimed, inter alia, to have the indenture set aside. The court, holding on the facts mentioned in the judgment that the assignment of the 31st of March, 1894, was bonâ fide and for value, the question was argued whether, although the plaintiff had the prior legal title, such title had been destroyed as against the defendant Barnett under the operation of section 70 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, the premises having been sold under an order of the court.

Neville, Q.C., W. F. Phillpotts, and R. B. Phillpotts, for the defendant Barnett.—The defendant has obtained a good title under section 70 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, and this title cannot be invalidated by the non-concurrence of the plaintiff: In re Hall Dares', Contract, 30 W. R. 556, 21 Ch. D. 41; Mostyn v. Mostyn, 42 W. R. 17, [1893] 3 Ch. 376.

Farwell, Q.C., and Napier, for the plaintiff.—A judgment creditor cannot obtain by his judgment an estate, which it is not his debtor's to give. The effect of section 70 cannot be to transfer the legal estate, and it must be construed to be based on the assumption that all persons interested are as a matter of fact before the court. If the other construction is adopted a man may be deprived of his estates by an action of which he has never had any notice: Whitworth v. Gaugain, 1 Ph. 728; Baroness Wenlock v. River Dee Co., 38 Ch. D. 534, 37 W. R. Dig. 43: In re National Debenture and Assets Corporation, 39 W. R. 707, [1891] 2 Ch. 505. Further, the sale was made subject to prior incumbrances.

Neville, Q.C., in reply.—The defendant Barnett is bonâ fide purchaser for value without notice, and possesses the legal estate. The plaintiff's rights under the conveyance do not constitute an incumbrance.

ROMER, J.—No real difficulty arises with regard to the facts of the case. I am satisfied that Philip Jones, the plaintiff's husband, did contract to buy from Isaac Jones the property, the subject of this action, subject to the then existing prior life interest for the sum of £350, which was then due from Isaac Jones to P. Jones on an account settled between them, and this property was intended to be and was assured to the plaintiff by the deed of the 31st of May, 1894, and this deed was duly executed and delivered, and passed to her the legal estate in the leaseholds, and also in the freeholds, at anyrate for her life. I have further come to the conclusion that this transaction was entered into in good faith and for full valuable consideration, and was not a fraudulent preference of P. Jones or executed to defeat creditors to the knowledge of P. Jones or of the plaintiff, and it is not void as against the defendant either under the statute 13 Eliz. c. 5, or otherwise. It is true that I. Jones had refused to join in the transaction, or to let P. Jones have the property, unless it was (as P. Jones expressed it) settled upon the plaintiff, who was I. Jones's sister, so as to benefit her and her children. But when the transaction is rightly understood, I am convinced that it was not a part payment by P. Jones for the property, and a voluntary settlement by Isaac Jones in favour of his sister. I have had the advantage of seeing in the box P. Jones, who gave me the impression of being an honest witness, though of humble position and not acquainted with English legal terms, and the conclusion I have come to upon the evidence as a whole is that the transaction on his part was a purchase in good faith for full consideration, and not the less so because he was quite willing to let his purchase become his wife's property as desired by her brother. If a man offers to buy a property for a sufficient and proper price and the owner expresses his willingness to sell for that price, provided that the purchaser will let the conveyance be to the purchaser's wife, who is related to the owner, and the purchaser, for reasons of his own, is willing to let the purchased property be so conveyed, and a bargain is thus made and is carried out, such a transaction is not a voluntary settlement in any true sense, or anything but a sale and purchase for value and in good faith, and in my opinion the case before me, when properly appreciated, is in substance one of this kind. Notice of the sale and assurance to the trustees of the will under which I. Jones was entitled was, of course, not necessary to complete the plaintiff's title, but there was, in my judgment, no intentional abstaining by P. Jones or the plaintiff from giving such notice. Indeed, though it is not necessary to determine on the evidence, it appears to me that one of the trustees was informed of the transaction. The fact is that P. Jones knew nothing of law and left it to his solicitor to carry out the transaction properly. Nor is there any real ground for the suggestion on the defendant's behalf that the plaintiff or I. Jones knew of the later proceedings under which the defendant purported to buy the property and have it assured to him, and abstained from informing the defendant of the plaintiff's prior title; on the other hand, it is not proved to my satisfaction that the defendant bought with notice of the plaintiff's title.

On these findings of fact the question is reduced to one of law, whether the defendant has a better title than the plaintiff, although the plaintiff had a prior legal title. The only ground on which it can be suggested that the defendant has a better title is that by virtue of section 70 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, the plaintiff's prior title was destroyed as against the defendant because the property was sold and assured to him under orders of this court. Those orders came to be made in the following circumstances: The defendant as judgment creditor of Isaac Jones obtained equitable execution as against Isaac Jones's then interest in this property by the appointment of a receiver then made although there was then nothing to receive, inasmuch as the prior life tenant was then living and in receipt of the rents and profits. The defendant then proceeded under the Judgments Act, 1864, and obtained the usual order under which the debtor's interest so delivered in execution was ordered to be sold, and the usual inquiries were directed to ascertain the nature and extent of that interest. The order was dated the 24th of July, 1895. The inquiries thereby directed were proceeded with, and as Isaac Jones did not appear and no one before the court knew anything about the assurance to the plaintiff, naturally enough, in answer to the inquiries, the chief clerk, by his certificate in finding that the interest delivered in execution was the reversionary interest under the will, made no reference to the plaintiff's rights or title or to any incumbrance on that reversionary interest. The sale directed by the order was then proceeded with, and the debtor's interest as found by the chief clerk's certificate was offered for sale by public auction subject to certain conditions of sale. At that sale the defendant, having obtained leave to bid, was declared the purchaser, and was subsequently allowed to set off the purchase-money against a corresponding part of the larger judgment debt due to him. And then by an order dated the 19th of February, 1897, the court being of opinion that it was expedient for the purpose of carrying the sale directed by the order of the the 24th of July, 1895, into effect, that a person should be appointed to convey the said interest of Isaac Jones, ordered that one J. Thomas should be appointed to convey the said interest to the defendant as purchaser or as he should direct. And accordingly by deed dated the 4th of March, 1897, the said interest was assured by J. Thomas to the defendant.

Now, in these proceedings it is clear that the court by the order of the 24th of July, 1895, was only ordering the sale of the debtor's interest as delivered in execution by the appointment of the receiver, and that the order of the 19th of February, 1897, was made for the purpose of carrying out the sale directed under the order of the 24th of July, 1895. In these circumstances it is very startling to be told that by virtue of section 70 of the Act of 1881 the plaintiff has been deprived of her title, although that title existed prior to the equitable execution and she was a complete stranger to the proceedings, and the court could never have contemplated or intended to bind or affect her. And when the argument of defendant's counsel upon section 70 is fully developed, it is found of necessity to lead, if sound, to very astonishing conclusions. It is contended that, since section 70 came into force, when any property is sold by the court in any proceedings before it, an indefeasible title is acquired by the purchaser, because all persons interested are bound, even though they may be perfect strangers to the proceedings, and not in the contemplation of the court at all when it made the order for sale. And it would follow, if such a contention were correct, that the practice of the court in selling under proper conditions of sale has been quite wrong since section 70 came into force, for if all persons interested in the property are bound by the order for sale, the purchaser need not look beyond that order. It would certainly be extraordinary if the effect of section 70 was to change to such an extent the well-understood scope and object of orders of sale made by the court. Take, for example, the case of an action to adminster the estate of a testator in which some property is ordered to be sold as part of that estate. Apart from the section, the sale would never be held to bind or affect persons claiming, not under the will of the testator, but against him and against those claiming through him. Yet, according to the contention, the section has had the effect of making the sale quite different in its scope by binding all such persons. And similar considerations would apply to orders of sale made in partition actions, and foreclosure and redemption actions, and numerous others. And the effect of the section cannot be limited to orders for sale. In terms, the section applies in favour of a purchaser, to any order of the court. And "purchaser" includes by the Act's interpretation clause (section 2, viii.) a lessee or mortgagee or an intending purchaser, lessee, or mortgagee, or other person who, for valuable consideration, takes or deals with any property. And, with certain express exceptions, section 70 applies to all orders made before or after the commencement of the Act. If the contention before me be correct, the section has indeed made a wonderful change. An owner of an estate might suddenly find himself wholly deprived of it by an order of court in some proceeding he never heard of, and without any intention on the part of the court to affect him, and then be told that he had no remedy except possibly to follow (if he could) any moneys that might have been paid by a purchaser. But I need not enlarge upon the results to which such a construction of the section would lead. In my opinion the section was not intended to have, and has not, such a wide effect. It is a useful section, and I should be sorry to limit its utility. But I think due effect can be given to it without yielding to such an extravagant contention as that before me. I shall not pretend to define all the cases to which the section can properly be held to apply or not to apply.

But in my judgment the following proposition is correct: If an order of court dealing with property, having regard to its terms and the proceedings in which and the circumstances in which it was made, would not be held, apart from section 70, to be intended to bind any particular estate or interest in the property, then that estate or interest would not be bound by the order, by reason or virtue of the section. And I may point out that the section only speaks of orders of court not being invalidated as against a purchaser with or without notice on certain specified grounds, and that, as a rule, a stranger to an action may assert his rights without being obliged to invalidate any orders that may have been made in such action.

The cases cited in support of the defendant's contention do not warrant it. With regard to In re Hall Dare, all I need say is that there the parties whose concurrence to the order for sale was dispensed with were clearly intended to be bound by the order, and that if the section did not apply to that case I do not know to what case it could be held to apply. As to Mostyn v. Mostyn I feel more difficulty. So far as the actual decision in that case is concerned it was only one determining a question of form of conveyance which had arisen in an administration action as between vendors and purchasers. But one reason given for their decision by the Lords Justices undoubtedly was that certain puisne mortgagees who were strangers to the action were bound under the section by the order for sale. Speaking with all respect I do not clearly see how they arrived at that conclusion, especially as they also held that the first mortgagees, who had agreed to join in the sale, were not bound by the order, and that as those mortgagees were not before the court or parties to the contract for sale, the court had no power to compel them to submit to the purchasers' requirements. I gather, however, that the court, having regard to the conditions of sale and other circumstances of the case, came to the conclusion that the court by its orders did intend to bind, and had bound, the puisne mortgagees and their interests in the property ordered to be sold, though those puisne mortgagees were strangers to the action. This being so, that case is quite distinguishable from the case now before me, where, having regard to the fact that the sale was ordered under the provisions of the Judgments Act, 1864, and was clearly intended to be a sale of the debtor's interest of which the creditor had obtained equitable execution, I am satisfied that the plaintiff's interest in the property was not intended to be, and was not in fact bound. And, in particular, on examination of the order of the 24th of July, 1895, it will be seen that the sale was intended to be subject to all incumbrances on the property existing at the date of the equitable execution, except those of such incumbrancers as should consent to the sale. It is said that the plaintiff's estate was not an "incumbrance" properly so-called. I am not satisfied even of that. In Wharton's Law Lexicon I find "incumbrance" defined as being "a claim, lien, or liability attached to property," and this definition is wide enough to cover the plaintiff's claim. But even supposing that the plaintiff's right was not an incumbrance strictly so-called, yet the wording of the order as well as the general provisions of the Judgments Act, 1864, make it clear, in my opinion, that the court was not intending to bind any right or estate in the property existing at the date of the equitable execution which was binding on the judgment debtor and could not be displaced by him. A sale by order of court under that Act would not bind such a right or estate, and the owner of that right or estate could enforce it, notwithstanding the court's order of sale, as against a purchaser under that order, though the purchaser at the time of his purchase had no notice of the existence of such right or estate. And, moreover, in my opinion, before enforcing such right or estate the owner would not be bound to invalidate the order of the court. He could leave the order standing and say that it did not concern or affect him. See, as bearing on the point, the case of Whitworth v. Gaugain with reference to the position of judgment creditors under the Act 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, and Godfrey v. Poole, 13 App. Cas. 497, 36 W. R. Dig. 65, a case which concerned a New South Wales Act corresponding to the Judgments Act, 1864, and where it was pointed out that a sale at the instance of an execution creditor could not pass to the purchaser a greater interest than the debtor possessed at the time of the execution.

For these reasons it appears to me that section 70 does not enable the defendant to resist the plaintiff's claim, and that the plaintiff is entitled to recover possession of the property. As to costs, seeing what is the nature of defendant's defence and counterclaim, I think he must pay the plaintiff's costs, except so far as those costs have been increased by the plaintiff's attempt to prove that the defendant purchased with notice of the plaintiff's right.

In re RAYNES PARK GOLF CLUB (LIMITED).
Ex parte THE OFFICIAL RECEIVER. (a.)

Company—Winding-up—Costs—Order against official receiver personally—County Court—Right of appeal.

An appeal will lie against an order on an official receiver or liquidator to pay costs personally, for such an order is equivalent to a declaration that such official has been guilty of misconduct.

Appeal by the official receiver from part of an order of his Honour Judge Lushington, made in the county court of Croydon, directing the official receiver personally to pay the costs of a motion.

The official receiver was ex officio liquidator of a company in liquidation called the Raynes Park Golf Club (Limited). This company was in arrears with its rates at the date of the winding-up order, and the overseers of Merton, the parish in which the company's property was situated, applied, subsequently to the date of the winding-up order, to the official receiver for payment of the same as a preferential claim within section 1 (a) of the Preferential Payments in Bankruptcy Act, 1888. The official receiver admitted that the rates were a prefrenetial claim, but as he did not pay them over so soon as the overseers desired, the latter proceeded against him by motion in the county court. The judge ordered him to pay over the rates and to pay the costs of the motion personally.

The official receiver appealed against the order for costs, and the appeal was heard (by special leave) by the Divisional Court sitting in Bankruptcy.

Muir Mackenzie, for the appellant.—The motion was quite unnecessary and ought never to have been brought, and the court has no jurisdiction to order an official receiver to pay costs personally unless he has been guilty of misconduct.

Archer M. White, for the respondents.—No appeal lies on a question of costs alone.

Muir Mackenzie, in reply.—In re Silver Valley Mines, 31 W. R. 96, 21 Ch. D. 381, shows that a liquidator is entitled to appeal against such an order as this.

WRIGHT, J.—The ordinary rule is that appeals lie only on matters of law, and do not lie on a question of costs unless a question of principle is involved. I think, however, that the present appeal may be treated as one on a matter of law, for a order against an official receiver to pay the costs of any proceeding personally is equivalent to a declaration that he has been guilty of misconduct, of which, in this case there is no evidence.

BIGHAM, J., concurred.

LACEBY v. LACON & CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Licensing law — Licence — Order for new licence on condition of surrendering other licence—Removal—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 50.

The appellant was the holder of an off-licence of a public-house, and duly applied for a renewal at the general annual licensing meeting, and this was granted. He also duly applied for and obtained a new licence of an adjoining house, on the condition of giving up the licence of which he had just obtained the renewal.

Held, that the justices had not exceeded their jurisdiction, as this was not a removal of a licence, and therefore section 50 of the Licensing Act, 1872, requiring notice to the owner of the premises, had no application.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (Reg. v. Thornton, Ex parte Lacon & Co., 46 W. R. 241, [1898] 1 Q. B. 334) reversed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, Chitty, and Collins, L.JJ.), reported sub. nom. Reg. v. Thornton, 46 W. R. 241, [1898] 1 Q. B. 334, affirming a judgment of the Divisional Court (Cave and Ridley, JJ.) granting a writ of certiorari to bring up and quash an order made by licensing justices.

In March, 1897, G. C. Laceby was the holder of a licence in respect of the "Five Alls" public-house at Battersea for the sale of beer, wine, and spirits to be consumed off the premises, and he was also the holder of a similar licence in respect of the cellar of the adjoining premises, No. 2, Abercrombie-street. It appeared that in 1890 the then holder of the licence for the "Five Alls," finding his premises insufficient, arranged to take the cellar of No. 2, Abercrombie-street, and obtained a separate licence in respect thereof, and since that time the two licences had been renewed from year to year. Before the general annual licensing meeting for the Wandsworth Division, which was held on the 5th of March, 1897, Laceby gave notice of his intention to apply for renewals of the two licences, and also gave notice of his intention to apply for a licence for the whole of the house No. 2, Abercrombie-street. The justices having granted the application for renewals of the old licences the applicant proceeded to make his application for the new licence, which was adjourned. At an adjourned meeting the justices asked the applicant whether he would give up his licence for the "Five Alls" if they granted him the new licence. He agreed, and thereupon the justices made an order granting him a licence for the sale of beer, wine, and spirits, to be consumed off the premises, in respect of No. 2, Abercrombie-street, subject to the condition of his giving up the licence which he held in respect of the "Five Alls."

The Court of Appeal held that there was no jurisdiction to make this order, as the requirements of section 50 of the Licensing Act, 1872, had not been complied with.

The applicant appealed.

Bosanquet, Q.C., and S. C. Earle, for the appellant.

Lawson Walton, Q.C., Foote, Q.C. (Travers Humphreys with them), for respondents.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—I am glad, out of respect to the two courts below, from whom this question has come, that the matter has been so elaborately and carefully argued; but I confess for myself I cannot, now that the matter is fully before me, entertain any doubt as to the conclusion at which your lordships ought to arrive. I quite admit that during a considerable part of the argument, before my mind was sufficiently alive to the provisions of the Act of 1872, I was very much impressed by the argument which seems to have found favour with the courts below, because the transaction looked to me, having regard to section 50, like, what I think two of the learned judges say it was, doing by an indirect performance that which the Legislature had prohibited—namely, the removal of a licence from a house occupied by a tenant, against the will of his landlord, to some other house where he could carry on his business at the sacrifice of the landlord's interest in the former house. Without such a careful examination of the Act of Parliament as we have now had, that would be the first impression of a person reading these sections: it might be considered that the Legislature had provided for the interest of the landlord by making the landlord's dissent an absolute bar to the proceeding by the magistrates by way of removal.

Upon a careful examination, however, of the statute it appears to me that section 50, upon which reliance is placed, is a section which, whatever may have been its original design, has under the statute no machinery and no provision which can effectually prevent the grant of new licences, and I do not believe that the Legislature ever contemplated that such a bar should be placed in the way of the jurisdiction and discretion of the magistrates as would be involved in permitting the mere refusal of the owner of the premises, as distinguished from the tenant of the premises, to prevent the magistrates exercising their discretion in the matter. I can well understand that, given a current licence and given some proceeding whereby the current licence should be removed to other premises, the Legislature would have prevented the tenant sacrificing his landlord's interest by a proceeding in which the landlord himself was not represented. That is on the one hand clear enough. When I find that the only application for a removal must be made at the general licensing sessions, and when I observe, what has been so often pointed out to us, the interval between that date, the 5th of March, and the 5th of April, when the new licence must begin, I confess I am wholly unable to see what useful object can be performed by that section, or what protection to anybody is thereby given.

But as regards renewals and new licences it is obvious that neither this court nor any other court can supply machinery or provisions which the statute itself has not enacted. If the Legislature intended that there should be some protection during the currency of the licence and intended that the landlord should be represented, all one can say is that no such provisions can be found in the statute, and your lordships have no jurisdiction to supply them. What is clear is that by this Act of Parliament, and by the others to which the learned counsel have called our attention from time to time, what the Legislature has ultimately done has been to give an absolute unfettered discretion to the magistrates. Certainly it would be a very singular result of that legislation if upon a new licence being applied for the magistrates being invested, as by the hypothesis they are, with an absolutely unlimited discretion, the mere veto of the person who owns the premises held by a licensed person, which licensed person was applying for a licence for other premises, should prevent the magistrates granting a perfectly new licence to new premises, and that that bar should exist because the applicant had before that held other premises under another licence. That would be a very singular result indeed, and certainly, unless there was something very clear in the statute to compel me to come to such a conclusion, I should absolutely refuse to assume that the Legislature had done so.

But it is not necessary for your lordships to consider that, because the question here is whether or not anything has been done which the justices were not at perfect liberty to do; it must be made out before any such order could be made and maintained as has been made by both the courts below that the magistrates acted without jurisdiction.

Now, I quite follow what Mr. Lawson Walton and Mr. Foote have so ingeniously and earnestly pointed out, that the result arrived at may be the same as would have been arrived at by a "removal." Granted. But what then? The thing that the magistrates have done is not the thing which is contemplated by the 50th section—that is to say, not the same as regards the actual order. Whether it is the same thing in substance or not I will treat of in a moment, but it is not the thing. What they have done is, they have licensed premises, and that licence does not purport to be, and is not certainly upon the face of the instrument, the former licence which existed of the "Five Alls," but it is an absolutely new licence. What the Legislature meant by the "removal of the licence" I can only conjecture, but I should think it would mean that a licence which had existed in one house should be, as, indeed, the phrase implies (it is not a very happy one), removed to another house. If any order was asked for upon that subject it is to be remembered that whatever discretion the magistrates have they are limited in the orders they make by the language of the statute, and if they wanted to make such an order as that they must make the order accordingly. It is all very well to say that it may come to the same thing; but where the magistrates are fettered by a statute which enables them only to act in a particular way, they must abide by that way. Here the magistrates on the affidavit laid before us say they were not asked to make an order for removal, and did not suppose they were making an order for removal; and when we look at the document itself there is no such thing as an order for removal to be found in the whole course of the proceedings, and yet your lordships are asked to say that these proceedings are without jurisdiction; because, although everything that the magistrates did and everything that they intended to do was within their jurisdiction, it is said the effect produced is just the same as if they had made some other order which they never did make and never intended to make, and by this circuitous process of reasoning it is to be supposed the magistrates acted outside their jurisdiction.

The observation immediately arises that where you are dealing with a subject-matter of this sort the form is part of the substance. It is a delusion to suppose that magistrates may do what may be equivalent to this, that, or the other. They are within the iron framework of a statute, and they have no jurisdiction to go beyond it. All that they did do, and all that they intended to do, was that they licensed a person to occupy new premises for the purposes contemplated by the statute.

I decline to go into the question of whether or not, if there was anything erroneous in the order which the magistrates made, the proper form of remedying that error has been adopted. I confess I should require further argument before I hastily came to the conclusion that this was the proper form, but I decline to enter into the question or give any opinion upon the subject. If the question hereafter arises whether certiorari is the proper remedy or not, then will be the proper time to decide it; but inasmuch as upon any hypothesis it can only be by some error in the proceedings, and inasmuch as I am of opinion that there is no error here at all, but that the magistrates have proceeded strictly within their jurisdiction, I am of opinion that this order of the Court of Appeal, confirming the order of the court below, ought to be reversed, and I accordingly so move your lordships.

Lord WATSON.—The Legislature have enacted that the licensing justices shall not remove (whatever that may mean) a licence from one set of premises to another unless the owner of the house which is about to be deprived of the licence is called as a party to the proceedings for his interest, and unless he consents to the order being pronounced. In the present case I think the only question is whether such an order has been pronounced. I do not think it is enough to bring the case within the statutory requirement of the presence of the owner of the house that the proceedings of the justices shall be attended with precisely the same consequences as if they had been asked to make, and had in point of fact made, an order of removal. It is not enough to say, as some of the judges have said, that the two things are in substance the same. It is not enough to say that either directly or indirectly the result must be the same. The court must come to the conclusion, in order to bring the matter within the statutory prohibition, that what has been done is one of the things which the Legislature have prohibited.

Now, I need not repeat what has been already said by my noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor, but in the present case it appears to me that in construing, as one must do, that clause, which is not easy of construction, the 50th section of the Licensing Act of 1872, an order of removal never was contemplated by any of the parties to this case. It was not applied for; it was not intended to be granted by the licensing justices; and where one examines what they have done it amounts to the case of the destruction (at least it was said to amount to destruction) of one licence and the continuance of another. That is, to my mind, entirely opposed to what is the plain meaning of the statute in using the word "removal," which means that a licence shall be transplanted from one set of premises and serve as a privilege and protection to another set of premises—it may be to another set of premises in a different licensing district. In those circumstances I do not think the respondents in this case were entitled to any remedy. I do not think that they have shown facts requiring any remedy, and therefore I think it quite unnecessary to discuss in what form the remedy ought to have been granted if it had been required.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion.

Lord MORRIS.—I am of the same opinion. In this case an application is made for a certiorari on the part of the respondents to remove into the Queen's Bench Division an order for a licence of 2, Abercrombie-street, in order to have it quashed. The licence on the face of it is a perfectly valid licence because it is a licence granted by persons competent and having jurisdiction—it is a licence to carry on in the house, 2 Abercrombie-street the business of sale of liquor for consumption off the premises.

Then what is the objection to that licence which is good upon the face of it? It is said that although it is a licence on the face of it—a grant for a new licence—yet it amounts to an order for a removal. Sometimes it is said "in substance," sometimes it is said "in effect," and sometimes it is said "the consequences are the same," but the argument is that it amounts to a order for a removal under section 50 of the Licensing Act. As I have said, on the face of it it does not purport to be anything of the sort; it purports to be what it is—a grant of a new licence. The Act of 1872 contemplates licences being obtained and granted in three sets of circumstances. By section 40 it contemplates the grant of renewals; by section 42 it contemplates the grant of new licences; and by section 50 it contemplates the grant of a "removal" of a licence, which I would understand from the use of the words "removal of the licence" to refer to a licence then in esse. In this case the proceedings have not been taken merely under section 50. The applicant never applied for a removal—he applied for a renewal—he also applied for the grant of a new licence to the entire of No. 2, Abercrombie-street. Why is he to be held as having applied for a grant of a "removal" when he did not do it? As a matter of fact he did not take the proceedings for that. There are three different applications dealt with by the statute. There are three different sets of notices to be given by the statute; there are three different results to be arrived at by the statute. The first is renewal, the second is a grant of a new licence, and the third is an order for removal. Why is it to be persevered in that he must be held to have applied for that which he did not apply for? Why is it to be held as against the magistrates that they made an order, which they did not make, for a removal under section 50 because, forsooth, the consequences may be practically the same if that proceeding had been taken? That is a matter for legislation. This House, as one branch only of the Legislature, is not entitled to legislate. If it is suggested that this protection to brewers and their houses should be extended to the case of renewals, and to the case of a grant of new licences, it is for the Legislature to say so. The Legislature have confined the protection to the case of removal. Suffice it to say that this is not a case of removal. If it were not for the very great respect which I have for the courts that have decided the opposite, I would have said that it was a very plain case indeed.

HODDINOTT v. NEWTON, CHAMBERS, & Co. (LIMITED). (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accidental injuries—Building—Building exceeding thirty feet in height—Building being constructed or repaired by means of a scaffolding—Alteration of building—Scaffolding inside building—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7, sub-sections 1, 2.

In an application for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, it appeared that the employers had undertaken to strengthen the structure of a recently-built stable by the insertion of iron stays, the building being twenty-eight feet high measured to the top of the upright walls, and thirty-six feet high measured to the top of the roof, and that the deceased workman, at the time of the accident, was standing on a temporary structure set up inside the building, consisting of three planks placed on two trestles, the planks being eight feet above the ground.

Held, that the stable was a building which exceeded thirty feet in height within the meaning of section 7 of the Act, but that it was not a building which was being either constructed or repaired by means of a scaffolding within the meaning of the section.

Appeal from a decision of the judge of the Wandsworth County Court on an application for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, made under section 1, sub-section 4, of the Act at the hearing of an action under the Employers' Liability Act. 1880.

The applicant was the widow of a workman who had died in consequence of accidental injury sustained by him in the course of his employment. The employers had undertaken to strengthen the structure of a stable, which had been recently built for the London General Omnibus Co. The work consisted of inserting some iron stays to fasten together the columns and girders of the stable. For the purpose of this work a temporary structure was set up inside the building, consisting of three planks placed on two trestles, the planks being eight feet above the ground. At the time of the accident the deceased was standing on the planks engaged in assisting to raise one of the iron stays. The building was twenty-eight feet high measured to the top of the upright walls, and thirty-six feet high measured to the top of the roof.

The county court judge held that the case came within section 7, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, and made an award in favour of the applicant.

The employers appealed.

R. M. Bray, Q.C., and G. Spencer Bower, for the appellants.—This case does not come within section 7, sub-section 1. Firstly, the building did not exceed thirty feet in height. Inasmuch as nothing was being done to the roof, the height of the building must be measured, as in section 5 of the London Building Act, 1894, from the ground to the top of the parapet, and so measured it was less than thirty feet in height. Secondly, the building was not "being constructed or repaired by means of a scaffolding." The appellants did not undertake the construction or the repair of this building. The work they undertook was alteration work, and sub-section 1 does not include the case of a building being altered. In sub-section 2 "undertakers" are defined to be, in the case of an engineering work, "the person undertaking the construction, alteration, or repair"; and, in the case of a building, "the persons undertaking the construction, repair, or demolition." The Legislature has advisedly omitted the word "alteration" in the case of a building. Neither was there any scaffolding in this case. A temporary arrangement of planks resting on trestles inside a completed building does not constitute a scaffolding. What the Act contemplates is a building which is being repaired at a height of thirty feet by means of a scaffolding.

Ruegg, Q.C., and Moyses, for the respondent.—The building was being constructed. It had not been properly constructed before, and the insertion of the iron stays was necessary in order to maintain it as a building. If it was not being constructed, it was being repaired. And the work was being done by means of a scaffolding. All the witnesses spoke of the planks and trestles as a scaffolding. There may be a scaffolding inside a building as well as outside.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Act does not say that the scaffolding must be thirty feet high.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The first question is, whether, for the purpose of satisfying the requirements of section 7, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, the height of a building is to be measured to the top of the upright walls or to the top of the roof. I will not now consider the proper method of measuring underground buildings. As to this building, it is shown to be more than thirty feet in height to the top of the roof, and, that being so, I think the applicant has made out that it exceeds thirty feet in height within the meaning of this Act.

The next question is whether this building was being constructed or repaired by means of a scaffolding. The county court judge found as a fact that the arrangement of planks and trestles constituted a scaffolding. Although the mere fact that the witnesses called it a scaffolding does not make it a scaffolding, if it is not one in fact, I cannot say there was no evidence to support the finding of the county court judge. Speaking for myself, I think it is immaterial whether that which is alleged to be a scaffolding is inside or outside a building. Neither do I think that the scaffolding itself need be thirty feet in height. The Act does not say so. The words of the sub-section are, "any building which exceeds thirty feet in height, and is either being constructed or repaired by means of a scaffolding." The sub-section does not say by means of a scaffolding thirty feet in height.

I pass on to the question whether, assuming this to have been a scaffolding, the deceased man was employed by the undertakers on a building which was being either constructed or repaired by means of a scaffolding. "Undertakers" are defined in sub-section 2, and are stated to be, in the case of a building, the persons undertaking the construction, repair, or demolition. Here the building had been already completed, and was in actual use. After it was completed, something which was not in the original design was found to be necessary in order to strengthen it, and the employers of the deceased, who were ironmasters, were called in to put in iron stays for that purpose. Were these ironmasters, then, constructing the building? No; it had already been constructed. In my opinion it cannot be said that this was employment by the ironmasters on a building which was then being constructed. In the case of an engineering work undertakers are defined to be "the person undertaking the construction, alteration, or repair"; but when the section goes on to deal with the case of a building the word "alteration" is left out. Then was this a case of repair? Was anything out of repair? No; this was a new building, which wanted something to be added in order to strengthen it. That was not repairing. I think that the claim fails on the ground that this was not a case of employment on a building which was being constructed or repaired. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think it is necessary to look at the provisions of the Act as a whole to see what the Legislature means. The Act applies to employment by the undertakers as therein defined on any building which exceeds thirty feet in height, and is being constructed or repaired by means of a scaffolding, or being demolished. I think that scaffolding must have some relation to the height of the building. It must be interpreted by reference to the nature of the work for which the Legislature contemplated it was to be used—i.e., in the construction or repair of a building exceeding thirty feet in height by an undertaker, who is defined to be the person undertaking the construction, repair, or demolition. This definition throws some light upon the question what sort of operation the Legislature was contemplating. It was the construction, repair, or demolition of a building, which would primâ facie suggest the building as a whole. And the operation to which scaffolding was contemplated as an essential would seem, therefore, to be primâ facie the work of constructing or repairing such a building as a whole, an operation to which a scaffolding is essential. It is not necessary, and it would be impossible, to define what is the exact legal meaning of scaffolding as used in this connection, nor is it necessary to decide whether something short of construction or repair of a building over thirty feet high as a whole, carried out by means of a scaffolding in the full sense of the term, such as might be used for dealing with a building over thirty feet high, might not be within the Act. But though definition is difficult or impossible, it is possible to say as to certain cases that they fall within or without the Act. It seems to me that the present case cannot be brought within the Act without straining the particular words at the expense of the general intention. It is impossible to suppose that the Legislature fixed thirty feet as an arbitrary line having no relation to the actual risk provided against, so that, when a building has once reached thirty feet high, any operation which can be called construction or repair of any part of the building inside or out, however near the ground, where the workman has to stand on an arrangement which may be termed scaffolding in order to reach it, will be within the Act and give him a remedy if he falls. Such an interpretation would give no reasonable ground for the introduction of thirty feet at all. It never can have been meant to cover the case of a man employed to put up a rod to hang pictures on in a drawing-room, though he supported himself on a platform, which could be called a scaffolding, in order to do it. It is obvious that the height of the house could have no bearing whatever on the risk of such an operation. It may be said that is not a case of repair, but no more is the case before the court. But the same observation would apply to whitewashing a ceiling. I come to the conclusion that the case does not come within any view which can possibly be taken of the intention of the Legislature.

1895, for the purpose of applying thereto the powers of the Act with reference to dangerous machines, and that therefore, by virtue of section 7, sub-section 2, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, the engine in the shed was itself a factory; and that, consequently, the deceased man was killed while employed "on or in or about a factory" within the meaning of section 7, and the employers were liable to pay compensation.

Appeal from the decision of the Bradford County Court judge in proceedings to recover compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The appellant was the widow of a deceased workman named Patrick McNicholas, who at the time of the accident causing his death was a workman in the employment of the respondents, Messrs. Dawson & Son, who were builders engaged at the time in erecting a post-office. McNicholas was employed to look after a steam engine in an engine shed and a mortar-pan, his duty being to fire the boiler, to start the engine and oil it, and to oil and feed a mortar-pan, which was outside the engine shed in the open air. The engine was used for grinding mortar for the post-office, from which it was distant about twenty yards. Across the middle of the engine shed was a revolving shaft worked by the engine and placed about four feet from the ground. The engine shed had a full-sized door at the side furthest away from the mortar-pan, and there was a small door four feet high at the side of the shed nearest to the mortar-pan. This small door was sometimes used for ventilating the engine shed, and it opened from the inside, and the man working at the engine would have to pass under the shaft to go to this door. The deceased man had been forbidden to go out of the shed by this small door. Upon the morning of the 6th of August, 1898, at about 6.55 a.m., the deceased man called to an outdoor labourer named Smith, who was employed at the mortar-pan, asking him if he was ready, and upon being answered in the affirmative he started the engine, and about two minutes afterwards Smith heard a rattling noise, and upon going into the engine-shed he saw the deceased man, who died shortly afterwards, caught in the shaft. No one saw how the accident happened. It was the duty of the deceased man, after having started the engine, to go to the mortar-pan. The evidence showed that the proper way to the mortar-pan was by the main door. The oil-can used for oiling the engine was found on the shelf where it was kept when not in use, thus showing that the accident did not happen when the deceased man was oiling the engine. Two questions were raised. First, whether the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment, within section 1, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897; and, secondly, whether the steam engine was a "factory" within the meaning of section 7 of the Act. The county court judge held that the deceased at the time of his death was employed in a "factory"; that the deceased had not been guilty of serious and wilful misconduct; but that the evidence left it uncertain whether the accident arose "out of" the employment, though it probably arose "in the course of" the employment, and that the onus of proof being on the appellant, judgment must be entered for the respondents. The appellant appealed. The compensation, if any was payable, was agreed at £180.

By section 1, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, "if in any employment to which this Act applies personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman," his employer shall be liable to pay compensation. By section 7, sub-section 1, "This Act shall apply only to employment . . . on or in or about a railway, factory, . . ." By sub-section 2, "'factory' has the same meaning as in the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1878 to 1891, and also includes any dock, wharf, quay, warehouse, machinery, or plant to which any provision of the Factory Acts is applied by the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895. . . ." By section 23, sub-section 1, of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, "The following provisions—namely, . . . (v.) The provisions of this Act with respect to the power to make orders as to dangerous machines shall have effect as if (a) every dock, wharf, quay, and warehouse, and, so far as relates to the process of loading or unloading therefrom or thereto, all machinery and plant used in that process; and (b) any premises on which machinery worked by steam, water, or other mechanical power is temporarily used for the purpose of the construction of a building or any structural work in connection with a building, were included in the word factory. . . ."

Macaskie and E. W. Perkins, for the appellant.—The accident arose out of and in the course of the deceased man's employment. It took place when he was at work, at the place where he was at work, and by the machine on which he was at work. The facts and probabilities all show that the deceased was in the course of his employment when the accident happened. In Smith v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., ante, p. 146, [1899] 1 Q. B. 141, the workman was killed while jumping off the footboard of a train in motion on to which he had got for his own pleasure and not for any object of the defendants; and in Lowe v. Pearson, ante, p. 193, [1899] 1 Q. B. 261, the workman was injured when attempting to clean a machine with which he had nothing to do and which he was told not to touch. Those cases, therefore, are quite different from the present. Even supposing the deceased man in the present case had been endeavouring, contrary to his orders, to go to the mortar-pan by passing under the shaft and out of the small door, it would still be in the course of his employment, as it was his duty to go to the mortar-pan.

Ruegg, Q.C., and A. Powell, for the respondents.—The county court judge was right when he held that the appellant had failed to prove that the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment. The appellant had to prove this, and if she left it in doubt she failed. If the deceased was attempting to go out by the small door, he was doing that which he was forbidden to do, and in such a case the accident could not be said to have arisen out of and in the course of the employment. The whole of the circumstances were left in doubt, and the appellant must fail. Secondly, there was no "employment" within the Act. This is not a "factory" within section 7 of the Act of 1897. Sub-section 2 of that section defines "factory" as having the same meaning as in the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1878 to 1891, and also includes any dock, wharf, quay, warehouse, machinery, or plant to which any provision of the Factory Acts is applied by the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895. It is admitted that this shed is not a factory within the Factory Acts, 1878 to 1891. To make it a "factory" it must come within the second part of the sub-section, but that part obviously refers to section 23, sub-section 1 (a), of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, where the language is almost the same, and not to sub-section 1 (b), which relates to premises containing certain machinery. The material words in the definition of "factory" in section 7, sub-section 2, of the Act of 1897 are "machinery or plant," which refers to machinery or plant described in section 23, sub-section 1 (a), of the Act of 1895—that is, machinery or plant used in the process of loading or unloading to or from a wharf, &c. [ROMER, L.J.—Section 23 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, applies certain provisions as to dangerous machines as if (sub-section 1 (b)) any premises on which certain machinery was were included in the word factory. Does not section 7, sub-section 2, of the Act of 1897 make the machinery to which those provisions are applied a "factory"?] The machinery is machinery used in loading or unloading to or from a wharf, &c. That exhausts the machinery to which the definition applies. Nor was there a building being constructed on which machinery was being used within the latter part of section 7, sub-section 1, of the Act of 1897. The shed was not being constructed. The machinery must be on the building which is being constructed: Mellor v. Tomkinson, ante, p. 240, [1899] 1 Q. B. 374. The post-office was being constructed, but the machinery was not "on" it. The word "on" means something closer than "about": Powell v. Brown, ante p. 145, [1899] 1 Q. B. 157. These temporary sheds were never intended to be included in the section.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—In this case the appellant is the widow of a deceased workman. The deceased man was employed by the defendants to work an engine which was used for grinding mortar in a mortar-pan close to the engine-house—the mortar being used in the erection of a post-office. What happened on the day in question was this: The deceased man went in the morning to start the engine, and his duty, after having done so, was to go to the mortar-pan. The deceased called out to a workman named Smith, who was at the mortar-pan, and asked him if he was ready, and upon being answered in the affirmative he started the engine, and in two minutes afterwards he was found caught in the shaft, and shortly afterwards he died. It is said that there was no evidence that the death was caused by an accident arising out of and in the course of the employment. In my opinion, anyone would say that the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment, because he started the engine, as it was his duty to do, and in two minutes afterwards he was found caught in the shaft. The county court judge said that it was consistent with the evidence that the deceased man might have been attempting to go out of the small door which he was forbidden to do, and, therefore, it was not proved that the accident arose out of the employment. I cannot agree with that view. That proposition comes to this, that when a workman goes by a wrong way from one part of his work to another, and is injured while doing so, the injury would not arise out of and in the course of his employment. The learned judge felt himself pressed by the decision in Smith v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. In that case the deceased man was collecting tickets from a train, and after having finished doing so he jumped on to the footboard of the train when it was in motion, and in getting off he was killed. The judge there found that "the deceased was not actually engaged in any act of service at the time of the accident, and did not get on the footboard for any object of his employers, but for his own pleasure." That was a finding of fact with which this court had to deal. Upon that finding we held that the accident did not arise out of the employment. We could have come to no other conclusion in face of that finding. In the present case, assuming the facts most hostilely to the appellant, assuming that the deceased man was on his way out of the small door, which was a wrong way for him to go out by, and that he acted rashly and negligently, that would not absolve the employer unless the workman was guilty of serious and wilful misconduct. The judge here has negatived serious and wilful misconduct. Therefore, putting the case most favourably for the employers, the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment.

I come now to the second point, which is an important one, and I agree with the decision of the judge upon this. It is said that the employment in which the deceased man was engaged was not an employment within the Act of 1897. Section 7, sub-section 1, defines the employments to which the Act applies, and the word "factory" is the material word in that definition. It is said that the employ- in this case was not in a "factory" within the meaning of that word. Now, "factory" is defined in sub-section 2 as having the same meaning as in the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1878 to 1891, and also as including any dock, wharf, quay, warehouse, machinery, or plant to which any provision of the Factory Acts is applied by the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895. Reading only that part of the definition which is material to the present case, it runs thus: Factory includes any machinery to which any provision of the Factory Acts is applied by the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895. Turning now to the Act of 1895, section 23 of that Act provides, by sub-section 1, that, amongst other things, the provisions of the Act with respect to the power to make orders as to dangerous machines shall have effect as if "(a) every dock, wharf, quay, and warehouse, and, so far as relates to the process of loading or unloading therefrom or thereto, all machinery and plant used in that process; and (b) any premises on which machinery worked by steam, water, or other mechanical power is temporarily used for the purpose of the construction of a building or any structural work in connection with a building" were included in the word factory. It seems to me that the Act treats the things mentioned in clauses (a) and (b) as included in the word "factory," to which the provisions of the Act with respect to the power to make orders as to dangerous machines are to apply. Turning back again to section 7, sub-section 2, of the Act of 1897, "factory" is defined as including any machinery to which any provision of the Factory Acts is applied by the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895. Why does not that apply to the machinery mentioned in section 23, sub-section 1 (a) and (b), of the Act of 1895?

Supposing a machine described in clause (b) were defective, would not justices have power to deal with that machine and to make an order in regard to it? To my mind they clearly could under section 4 of the Act of 1895. Therefore I think that the machinery in clauses (a) and (b) is brought within the Act of 1897 as a "factory," and the shed in this case comes within clause (b) as being "premises on which machinery worked by steam, water, or other mechanical power is temporarily used for the purpose of the construction of a building or any structural work in connection with a building." Therefore this engine, which was worked by steam, and which was temporarily used for the purpose of grinding mortar for the purpose of structural work in connection with a building, was machinery to which the provisions of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, with respect to the power to make orders as to dangerous machines applied, and was consequently itself a "factory" within the meaning of section 7 of the Act of 1897. Upon this point, therefore, I agree with the learned county court judge, though as we differ from him on the other point the appeal will be allowed.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The evidence showed that the deceased man's duty was to fire the boiler of the engine, to start the engine, to oil it, possibly to open the small door for ventilating purposes, and then to go out to the mortar-pan. The evidence showed that on the morning in question he started the engine, and about two minutes afterwards he was found involved in the machinery. The question is, Do these facts amount to evidence that the accident arose out of and in the course of the deceased man's employment? I agree that the onus of proving that lies upon the applicant. The question comes to this, Was there evidence to go to a jury that the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment, because, as it seems to me, the county court judge did not decide upon the evidence, but said that there was no evidence fit to leave to a jury that the accident so arose. In my opinion there was evidence. The highest that the case can be put against the deceased man is that he was going out of the shed after having started the engine by a dangerous way under the shaft. But it is plain that it was just as much part of his duty to go out of the shed as to go into it, and he was acting in the course of his employment in doing either. It must be remembered that the right of a workman to compensation under the Act of 1897 does not depend upon his proving negligence in the employer or in anyone for whose act the employer is responsible; nor is it any answer to a claim for compensation to prove that the workman has himself been guilty of negligence. If a workman shows that the accident arose out of and in the course of an employment within the Act, then the employer, to escape liability to pay compensation, must show that the injury was attributable to the serious and wilful misconduct of the workman. Negligence, therefore, is out of place in this consideration, and the applicant will recover if he can show that the accident arose out of and in the course of the workman's employment, even though the workman may have been guilty of negligence. I do not wish to say that there may not be such a negligent act causing the accident so entirely outside the employment that it could not be said that the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment at all. But here the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment, and if the deceased man was negligent at all, the negligence occurred in the course of the employment, and can be no answer to the claim.

I now come to the second point. Section 7, sub-section 1, specifies the employments to which the Act applies. There was no scaffolding used here, and I should have some difficulty in bringing this case within the words "any building . . . on which machinery driven by steam, water, or other mechanical power is being used for the purpose of the construction" thereof. It is not necessary to decide that question, because I have come to the conclusion that the case is covered by another part of the sub-section. By the sub-section the Act is to apply to employment on, in, or about a "factory." The question is whether this machine in this shed is a "factory" within the meaning of section 7. That leads us to examine this very extraordinary method of legislation. Section 7, sub-section 2, provides that "'Factory' has the same meaning as in the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1878 to 1891"—it is admitted that that part of the definition does not apply—"and also includes any dock, wharf, quay, warehouse, machinery, or plant to which any provision of the Factory Acts is applied by the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895," &c. That brings me to section 23 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895. That section applies to certain subject-matters some of the provisions of the Factory Acts, including the provisions of the Act of 1895 with respect to the power to make orders as to dangerous machines. The principle is that it treats certain things as factories for certain purposes, among other things, machinery used for loading or unloading to or from a dock, &c., is to be included in the word factory, and clause (b) includes in the word factory something else, which is not machinery alone—namely, premises on which machinery is temporarily used for a particular purpose. At first sight I was inclined to think that the premises must be constituted a factory within the Act of 1897, before the provisions of that Act can be applied to them. But as has been pointed out by Romer, L.J., though clause (b) does not constitute the machinery on the premises there specified a factory, it is an enactment applying the provisions of the Act as to dangerous machines to the machinery therein, as if the premises containing the machinery were themselves a factory. That explains why one must first get the factory before considering the machinery. That legislation leads to this result. By section 7, sub-section 2, of the Act of 1897, the word "factory" includes any machinery to which any provision of the Factory Acts is applied by the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895. In the Act of 1895 I find an enactment that premises on which certain machinery is are included in the word factory for the purpose of applying certain provisions of the Act to the machinery. To that machinery, therefore, certain provisions of the Act of 1895 are applied, and therefore the machinery itself becomes a "factory" within the definition of that word in section 7 of the Act of 1897. We have, therefore, a factory within a factory. By this indirect legislation this machinery in this shed, which is included in the word factory for certain purposes, is itself a factory. The deceased man, therefore, was at the time when he met the accident employed on or in or about a factory within the meaning of section 7 of the Act of 1897.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Part of the deceased man's duty was to attend to the engine, and probably it was his duty to clean it. I infer from the circumstances of this case that in going under the shaft the deceased man was acting in the course of his employment. Clearly it would be so if he went there to clean the engine. I think it would be so if he was on his way towards the small door, though he was told not to go out by that door, inasmuch as it was his duty to go to the mortar-pan. In doing so he was certainly not acting for his own pleasure. I have therefore come to the conclusion that the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment.

Upon the second point I will only add a few words. Section 7, sub-section 1, of the Act of 1897 includes within the Act employment on or in or about a "factory." Turning to the definition of a factory in sub-section 2 I find that it includes machinery to which any provision of the Factory Acts is applied by the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895. Turning to the Act of 1895, I find that premises on which machinery worked by steam, water, or other mechanical power is temporarily used in connection with a building are included for some purposes in the word factory. This engine shed was under that provision constituted a factory because it was being temporarily used for the purpose of the construction of a building, seeing that its principal if not sole existence was for the purpose of making mortar for the construction of the building. If that is so, the shed is a factory for the purpose of the application of some of the provisions of the Factory Acts, and it follows that the machinery in it was machinery to which the provisions of the Act of 1895 with respect to the power to make orders as to dangerous machines applied. The chain is complete, and the result is that this engine was a "factory" within section 7 of the Act of 1897.

REES v. THOMAS. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accidental injuries—Accident arising out of and in the course of the employment—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 1, sub-section 1.

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, it appeared that the workman, who was a fireman employed in a mine, while in the course of his employment saw a horse belonging to his employer running away, and tried to stop it, and in so doing was knocked over and killed.

Held, that this was a case of a servant, while in his master's employ, doing upon an emergency something outside the scope of what he was employed to do in the interests of his master, and as such was within section 1, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act.

Appeal from an award of the judge of the Bridgend County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant was the widow of the injured workman, who was a fireman in the employment of a mine-owner. One of his duties was from time to time to examine the mine and report as to its condition. On the day of the accident he had examined the mine and found it to be in a proper state, and it was then his duty to go to an office, which was half-a-mile distant from the pit's mouth, and there make a report in writing. Some trucks loaded with ashes were just about to start from the pit's mouth along a tramway in the direction of the office. The workman, contrary to one of the rules of the mine, got upon one of the trucks for the sake of a ride towards his destination. During the journey the horse which was drawing the trucks took fright and bolted. The workman jumped off the truck, and tried to stop the horse, and in so doing he was run over and killed.

The county court judge found that the accident was not attributable to any serious and wilful misconduct on the part of the workman within section 1, sub-section 2 (c), of the Workmen's Compensation Act, and held that the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment of the workman within sub-section 1, and he made an award in favour of the applicant.

The employer appealed.

Ruegg, Q.C., and Sankey, for the appellant.—The accident did not arise out of and in the course of the employment of the deceased. He saw a horse belonging to his master running away, and he very properly tried to stop it; but he could not do so at his master's expense, for he was not under any legal obligation to try to stop it. The risk he incurred was not a risk arising out of his employment. He acted as a mere volunteer. The applicant is bound to show that the accident arose out of work which, as between himself and his master, he has been engaged to perform and has contracted to perform.

They cited Lowe v. Pearson, ante, p. 193, [1899] 1 Q. B. 261. [A. L. SMITH, L.J., referred to McNicholas v. Dawson, ante, p. 500, [1899] 1 Q. B. 773.]

C. A. Cripps, Q.C., and W. D. Benson, for the respondent, were not called upon to argue.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The deceased was a fireman in a pit. On the day of the accident he had to take a report from the pit's mouth to the office of his master. He got on to a truck which was going along a tramway, which he had no right to do by the rules of the colliery; but the county court judge has found that in so doing he was not guilty of serious and wilful misconduct. While he was riding on the truck the horse ran away. He jumped off and tried to stop the horse, but he did not succeed, and he was killed. Did the injury arise out of and in the course of his employment? I am of opinion that it did. He was clearly in the course of his employment in taking his report to his master's office. It is said, however, that the injury did not arise out of the employment, because in trying to stop the runaway horse he was doing a voluntary act which he was under no legal obligation towards his master to do. I think this was a case of an emergency. The point was touched on in Lowe v. Pearson. In that case the claim to compensation was made by a boy, who was employed in the mere manual labour of making balls of clay and handing them to a woman who was working at a machine. He was expressly forbidden to touch the machinery, but he meddled with it and was injured. We held that that case was not within the Act, but I said this: "I wish to emphasise what the appellant's counsel said about this case not being one of an emergency. It is not the case of a servant, while in his master's employ, doing upon an emergency something outside the scope of what he was employed to do in the interests of his master. I reserve the question what our decision in such a case ought to be till it arises." The question has arisen now, and, in my opinion, this case is within the Act.

WOOD v. WALSH & SONS. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accidental injuries—Employment—Building being "repaired by means of a scaffolding"—Painting outside of house by means of ladders—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7, sub-section 1.

on, in, or about any building exceeding thirty feet in height which is either being "constructed or repaired by means of a scaffolding."

Held, that painting the outside of a building by means of ladders, including the preparation of the surface for painting, is not "repairing" the building by means of a "scaffolding" within the meaning of section 7, sub-section 1, of the Act.

Appeal from the decision of the Leeds County Court judge upon a case stated by an arbitrator appointed to settle a claim for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The claimant, the respondent, was the widow of a deceased workman who, at the time of the accident, was in the employment of the appellants, who were painters and decorators. The deceased man was employed with several other workmen in preparing the outside of a house, over thirty feet in height, for painting by removing the dirt and blisters, and making good the woodwork with putty and the stonework with hall-plaster or cement, and afterwards in painting the surface. Nothing was being done to the building except preparation for painting and the actual painting. There were five or six ladders on the job. On one of the ladders a plank was fixed with one end resting on a window-sill of the building and the other end upon a rung of the ladder and tied to the ladder, and one of the workmen used this plank to stand upon when at work. The deceased man did not stand upon this plank. The deceased man was standing upon a rung of one of the ladders, 33 feet long, which was resting against the wall, and was engaged in painting and puttying, when the rung broke, and he fell down and was killed. The compensation, if any, was agreed at £237 17s. The arbitrator held that the deceased man was not employed on, in, or about a building which was "either being constructed or repaired by means of a scaffolding" within the meaning of section 7, sub-section 1 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, the painting not being repairs, and neither the ladders alone nor the arrangement of ladder and plank constituting a scaffolding within the meaning of the Act. He accordingly made his award in favour of the employers subject to two questions of law which he submitted for the decision of the county court judge: (1) Whether the building was being "repaired" within the meaning of the Act, and (2) if so, whether it was being repaired by means of a "scaffolding" within the meaning of the Act.

The county court judge reversed the decision of the arbitrator upon both points, and made his award in favour of the claimant for £237 17s.

The employers appealed.

C. A. Russell, Q.C., and Clarke Hall, for the appellants.—Ordinary painting is not repairing within the meaning of section 7, sub-section 1, of the Act of 1897. The words of that sub-section are "repaired by means of a scaffolding." That shews that the kind of repairs intended are repairs of a structural character, and not repairs of a merely decorative character. The words "constructed or repaired by means of a scaffolding" occur in the schedule to the Notice of Accidents Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 28), and in the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 37), s. 23, sub-section 2 (a). Secondly, the ladders were clearly not "scaffolding" within the meaning of the Act. Nor was the arrangement of ladder and plank a "scaffolding": see 1 Parker's Glossary of Architecture, "scaffold"; Century Dictionary, "scaffolding." In so far as these are questions of fact, the arbitrator has found as a fact that neither the ladders nor the arrangement of ladder and plank constituted a "scaffolding." Even if the arrangement of ladder and plank was a "scaffolding," the mere fact that one small part of the building was being repaired by means of what might be called a scaffolding did not show that the building was being repaired by means of a scaffolding. The decision of the county court judge was therefore wrong.

Robert Wallace, Q.C., and Horace Marshall, for the respondent.—"Repair" within the meaning of this Act means the restoration of a house to a condition fit for use and occupation. Here the painting was not of a mere decorative character. The woodwork and stonework were being repaired, and the building was being restored to its proper condition. This work was necessary to prevent the woodwork from decaying, and would be required under a covenant in a lease to repair and keep in repair. Secondly, the ladders were a "scaffolding" within the meaning of this Act. A scaffolding means anything used outside a building for the purpose of construction or repair. The word is used in its popular and not in its technical sense. If the thing is necessary and suitable for the purpose it is a scaffolding. Section 23, sub-section 2 (a), deals with dangerous employments, and it is immaterial in this connection whether ladders are used or a regular scaffolding. If, however, the ladders are not a scaffolding, the arrangement of ladder and plank was. A painter's boat would be a scaffolding within the meaning of this Act. The learned judge was therefore right.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—An argument has been frequently used in these cases that if we do not give a certain interpretation to the Act the effect will be to shut out a number of workmen from its benefits. That may or may not be so. All we have to do is to construe the Act according to the language used in it. But this I may say, that the Act on its face does not intend to include all workmen in its scope. Only certain workmen are brought within its scope, and the rest are left outside. What we have to consider is, whether the present case comes within the Act. The deceased man was employed in painting the outside of a house, and the work of painting was being done by means of ladders. In one case a plank was fastened at one end to a ladder and the other end rested on a window-sill, but the deceased man did not use this plank for doing his work. He was standing on the rung of one of the ladders, when the rung broke and he fell and was killed.

Now, I can entertain no doubt that the Legislature, when it passed this Act, knew well what was conveyed by the words "ladder" and "scaffolding." Nor can I have any doubt that they knew well what was conveyed by the terms "painting" and "repairing." To my mind, though section 7, sub-section 1, of the Act is in many ways a very difficult section to construe, it presents no difficulty in the present case. The house which was being painted was over thirty feet in height, and so far came within the section. The first question we have to consider is whether it was being "constructed or repaired." Is painting the outside of a house construction or repair? Clearly it is not construction. Is it, then, repair? In my opinion ordinary outside painting is not repairing. The arbitrator has stated in the case that nothing was being done to the building except preparation for painting and the actual painting. If the Legislature had intended to include ordinary painting, it would have said so in clear language. On the contrary, the Legislature has used language which seems to me to be perfectly clear—namely, "constructed or repaired," and to my mind painting cannot be brought within those terms. The next question is as to the meaning of the word "scaffolding." Can it be said that the ladders which are used in the work of painting constituted a scaffolding within the meaning of the Act? To my mind no one would say that repairs which were done by means of ladders were done by means of a scaffolding. Again I say that if the Legislature had intended any such thing it would have said so. It has confined the enactment to repairs done by means of a "scaffolding," and I cannot think that repairs done by means of ladders come within that term. It was then said that the arrangement of the ladder and the plank constituted a scaffolding. That seems to me to be a question of fact. As I foresee that many appeals will be brought before us raising the question as to whether a particular structure is or is not a scaffolding, I think it best not to attempt to define the meaning of the word "scaffolding." In this case the arbitrator has found upon the facts that this arrangement of ladder and plank is not a scaffolding. That disposes of that point. For these reasons I do not think that this building was being either constructed or repaired by means of a scaffolding within the meaning of section 7, sub-section 1, of the Act, and the decision of the county court judge must therefore be reversed, and the award of the arbitrator restored.

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accidental injuries—Employment on or in or about a factory—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7, sub-section 1.

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, it was proved that the applicant sustained personal injury in the course of his employment as a carter whilst delivering sacks of flour a mile and a-half away from his employers' factory.

The county court judge held that the employment of the applicant at the time of the accident was not "on or in or about a factory" within section 7, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

Held, that the decision of the county court judge must be affirmed.

Powell v. Brown, ante, p. 145, [1899] 1 Q. B. 157, referred to.

Appeal from the decision of the judge of the Sheffield County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant sustained personal injury in the course of his employment as carter for the respondents, who were millers, while he was delivering sacks of flour taken from the respondents' factory on their dray. The accident happened at a distance of a mile and a-half from the respondents' factory. The county court judge held that the employment was not on, in, or about a factory at the time of the accident within the meaning of section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, and adjudged that the applicant was not entitled to compensation.

The applicant appealed.

Arthur Sims, for the applicant.—The word "about" in section 7, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act is not limited to mere physical proximity: Powell v. Brown, ante, p. 145, [1899] 1 Q. B. 157. It bears the meaning of "relating to." The Act applies to employment on or in or relating to a factory.

Ruegg, Q.C., and Arthur Powell, for the employers, were not called upon to argue.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This seems to me to be a plain case. The Workmen's Compensation Act has limitations, though it has conferred enormous benefit on employés at the expense of their masters. Section 7, sub-section 1, says that the Act shall apply only to employment on or in or about a railway, factory, &c. Here the employment at the time of the accident was a mile and a-half away from the factory. Is that about a factory? I adhere to what I said in Powell v. Brown that the word "about" means that the employment may be in close propinquity to the factory, and whether that was so in any particular case is a question of fact to be determined by the tribunal before which the claim comes. There the accident happened close to the factory, and the facts showed that the workman was employed in a way which reasonably brought him within the Act. Here the county court judge found that what happened a mile and a-half away from the factory did not happen about the factory. I think the learned judge was right. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

Fraudulent conveyance—Assignment of policy and investment of money on mortgage—Protection of creditors—Administration following assets—Injunction—13 Eliz. c. 5.

The court has jurisdiction before judgment in an administration action to secure, for the benefit of creditors, the proceeds of moneys which have been received under a deed which is impeached as void by virtue of 13 Eliz. c. 5.

This was a motion in an administration action for payment into court by the defendant, Mrs. Dalzel, of the proceeds of two policies of assurance received by her, or, in the alternative, for a receiver.

The facts were as follows: In 1890 and 1894 the testator effected insurances on his own life; he assigned them to his niece, the defendant Mrs. Dalzel, and notice was given to the insurance companies, so that under the provisions of the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25 (6) the legal title passed to her. The testator died in 1895. In April and May, 1895, the policy-moneys were received on Mrs. Dalzel's behalf by her brother and were invested by him on mortgage for her with other moneys which she handed to him. The testator's will was not proved until the 6th of June, 1895. His estate proved to be insufficient, and the present action was brought on behalf of the plaintiffs and all other creditors of the testator, alleging that the assignments to Mrs. Dalzel are void under the statute 13 Eliz. c. 5.

Upjohn, Q.C., and Hon. T. H. Watson, for the plaintiffs.—Mrs. Dalzel is an executrix de son tort or a constructive trustee; the property in question is assets, and is impressed with a trust. If the policy-money were in the hands of the insurance company I could ask for an injunction to prevent payment. Mrs. Dalzel is in a fiduciary capacity.

They referred to 13 Eliz. c. 5; Lister v. Stubbs, 38 W. R. 548, 45 Ch. D. 1; Shears v. Rogers, 3 B. & Ad. 362.

Jenkins, Q.C., and Dunham, for the defendants.—The property passed to Mrs. Dalzel by assignment. The money has been received and disposed of; it no longer exists. The statute 13 Eliz. c. 5 is not founded on any doctrine of trusts. The motion was not brought within a reasonable time. An assignee under a deed which is void is not a trustee. The highest right of the plaintiffs is to rank as creditors against the assignee or her estate; there is no right to follow the property.

They referred to Lister v. Stubbs.

Borthwick, for the executrix.

Upjohn, Q.C., replied.

STIRLING, J., after stating the facts, continued: All that is sought is an undertaking by Mrs. Dalzel not to deal with the mortgages or the principal money thereby secured until trial, without notice to the plaintiffs. Mrs. Dalzel resists on the ground that there is no jurisdiction to grant an injunction or appoint a receiver.

The statute confers on creditors legal rights: In re Maddever, 33 W. R. 286, 27 Ch. D. 523. As against creditors an assignment within the statute is void both at law and in equity, and the property comprised in it is to be treated as being that of the testator at the time of his death: see Bethel v. Stanope, Cro. Eliz. 810; Shears v. Rogers. In the latter case Littledale, J., says the creditors "had a right to the property which the deed purported to convey, and might enforce that right at law. The assignment was void as soon as the creditors claimed to treat it as such, though not until then." Paterson, J., points out that the assignee becomes by intermeddling with the property after the death of the assignor, executor de son tort, and chargeable by the creditors in respect of the property taken by him under the assignment. This view was approved by Kindersley, V.C., in Shee v. French, 5 W. R. 386, 3 Drew. 716. Although the rights of the creditors are legal, the courts of equity assist them by giving such equitable remedies as are not given by courts of law. Thus there are many cases in which, after the death of a debtor, deeds void under the statute have been set aside at the instance of creditors and the property comprised therein administered for their benefit: see, for example, Adames v. Hallett, L. R. 6 Eq. 468, 16 W. R. Ch. Dig. 99; Taylor v. Coenen, 1 Ch. D. 636, 24 W. R. Dig. 262. The court seems to have adopted the same course as is taken with reference to assets by descent: see Pimm v. Insall, 2 Sc. & G. 449. The question here is whether the court will grant any relief before judgment. On principle it seems to me that such relief may be given. The assignments become void the moment the creditors claimed to treat them as such; therefore the property comprised in them ceased, as against creditors, to be the property of the assignee and became assets for payment of the creditors. Why, then, in a proper case should not the court interfere to secure the property for the benefit of the creditors? Indeed it was not disputed in argument that if the money paid over by the insurance companies existed in specie the court might lay hold of it; but it was said that it has been dealt with by the assignee, and all that the creditors are entitled to is a judgment at the trial that the assignee shall make good to the creditors the amount received. I do not think this argument is well founded. Though the fund paid over no longer exists in specie it is still in the hands or under the control of the assignee, and can be traced, and it seems to me that the court has jurisdiction to secure it for the benefit of the plaintiffs. If the assignee is to be regarded as an executor de son tort, there would be jurisdiction, I apprehend, in a properly constituted action to restrain him from dealing with assets under his control to the prejudice of the persons legally entitled.

Reliance was placed on Lister v. Stubbs. The basis of the decision in that case was that until judgment was given, the money in the hands of the defendant could not be treated as the money of the plaintiff. Here, according to the law as stated by Littledale, J., the assignments became void when the plaintiffs asserted their claim, and thenceforward a legal right on the part of the plaintiffs to have their debts satisfied out of the fund existed. On the whole, it seems to me that the defendant Mrs. Dalzel ought not to be allowed to deal with these mortgages except with the consent of the plaintiffs or the sanction of the court.

MCFARLANE v. HULTON & CO. (a.)

Newspaper—Publication—Agreement not to "publish"—"Sporting" paper.

A newspaper is published when and where it is offered to the public, and may be published at more than one place at the same time. A newspaper which excludes racing and betting intelligence is not a "sporting paper" within the meaning of an agreement framed to protect the copyright of papers specially connected with horse-racing.

The plaintiff, who carried on business at 48, Fleet-street, in 1886 purchased from the defendants the copyright in a newspaper called Bell's Life in London, and in a book called "Festiana." The agreement for sale contained the following clauses: "(3) The vendors will not, nor will either of them, do or suffer anything whereby their offices and premises at 31, Bouverie-street may at any time during the term for which they are at present entitled to the same be used for the purpose of printing and publishing any sporting paper. (4) The vendors will nor will either of them print or publish, or cause to be printed or published, or permit their or either of their names to be used in connection with any sporting paper or periodical within ten miles of Bouverie-street aforesaid." At the date of the agreement the defendants carried on business in premises at Manchester, which was their main office, and had also an office in Bouverie-street, London. They were the owners and publishers of two newspapers, the Sporting Chronicle a daily paper, and the Athletic News, a weekly paper, both published before 1886 in addition to the paper they sold. In 1887 they started a third paper, the Sporting Chronicle Weekly Handicap Book. All these papers were printed in Manchester. They still continued their office in London, but after the agreement removed it from Bouverie-street, and again in the year 1897 they removed to their present premises, No. 68, Fleet-street. On these premises, which were opposite to the premises of the plaintiff, were painted the words, "Sporting Chronicle and Athletic News Advertising and Publishing Office."

The plaintiff was the proprietor of a daily newspaper called the Sporting Life, devoted to sports of all kinds, and a weekly paper called the Sporting Life Racing Guide, containing records of horse-racing. After the purchase he incorporated Bell's Life in London with the Sporting Life. He alleged that what the defendants were doing was in breach of clause 4 of the agreement, and asked for an injunction against the defendant Hulton in the terms of that clause, the other defendant having died during the action. The defendant denied that he published the papers in London, and that the Athletic News was a "sporting" paper. It was admitted that the papers were not printed within the prohibited limits. The course of business with regard to the publication and sale of the defendants' papers was as follows: The Sporting Chronicle was printed at Manchester in time for the midnight train from Manchester to Euston. This midnight edition was often, if not always, different from that which is sold at Manchester in the morning, inasmuch as late news arriving after midnight is inserted in the Manchester issue. Parcels of the Sporting Chronicle thus printed were sent together to Mr. Healey, a distributing agent, who received them at Euston and delivered them to the various persons to whom they were addressed. Amongst several parcels was one addressed to the Sporting Chronicle, and this was delivered before business hours at the defendants' office in Fleet-street. On the days when the two weekly periodicals were issued at Manchester they were likewise included in the parcel. The parcel thus delivered to the defendants at their office in Fleet-street varied in its contents, but the average number of copies was as follows: Sporting Chronicle, 50 to 100 per day; Athletic News, 400 to 2,500 per week; Handicap Book, 400 to 500 per week. These figures represented only a small portion of the total circulation. The copies so delivered were used partly for the purpose of exchange with other papers, partly for filing, and to a considerable extent for sale, and mostly, if not entirely, at trade prices. The learned judge found that substantially the business done in Bouverie-street in 1886 was business of the same nature as that being done in Fleet-street.

Eve, Q.C., and Woodfin, for the plaintiffs.—The papers are published in Fleet-street as well as in Manchester. A paper is published whenever offered for sale to the public by the proprietor. The Newspaper Libel and Registration Act, 1881, c. 60, s. 1, uses the term "publication" as equivalent to being "dispersed." Many newspapers state several places as being where they are published. The defendants have rightly called their office a "publishing office" in the notice upon it.

Astbury, Q.C., and Ashton Cross, for the defendant.—A paper cannot be published in more than one place at the same time, except where some provision is made for simultaneous publication. These newspapers were published once for all in Manchester, and publication was exhausted there. Publication in the ordinary sense has not the same meaning as when the word is used with reference to the law of libel. At any rate the defendants did not publish the papers except in Manchester, as they belonged to the distributing agent as soon as delivered to the carriers at Manchester. The Athletic News is not a "sporting paper" within the meaning of the covenant, being devoted to amateur sports only. The plaintiffs are guilty of such delay that they are not entitled to relief.

Eve, Q.C., replied.

April 18.—COZENS-HARDY, J.—The plaintiff alleges that this is a breach of clause 4 of the agreement, and there are two questions which arise for my decision. In the first place, are the defendants "publishing" their papers in Fleet-street; and in the second place, is the Athletic News a "sporting paper or periodical" within the meaning of the clause? What is the meaning of "publishing" a newspaper? It is plainly something different from printing it. I see no reason why a newspaper should not be published in more than one place. In fact my attention has been called to two well-known newspapers which are expressly stated to be published in several towns. I refer to the North British Daily Mail and the Western Morning News. At the end of the North British Daily Mail there is printed the following note: "Printed by the Mail Newspapers (Limited), and published at Glasgow, 102 to 114, Union-street; Edinburgh, 4, St. Giles-street; Greenock, Municipal-buildings; Paisley, 4, County-place; London, 190, Fleet-street." And at the end of the Western Morning News the following words appear: "Printed and published by Ernest Croft, for the Western Morning News Co. (Limited), at the publishing offices, 31, George-street, Plymouth; 45, Fore-street, Devonport; 27, High-street, Exeter; and 10, St. Nicholas-street, Truro."

It seems to me that a paper is published when and where it is offered to the public by the proprietor. Webster's definition of the word is as follows: "To send forth as a book, newspaper, musical piece, or other printed work either for sale or for general distribution." I received, at the request of both parties, evidence from persons engaged in the newspaper trade as to the meaning of the word "publish." I doubt whether such evidence was admissible, and it was so conflicting that it has in no way assisted me. I have endeavoured to ascertain the meaning of the word irrespective of this evidence, and I have come to the conclusion that where a newspaper proprietor has two offices, one in Manchester and the other in London, at each of which he offers for sale or distribution copies of his papers, the paper is "published" at each office. I cannot forget that the defendants themselves described their office in Fleet-street as a "publishing office"; and although this circumstance would not suffice to make it a publishing office if it were clearly not so, I think in a case of doubt it is not unreasonable to hold that the defendants have rightly described what they do in Fleet-street. It can make no difference that since action brought they have painted out the words "publishing office." It follows that, in my judgment, the defendants are acting in breach of clause 4 of the agreement.

It remains to consider whether the Athletic News is a "sporting paper" within the meaning of clause 4. The covenant was for the protection of the copy right and goodwill of the papers which were sold, and regard must be had to this circumstance in interpreting the clause. Now, the Athletic News contains no racing intelligence, and no betting odds, and is merely a record of amateur sports, such as cricket, football, cycling, running, &c. It in no way resembles Bell's Life or the Sporting Life. It appeals to a different section of the public. It undoubtedly is devoted to "sports" in one sense of the word, but upon the whole I do not think that a paper which deliberately excludes all racing and betting intelligence is a "sporting paper" within the meaning of clause 4. [His lordship also held the plaintiff was not guilty of laches.] The result is I must grant an injunction as prayed as to the Sporting Chronicle and the Handicap Book, but not as to the Athletic News.

In re AFRICAN GOLD CONCESSIONS AND DEVELOPMENT CO.
MARKHAM AND DARTER'S CASE. (a.)

Company—Contract—Shares—Shares issued as fully paid—Filed contract—Consideration—Sufficiency of identification—Estoppel—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 25.

It is sufficient to satisfy section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, if an enforceable contract is filed, which states with reasonable plainness the nature of the consideration which is substituted for cash, although it may not be a complete identification.

A statement in a share certificate that the shares are fully paid is not a representation that a sufficient contract has been filed under section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, so as to estop the liquidator from denying it.

The applicants claimed to have their names re-inserted in the list of contributories of the company as holders of fully-paid shares.

In 1892 one Osborne had obtained a concession of mining rights from the Cape Government over a certain district in South Africa. Being in want of capital to work these rights the applicants assisted him with money, taking an interest in the property as security, and forming with Osborne and one Webster a private syndicate called the Osborne Syndicate. It was agreed that Osborne should come over to England and sell the property there to a company, receiving the purchase-money either in fully-paid shares or cash as he should choose, and for this purpose the members of the syndicate gave him a power of attorney authorizing him to do so, and to receive the consideration on behalf of the principals.

Osborne came to England, and without informing the other members of the syndicate formed a company in England called the Homtini Syndicate (Limited) to take over the property and sell it at a greatly increased price to a company, which was to be formed for the purpose of purchasing it—this company being the one now in liquidation. This was effected by three contracts, by the first of which, dated the 6th of December, 1894, and made between the Homtini Syndicate of the one part and one Henry Harris as trustee of the company, thereinafter called "the intended company," of the other part, it was agreed, inter alia, as follows:

"That the vendors shall sell and the intended company shall purchase all the estate, right, title, and interest of the vendors of and in the premises known as Millwood, in the Cape Colony of South Africa.

"2. As to the consideration for the said sale the said Henry Harris, as trustee for the said intended company, shall, on or before the 15th day of December inst., allot to the vendors, or as they may direct, 22,500 fully-paid shares of 10s. each in the said intended company . . . and shall also allot to the vendors, or as they may direct, 277,493 shares of 10s. each . . . upon each of which . . . shares the sum of 8s. shall be deemed to have been paid.

"9. The said intended company shall procure an agreement respecting the allotment of such shares to be duly filed in the joint-stock registry, and upon the adoption of this agreement by the said intended company the said Henry Harris shall be discharged from all liability hereunder."

This contract was never filed with the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies.

The second contract was dated the 12th of December, 1894, and made between the Homtini Syndicate of the one part and the company of the other part, and provided for the allotment to the syndicate of the above-mentioned shares "as mentioned in an agreement dated the 6th of December, 1894" (being the agreement recited above), and continued, "In consideration of the allotment of such shares as aforesaid the vendors will forthwith thereafter give to the company possession of the premises more particularly mentioned in the said agreement. In all other respects the said agreement is hereby confirmed.

The third contract was dated the 19th of December, 1894, and made between the company of the one part and the Homtini Syndicate of the other part, and contained the following clauses:

"In consideration of the . . . syndicate agreeing to give the . . . company immediate possession of the lands and premises situate in the mining district of Millwood, in Cape Colony, of South Africa, more particularly mentioned and referred to in an agreement dated the 6th of December, 1894, made between the . . . syndicate of the one part and Henry Harris . . . as trustee for the . . . company of the other part, the said . . . company shall forthwith allot to the said . . . syndicate, or to their nominee or nominees, 22,500 fully-paid shares of 10s. each in the said . . . company to be numbered 8 to 22,507, both inclusive, and for all purposes the said shares shall be deemed fully-paid shares in the said company.

"The said syndicate shall, with all possible expedition, procure the lands and premises to become vested in the . . . company free from all incumbrances according to the law in force for the time being of the said mining district of Millwood."

A third clause provided for the transfer of water rights to the company.

No mention was made in this contract to the partly-paid shares mentioned in that of the 6th of December.

These last two contracts were filed before the shares were allotted.

The applicants knew nothing about these transactions, or even of the formation of the Homtini Syndicate. In 1895 they handed over the title-deeds of the property to one Bass, on his producing the power of attorney and claiming to be the purchaser from Osborne. Later on they received, as members of the Osborne Syndicate, certificates and shares in the company. Each of the applicants received certificates for 1,406 ten-shilling shares. Each certificate stated, "there has been paid up to this date, in respect to each of such shares, the sum of 10s."

The company was now being wound up. The liquidator had obtained leave to have the applicants' names removed from the list of contributories as fully-paid shareholders, and to state that nothing had been paid in respect of the shares held by them.

The applicants thereupon took out this summons that their names might be reinstated in the list of contributories as holders of fully paid-up shares.

Buckley, Q.C., and A. W. Rowden, for the applicants.—The liquidator is estopped from denying either that the shares were paid for in cash, or that a sufficient contract was filed before the shares were allotted: In re Building Estates Brickfields Co., Parbury's case, 44 W. R. 107, [1896] 1 Ch. 100; Bloomenthal v. Ford, 45 W. R. 449 [1897], A. C. 156. If a sufficient contract had been filed the shares would have been paid for, and the certificates stated that they were fully paid. A sufficient contract was filed. The document of the 6th of December, which sets out the consideration fully and was not filed, is not a contract at all, for it was made with a person purporting to be trustee for a company which was non-existent when the contract was made. The first contract filed, that of the 12th of December, may not be sufficient: Karaskhoma Exploring and Prospecting Syndicate, 46 W. R. 37, [1897] 2 Ch. 451. But the second filed contract dated the 19th of December states the consideration, and by reference to the covenant of the 6th of December identifies the property and states the consideration with sufficient clearness to satisfy section 25: In re S. Frost & Co., ante p. 27, [1898] 2 Ch. 556. The contracts are filed in order that the nature of the bargain may be known. That has been done here.

Jenkins, Q.C., and R. J. Quain, for the liquidator.—The filed documents are not sufficient; if you searched the register they would be misleading. The true facts of the bargain are to be found in the documents—only two of which are on the register. This is fatal. The liquidator is not estopped. The applicants knew that cash had not been paid, and the fact that the certificates say that the shares were fully paid cannot mean that a sufficient contract had been filed. Bloomenthal v. Ford and In re Building Estates Brickfields Co., Parbury's case, are distinguishable.

Buckley, Q.C., replied.

Jan. 14.—WRIGHT, J.—(After stating the facts, continued:) The earlier of these two filed contracts may not be sufficient for the purpose of section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, because there is no indication of the nature of the "premises" except the reference to an agreement, which is not identified except by a statement of the parties to it, or in any other manner except a date; but I express no opinion on this point. If the later contract is sufficient in form, I do not see that the earlier is material, except in so far as it might lead to the conclusion that the latter does not state the real contract as it stood when the shares were issued. No explanation is given of the omission from the later contract of the 277,493 partly-paid shares, but I do not think that the existence of this discrepancy is of itself enough to justify such a conclusion. The real question is whether the second document filed satisfies the language of section 25: "Every share in any company shall be deemed and taken to have been issued and to be held subject to the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash, unless the same shall have been otherwise determined by a contract duly made in writing and filled," &c. In the present case there is in the documents of the 6th and 19th of December together a contract, or note, or memorandum in writing such as would satisfy the Statute of Frauds, but the filed contract might not have been sufficient by itself to identify the subject-matter without the aid of the previous agreement of the 6th of December to which it refers for identification. Is it necessary under section 25 that there should be a complete identification within the four corners of the filed contract, or is it enough if the filed contract states plainly the nature of the consideration and supplies the means of identification as in the present case? The question is left open in the Karaskhoma case, where the only statement of the consideration was a mention of an unfiled contract and the words "for the consideration therein mentioned," and there was, therefore, on the face of the filed contract, nothing to show whether the consideration in the unfiled contract was cash or what else it was. All the lords justices reserved the consideration of the degree of particularity with which the consideration must be stated, but two of them appear to express an inclination of opinion that it may be enough to state the nature of the consideration. In In re Maynards (Limited), 46 W. R. 346, [1898] 1 Ch. 515, the filed contract stated the consideration merely by reciting that by a former agreement between the vendor and the company (which was not filed) it was "agreed that the vendor should sell and the company . . . should purchase . . . (a) the business and property mentioned in the first part of the schedule thereto, and (b) the leasehold hereditaments and tenancies, short particulars of which are set out in the second schedule thereto." Kekewich, J., expressed an opinion (guarded by an observation that the point had not been fully argued) that this was insufficient, but without indicating what further degree of particularity was requisite. In In re Frost & Co., ante p. 27, the filed contract stated the consideration only by reciting that by a former agreement between the vendor and the company it had been agreed that "the vendor should sell and the company should purchase certain leasehold messuages, shops, and premises, and that he should grant to the company and the company would accept the lease of certain other premises, and that the vendor should sell and the company should purchase all the goodwill of the several businesses carried on by the vendor upon the same respective premises, together with all the machinery, plant, horses, vans, carts, fixtures, and fittings used in connection with the said several businesses as therein mentioned." Here there obviously was not without the aid of the unfiled contract or of parol evidence anything to identify the shops or premises; but my brother Romer held the filed contract sufficient. He was apparently of opinion that the filed contract by itself would have satisfied the Statute of Frauds. However that may be, I do not think that Romer, J., meant that a filed contract cannot be sufficient for the purposes of section 25 unless it would without the aid of the unfiled contract satisfy the Statute of Frauds. On the contrary, I understand him to mean that if the real nature of the consideration is disclosed, that may be enough, although the details can be ascertained only by other evidence, and I adopt that view. I apprehend that the filed contract in the present case might, so far as the certainty of description is concerned, have been sufficient for the purposes of specific performance: see the cases collected in Sir E. Fry's book, sections 325 et seq., and Plant v. Bourne, 46 W. R. 59, [1897] 2 Ch. 281. I have come to the conclusion that in the present case the filed contract may be a contract in writing determining that the payment for the shares shall be otherwise than in cash, notwithstanding that evidence beyond the writing itself is necessary for complete identification, provided the writing clearly explains, as this one does, what is the nature of the consideration which is to be substituted for cash and supplies the means of identification. It is true that the means of identification which are in this case supplied may not be accessible to a person inspecting the filed contract. But neither would he in general be any the wiser if the filed contract described the particular properties by locality, name, and bounds. It seems to me to be enough if there is an enforceable contract in writing which states with reasonable plainness the nature of the consideration which is to be substituted for cash. Here the contract does contain such a statement; and it is enforceable, because it refers to a document which supplies all that is legally wanting for complete identification. If this view is right, it is not necessary to determine the other and much more important question which was first argued; but in case I am wrong on the first point, it will be necessary to determine the other question, and I think that I ought to express an opinion upon it. It is argued for the applicants that the statement in the certificates that the shares are fully paid estops the liquidator from denying both the fact of payment in cash and the sufficiency of the filed contract. As regards the fact of payment in cash, I think there cannot in this case be any estoppel. It is plain from Mr. Markham's affidavits (paragraph 10 of the earlier and paragraph 6 of the later) that the applicants were fully aware that they might get and did get from the company vendors' shares which had not been paid for in cash, but which were to be treated as fully paid in lieu of cash, as the consideration for their interest in the properties sold, and that in accepting the shares they did not at all rely upon the statement in the certificates as importing that the shares had in fact been paid for in cash. They knew that they had not paid cash, and they cannot have supposed that the company was making them a present of shares which someone else had paid for in cash. This excludes the application of Parbury's case. As regards the alleged estoppel against denial of sufficiency of a filed contract, I think there is no authority for it. It is not necessary to decide what would be the effect of an express representation by the certificate that a contract has been filed. Here there is no express representation that any contract has been filed. A contract has in fact been filed, though the certificate does not refer to it. It would be a strong thing to hold that a company, by a certificate stating that shares have been fully paid, warrants the sufficiency in law of a filed contract. Moreover, such a conclusion would, as it seems to me, nullify section 25. The very object of the section is to deal with cases in which certificates represent shares to have been paid. If that representation creates an estoppel against denial of the filing or sufficiency of a contract, I do not see in what case the section can operate, unless the shareholder is foolish enough (in that view) to examine the file for himself. It is said that the language of Lord Cairns in Burkinshaw v. Nicolls, 26 W. R. 819, 3 App. Cas. 1004, at p. 1,017, is an authority in favour of the applicants' contention. I do not so understand his language. When he there speaks of a representation that section 25 has been complied with, I understand him to mean complied with by payment in cash. Nor can I find in Bloomenthal v. Ford any suggestion that there can be any other estoppel in such a case than an estoppel against denial of payment in cash or of power to issue the shares. The result is that the application must be allowed, with costs. I will only add that, if I were compelled to hold this second filed contract insufficient, I should think that relief ought clearly to be granted under the Companies Act, 1898, unless the liquidator can show that there has been fraud or other matter of objection affecting the applicants.

Barker v. Palmer, 30 W. R. 59, 8 Q. B. D. 9, considered and followed.

Appeal from his Honour Judge Stonor sitting at the Brompton County Court.

In the action the plaintiff claimed £50 damages for alleged trespass. The defendant paid into court, more than five clear days before the hearing in accordance with the County Court Rules, the sum of £5 and proportionate costs with a denial of liability. At the trial before the learned judge and a jury on the 9th of December, a verdict was returned for the plaintiff for £5, and thereupon judgment was entered for the defendants with costs. The plaintiff then applied for a new trial on the ground of the inadequacy of the damages, but this was refused. On the 22nd of December the plaintiff made an application on notice to the learned county court judge to review his decision of the 9th of December as to costs on the ground that at the trial it was not mentioned that the payment of the £5 into court was made with a denial of the defendants' liability. Upon this application the learned judge amended his order of the 9th of December so far as it related to costs, in respect of which he made no order, and the defendants thereupon appealed.

Lewis Thomas, for the appellants, submitted that the learned judge had no jurisdiction to make the order of the 22nd of December, as he was functus officio.

Rockingham Gill, for the respondent, contended that whether the learned judge had jurisdiction to vary his order of the 9th of December or no, the Divisional Court had no power to review what he had done on the defendants' appeal because it was a question that should be brought before that court, if at all, by prohibition.

Lewis Thomas, in reply—Although the defendants might also have their remedy by prohibition that did not deprive them of their right to appeal against the order of the 22nd of December; Barker v. Palmer, 30 W. R. 59, 8 Q. B. D. 9.

DARLING, J.—I think it is quite clear that on the application of one of the parties to an action a county court judge has no jurisdiction to vary his judgment, and in this case his doing so amounted to his trying a case without a jury in which he had already given his decision on the findings of a jury. Whether he would have been right at the conclusion of the trial on the 9th of December to have made such an order as he made on the 22nd of December appears to me to be a doubtful question, but it is unnecessary for the purposes of this appeal to determine it, and I therefore purposely refrain from expressing any opinion which might be construed as a decision of mine on that question. It is perfectly clear that the order of the 9th of December was the order that the learned judge then intended to make, and the fact that on a subsequent application by one of the parties something was said which led him to alter the view he had previously taken of the matter and had embodied in the first order, gave him no jurisdiction to re-try the case and make a new and different order as to costs. Even assuming that this was a case in which a writ of prohibition could rightly have issued, that fact of itself in no way deprives the defendant of his right to bring the matter before this court by way of appeal. That appears clear from the decision in Barker v. Palmer (supra). The defendants' appeal must therefore be allowed with costs.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div.

In re FROST & FROST.
Ex parte THE OFFICIAL RECEIVER v. FROST.

Bankruptcy—Payment of dividends to assignee of debts —Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 58, 63, r. 225, form 126.

An assignee of debts in a bankruptcy cannot obtain payment of dividends on such debts from the trustee except by proving in place of the creditors who have assigned, or producing to the trustee written authorities from each of such creditors in accordance with form 126.

Appeal from an order of his Honour Judge Addison in the county court at Greenwich.

A receiving order was made against the firm of Frost & Frost on the 31st of December, 1887.

The trustee paid a dividend of 3s. 5½d. in the pound.

In 1898 the trustee was released, and the official receiver became trustee ex officio.

During the same year a sum of £16 came into the hands of the official receiver available for the payment of a further dividend on the joint estate.

Mrs. Frost, the respondent, who had, in October, 1897, bought up the claims of a number of the creditors for 2s. 6d. in the pound, applied to the official receiver for the payment of dividends on the claims she had bought.

The official receiver refused to pay Mrs. Frost, alleging that he could only pay dividends to creditors whose proofs were on the file, or persons duly authorized by such creditors to receive dividends for them in the prescribed form (form 126).

The county court judge ordered the official receiver to pay the dividends to Mrs. Frost.

The official receiver appealed.

Muir Mackenzie, for the appellant.—The official receiver can only pay a dividend to a creditor who has proved a debt—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 58, sub-section 1, "shall distribute dividends amongst the creditors who have proved"—or to persons authorized by creditors to receive them in the prescribed form (form 126): see also regulation 30 annexed to the Board of Trade Circular to Trustees in Bankruptcy.

Arthur Powell, for the respondent.—"Creditors" in section 58 should be used as including assignees of creditors; the executor of a deceased creditor, or the trustee of a bankrupt creditor would be entitled to dividends. Why should not the assignee of a creditor? The forms in the appendix to the Bankruptcy Act are not intended to be strictly followed: see rule 5.

WRIGHT, J.—The question before us is of some difficulty and importance. This lady is clearly entitled to these dividends, and the question is how she is to get them. No action lies for them; payment can only be enforced by virtue of the statute. There is no way of enforcing payment pointed out in the statute except section 63: "If the trustee refuses to pay any dividend the court may, if it thinks fit, order him to pay it, and also to pay out of his own money interest thereon for the time that it is withheld and the costs of the application." In considering this section, however, the court should look at the paramount intention of the Act, which seems to be that payment should only be made to persons having proofs on the file. If the trustee or official receiver had to deal in every case with assignments such as these the administration of the Bankruptcy Act might be clogged with inquiries of an embarrassing character. I think that an assignee should be allowed to prove in place of the creditors who have assigned their debts to him, unless he is able to get signed authorities from them to receive their dividends. I see no other point which we need decide.

BIGHAM, J.—The respondent is assignee of certain debts, and entitled in some way to receive dividends. She says that she is entitled to get cheques from the official receiver in her favour. I think section 58, sub-section 1, governs the case: "The trustee shall . . . distribute dividends amongst the creditors who have proved their debts." The respondent has not proved her debt, therefore she is not entitled to be paid. She has a right to require the cheques to the creditors to be handed over to her, or she very likely has a right to put a proof on the file to stand in place of the proofs of the creditors who have assigned to her. Then she will have proved her debt and complied with the requirements of section 58, sub-section 1.

FLOWERS v. CHAMBERS. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accidental injuries—Employment on, in, or about a factory—Dock—Employment on ship lying in dock—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7.

Employment on a ship lying in a dock is not employment on, in, or about the dock so as to come within the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

Appeal from an award of the judge of the Bow County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant was a labourer in the employment of a barge-owner and contractor, who undertook the work of discharging manure and refuse from cattle steamers. On the 1st of December, 1898, at 7 p.m., a cattle steamer was lying in the Victoria Docks, moored alongside the quay, and a barge was lying alongside the ship. The applicant was at work on the ship in the course of his employment, and was engaged in mooring the barge to the ship, in order that the work of discharging the ship's refuse into the barge might commence, when in consequence of the darkness he fell from the upper deck on to the lower deck, and was injured. The method adopted for removing and discharging the refuse was by means of picks and shovels, no machinery being used.

The county court judge made an award in favour of the applicant.

The employer appealed.

J. D. Crawford, for the appellant. — Since the award of the county court judge, the court has decided, in the case of Hall v. Snowdon, Hubbard, & Co., ante, p. 486, that a wharf on which no machinery is used is not a factory within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act. That case governs this case. A dock on which no machinery is used is not a factory within the meaning of the Act.

[A. L. SMITH, L.J.—There is the further question, whether, assuming this dock to be a factory within the Act, a ship in a dock comes within the terms "dock" as used in the definition of "factory" in section 7, sub-section 2. We left this question undecided in Woodham v. Atlantic Transport Co. (Limited), ante, p. 105, [1899] 1 Q. B. 15.]

Candy, Q.C., and Pocock, for the respondent.—If this dock is a factory within the meaning of the Act, then employment on a ship lying in the dock is employment on, in, or about a factory. Secondly, this dock is a factory, because it is a dock to which some of the provisions of the Factory Acts are applied by section 23 of the Factory Act, 1895—viz., the provisions with respect to accidents.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—We are now faced with a question which has been looming in the distance for some time, and which we have known that before long we should have to decide—viz., whether a man employed on a ship which is lying in a dock is employed on, in, or about the dock so as to come within the meaning of employment on, in, or about a factory. If it had been intended to bring ships within the purview of the Act, it would have been easy to do so expressly. But the Legislature in defining what is included in the word "factory" has picked out a number of words, one of which is "dock," but "ship" does not appear among them. They are: "dock, wharf, quay, warehouse, machinery, plant." We are asked to hold that a ship is a dock; all I can say is that we cannot so hold. The answer to the question whether a man employed on board a ship in a dock is employed in or about the dock so as to come within the Act must be in the negative. It is not necessary to determine whether this dock is such a dock as is included in the word "factory." The appeal must be allowed.

SIMMONS v. WHITE. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accidental injuries—Dependants—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7, sub-section 2; Sched. I., s. 1.

"Dependants" within the meaning of section 7, sub-section 2, and Schedule I., s. 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, must have been wholly or in part dependent upon the earnings of the workman for the ordinary necessaries of life, having regard to the class and position in life of the parties.

The question whether the applicants in any case were dependants in this sense is a question of fact to be decided by the arbitrator.

Appeal from a decision of the judge of the Dartford County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The claim to compensation in this case was made by the father and mother of a boy who had been accidentally killed in the course of his employment while engaged in shunting trucks at the works of his employers, John Bazley White & Brothers.

The applicants claimed to be "dependants" of the deceased within the meaning of section 7, sub-section 2, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, and section 1 of Schedule I.

By section 7, sub-section 2, "'dependants' means —(a) in England and Ireland, such members of the workman's family specified in the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, as were wholly or in part dependent upon the earnings of the workman at the time of his death."

Section 1 of Schedule I. deals with the amount of compensation under the Act, where death results from the injury and the workman leaves dependants.

The evidence of the father was that his son was fourteen years of age, that he was earning 17s. a week, that he used to bring home his wages and hand them to his parents, who gave him what they thought right for pocket-money, that the wages helped to maintain the family, and that they expected this help. He further said that he himself was thirty-four years of age, and that he was in receipt of full wages and was working overtime, and that he owed no man anything. The county court judge found that the boy's wages went into a common fund for the benefit of the family, and that they were sufficient to pay for his keep and leave a balance, and he decided that upon the facts the applicants were in part dependent upon the deceased, and he adjudged that the applicants should recover £35 and £3 10s. for funeral expenses.

The employers appealed on the grounds that the county court judge had misdirected himself as to the meaning of the words "dependants" and "dependent" in section 7, sub-section 2, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, and that there was no evidence that the applicants were "dependants" within the meaning of the Act.

S. H. Leonard, for the employers.—The county court judge misdirected himself by assuming that the word "dependants" in the Workmen's Compensation Act included all those persons who could recover damages under Lord Campbell's Act. That is not the right test; the idea of dependence is not suggested in Lord Campbell's Act. The ordinary meaning of "dependent" as given in the dictionaries is, "That depends on or has to rely on something else for support, supply, or what is needed"; "subject to the power of, not able to exist or sustain itself without the power of." And that of "dependant" is, "one who lives in subjection to or at the discretion of another." In Shakespeare's "Cymbeline," Act I., scene 6, the phrase occurs, "What shalt thou expect, To be depender on a thing that leans?" The words imply the tie of necessity. It is not enough to show merely that the applicants derived some pecuniary advantage from the deceased; it must be shown that they had to rely on him for some of the necessaries of life. There was no evidence that the applicants were dependent on their son in this sense. The county court judge was wrong in law in inferring from the facts proved that the applicants were "dependants" within the meaning of the Act. The true meaning of "dependent" in this Act is rightly given in "Accidents to Workmen," by Minton-Senhouse and Emery, at p. 156.

Hawtin, for the applicants, was not called upon to argue.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—We cannot say there was no evidence on which the county court judge could find as he has found. The deceased was a boy who was earning 17s. a week, and who brought home his wages and put them into a common fund, and thereby helped to maintain the family. The county court judge found that his father and mother were in part dependent on the deceased. It is not our duty to decide whether that finding of fact is one to which we should ourselves have come, but we cannot say there was no evidence to support it. The appeal must be dismissed.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not see how we can say that the county court judge misdirected himself. I agree with the expression of opinion to be found in "Accidents to Workmen," by Minton-Senhouse and Emery, at p. 156: "By the expression 'wholly or in part dependent' a wide latitude is given to the arbitrator. It would be hopeless to attempt to lay down any rule of guidance, because every case would probably differ in some material circumstance from almost every other. Dependent probably means dependent for the ordinary necessaries of life for a person of that class and position in life. Thus the financial and social position of the recipient of compensation would have to be taken into account. That which would make one person dependent upon another would in another case merely cause the one to receive benefit from the other. Each case must stand on its own merits, and be decided as a question of fact by the arbitrator." I think that is a good direction, and I will presume that the county court judge had read it and adopted it. That being so, we cannot interfere with his finding.

ROMER, L.J.—I cannot escape from the finding of the county court judge, though I might have arrived at another finding myself. I agree with what is stated in Mr. Minton-Senhouse's book. I think that "dependants" within the meaning of the Act must be dependent in the proper sense of the word—that is, dependent for the ordinary necessaries of life, having regard to the class and position in life of the parties.

Appeal dismissed.

ALDIS v. THE CORPORATION OF THE CITY OF LONDON. (a.)

Metropolis—Management—Streets—Widening streets—Compulsory purchase—Corporation—Power of corporation to take part of house—Injunction—Owner—Right of owner to retain part not required—Michael Angelo Taylor's Act (57 Geo. 3, c. xxix.), ss. 80, 82.

Where the Corporation of the City of London bonâ fide adjudged that part of a house obstructed and prevented the widening of a street, and served a notice on the owner to purchase and compulsorily acquire, under sections 80 and 82 of Michael Angelo Taylor's Act, the whole of the house,

Held, that, as the corporation failed to show that the part of the house remaining after they had taken as much as was absolutely required for the widening of the street would be useless to the owner, the owner was entitled to retain that part; and injunction granted restraining the corporation from acting on the notice to take the whole.

Gordon v. The Vestry of St. Mary Abbotts, Kensington, 38 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 580, [1894] 2 Q. B. 742, considered and explained.

Motion asking for an order to restrain the Corporation of the City of London from acting on a notice pursuant to a resolution to take under the powers and provisions of Michael Angelo Taylor's Act (57 Geo. 3, c. xxix.), ss. 80, 82, the house No. 3, Cheapside for the purpose of widening Cheapside.

The house in question occupied an area of about 70 square feet, of which, as appeared from the plans of the corporation, about 400 square feet only was actually required for the purposes of the projected widening.

The corporation had, however, duly served the plaintiff with a notice to treat with the intention of acquiring the whole of his premises, and it was only when the plaintiff saw the plans that he discovered that a portion only would necessarily be acquired for the proposed improvement.

The defendants at the bar acknowledged that in view of recent decisions they could not maintain that the plaintiff was estopped by "acquiescence" from bringing this motion.

(a.) Reported by C. C. HENSLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The premises were partly occupied as a toy shop and partly for a photographic business.

P. O. Lawrence, Q.C., and MacSwinney, for the applicants.—The corporation can only take compulsory the 400 square feet actually needed for widening the streets. The applicant will be able to carry on his business on the remaining 300 square feet, which will be amply sufficient for his purpose if, as he intends doing, he relinquishes his photographic business and makes some other minor arrangements. The corporation cannot, under the Act, drive out people unless the ground they propose to take is really wanted for the improvements or unless indeed they can show that the part remaining after taking what it is absolutely necessary for them to take will be useless to the present occupier, and it is further necessary that their notice to treat must be a bonâ fide one and show clearly what is really requisite for their purpose.

They referred to Teuliere v. The Vestry of St. Mary Abbotts, Kensington, 30 Ch. D. 642, 34 W. R. Dig. 102; Fernley v. The Board of Works for the Limehouse District, 43 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 332; Gard v. Sewers Commissioners, 28 Ch. D. 436, 33 W. R. Dig. 106.

Warrington, Q.C., and John Henderson, for the corporation.—The corporation have served notice to take the whole, because they practically require the whole. The nature of the property precludes subdivision. They will have substantially to pull down the whole house, and under these circumstances are entitled to acquire the whole house. Had the corporation served the applicant with notice to acquire part only, it would have been competent for him to turn round and say, "No; you must take the whole." Conversely the corporation have, under the circumstances, the right to acquire the whole though a portion only of the ground may be required for the actual widening of the street: Gordon v. The Vestry of St. Mary Abbotts, Kensington, 38 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 580, [1894] 2 Q. B. 742. The case of Fernley v. Board of Works for the Limehouse District, which is cited in favour of the applicant, was a very special one. Here there is no secret prior agreement to sell the surplus property as there was in that case; the notice of the corporation is in all respects bonâ fide.

KEKEWICH, J.—The ingenious argument presented on behalf of the corporation invites me to decide a point which does not arise in this case. The argument is that if the corporation were taking the part coloured pink leaving out the part coloured blue on their plan (a small isolated part of the building), could not the plaintiff, the defendants urge with considerable force, fairly say, "You cannot take part of the house, practically destroying the whole of the house, without taking the whole house"? That contention is supported by the judgment of the lords justices, and especially by the judgment of Collins, L.J., in the case of Gordon v. Vestry of St. Mary Abbotts. But that is not the present question. The corporation have served notice on the plaintiff to take the whole house, but the plaintiff says, "No; by your owns plans it is shown that you only need a part, and you are not entitled to take the whole but only that part which you actually require." I, for my part on the facts before me, cannot see why the plaintiff may not insist on the corporation only taking a part of the house merely because, if the tables were turned, he could say, if the corporation only claimed to take a part, "No; you cannot take a part without taking the whole." If the plaintiff were merely obstructive and attacking the corporation, the court, of course, would not for a moment support him; but here, by his definite evidence, he shows that he has carried on his business for some time, that he sees his way, by various means—for instance, by relinquishing his photographic business and carrying on the toy-shop only—to carry on his business, and it is quite possible that he may do so well. It may be a small place that he will have left, but in London, as one goes along the streets, one sees many shops carried on in straitened premises, and they are frequently found to pay. I know a shop of the kind not far from here. The corporation say we must have the land, and attempt to take the whole; there is no moral obliquity, nothing morally wrong in that on their part; they are not taking any undue advantage. But they show by their plans that they only want part of the house for the purpose of widening the street, whereas they want, and are attempting to take, the whole; and on the authorities it is clear that they cannot do this unless they show that the remainder is useless to the plaintiff. With reference to the case of Gordon v. The Vestry of St. Mary Abbotts, Kensington, I will make one remark. In that case both the lords justices took pains to decide the law on the Act and did not apply it to the facts of the case. At p. 754 of [1894] 2 Q. B. (nearly at the bottom of the page), Collins, L.J., expressly says: "Our decision leaves the question of fact to be decided." Applying the decision of law in that case to the facts before me, I think that the plaintiff succeeds in his contention that he is entitled to keep that part of the property which the defendants do not actually require for carrying out the widening of the street.

Motion allowed.

In re CHATARD'S SETTLEMENT. (a.)

Practice — Payment out of court — French subjects — Infants—French guardian's right to receive money—Discretion of court.

A French subject who, according to French law, is the legal guardian of his infant children (also French subjects), and is empowered by that law to receive and give legal discharges for all moneys coming to them during their minority, is not entitled as of right to payment out of court of a fund to which such infant children have become absolutely entitled.

The court, however, can, in its discretion, pay the fund out to him upon the production of satisfactory evidence that it will be applied for the benefit of the children.

Petition.

This was a petition by two infant French subjects by their father and lawful guardian, also a French subject, as next friend, praying for the payment out of court of a sum of £2,001 0s. 3d. new consols, and £26 12s. cash. The trust fund had been paid into court under the Trustee Relief Act by the respondent, the surviving trustee of the settlement made upon the marriage of the infant petitioners' grandparents, and in the events which had happened the infant petitioners had become absolutely entitled to the settled property.

The petition prayed that the funds in court to which the infant petitioners were entitled might be divided into moieties, and one moiety paid to the father as the guardian of the infant female petitioner. and the other paid to him as the guardian of the infant male petitioner.

Paragraph 14 of the petition stated that by the law of France the father as the legal guardian of the infant petitioners was entitled to receive and give legal discharges for all moneys coming to his children during their minority.

The case was argued on the assumption that this statement in the petition was strictly proved.

Ingpen, for the petitioners.—The father is entitled as of right to have these funds paid out to him as guardian of these infants: In re Crichton's Trusts, 24 L. T. O. S. 267; In re Ferguson's Trusts, 22 W. R. 762; In re Brown's Trust, 13 W. R. 677, 12 L. T. Rep. 488. In re Hellmann's Will, 14 W. R. 682, L. R. 2 Eq. 363, is perhaps against me, but the weight of authority is in my favour: Simpson on Infants (2nd ed.), p. 254. The same principle guides the court in appointing guardians to infants domiciled abroad: In re Willoughby, 33 W. R. 850, 30 Ch. D. 324; In re Bourgoise, 37 W. R. 563, 41 Ch. D. 310.

Stewart Smith, for the respondent.—In re Hellmann's Will is more applicable to the present circumstances than the other cases cited. There is nothing to prevent the court from keeping the fund until the beneficiaries can give a receipt for it; and I submit that is what ought to be done here. At any rate the father should satisfy the court that the money will be applied for the benefit of the children.

Ingpen, in reply.—The court has no jurisdiction to refuse to pay out funds to a foreigner who has proved his title to them according to the law of his domicil.

KEKEWICH, J.—This case has been argued at my suggestion as if the statement in the 14th paragraph of the petition had been strictly proved. The question which I have to determine is whether I am bound to direct the payment out of this money as prayed by the petition. If I am, then I must do my duty; if I am not, then I have a discretion which I must exercise on proper materials which at present are not before me.

The cases of In re Crichton's Trust and In re Ferguson's Trusts are distinguishable from the present case, for in them the infants were Scotch and had reached the age of puberty according to Scotch law; and also, as appears by the later case, the Scotch curator has to give security, and account for all sums received on behalf of the minor. The report in In re Brown's Trust is meagre, and I do not think it is a case which can be relied upon as establishing a principle. I do not think either that I ought to regard In re Hellmann's Will as affecting the present case. That was a petition under Lord St. Leonards' Acts (22 & 23 Vict. c. 35 and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38), and a decision on a petition under those Acts cannot possibly, it seems to me, be regarded as an authority for the proposition that a French guardian is entitled as of right to have the fund in court paid to him. I think I ought to consider whether the fund if paid to the guardian will be properly applied for the infants' benefit, or whether I ought to retain the fund in court until they attain their majorities. Satisfactory evidence could perhaps be produced to show that the fund would be properly applied for their benefit; but at present I am not asked to pay out on that footing, but merely on the ground that the guardian is entitled to the fund as of right. Even assuming that the father can give a receipt for the money, nevertheless it seems to me that, having the custody of the fund for the infants, I ought not to pay it over unless I think that it is in the interests of the infants that that should be done. In re Barlow's Will, 35 W. R. 737, 36 Ch. D. 287, is a well-known example of a class of cases dealing with payment out to the officially-appointed curators of a foreign lunatic, and in that and similar cases the court has always required to be satisfied that the money is to be paid over to the foreign official for some purpose to which it is his duty to apply it. I shall accordingly be prepared to consider any evidence as to the proposed application of the money by the guardian, and the case may be brought before me again for that purpose.

Ecclesiastical law—Enlargement of existing churchyard—"Adjoining" land—Intervening highway—Consecration of Churchyards Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 133).

A plot of ground immediately opposite to, but separated by a highway from, an existing churchyard was proposed to be added to the churchyard under the Consecration of Churchyards Act, 1867, which contains provisions for the conveyance and consecration "of portions of ground adjoining and added to existing churchyards."

Held, that it was "adjoining" land within the meaning of the Act.

Vendor and purchaser summons.

This was a summons by the vendor, who was tenant for life of the land contracted to be sold, asking for a declaration that she had power to sell the same under the Consecration of Churchyards Act, 1867.

The purchaser, who was rector of the parish of Brome, Suffolk, had agreed to buy the piece of land in question for the purpose of enlarging the existing churchyard. The churchyard had a frontage of 162ft. on to the south side of a public highway about 20ft. wide, and the land contracted to be sold had a frontage of 100ft. on to the north side of the same highway, and immediately opposite to the churchyard.

It was desired that the piece of land should be conveyed and consecrated under the provisions of the Consecration of Churchyards Act, 1867, which was passed for the purpose of diminishing "the expense attendant on the consecration of portions of ground adjoining and added to existing churchyards," but a question arose as to whether this was "adjoining land" within the meaning of that Act, and the present summons was accordingly taken out.

J. M. Stone, for the vendor.—Adjoining does not necessarily mean contiguous. In Coventry v. London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Co., 16 W. R. 267, L. R. 5 Eq. 104, and London and South-Western Railway Co. v. Blackmore, L. R. 4 H. L. 610, 18 W. R. H. L. Dig. 1, 13-15, which were cases under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, lands separated, in the former case, by a private right of way, and in the latter case, by a wall, were held to be adjoining lands. On the implication of ownership of the subsoil usque ad medium filum viæ, premises on opposite sides of the street were held to be "adjoining or contiguous": Haynes v. King, 42 W. R. 56, [1893] 3 Ch. 439; Micklethwait v.

Newlay Bridge Co., 38 Ch. D. 133; and In re White's Charities, 46 W. R. 479, [1898] 1 Ch. 659.

W. M. Spence, for the purchaser.—This will be a new churchyard, not an enlargement of the existing one. In order that one piece of land may adjoin another it must be absolutely contiguous to it: Rex v. Hodges, 1 Moo. & Mal. 341. The cases cited under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act do not really apply.

KEKEWICH, J.—It would be a great pity for me to attempt to define the meaning of the word "adjoining" in this Act of Parliament. If I were to attempt to do so, my definition, like most other definitions, would be sure to be more or less inaccurate, for in all probability it would not include every conceivable case, and I am afraid of excluding a case which might properly come within the scope of the Act. I shall therefore content myself by saying that in this particular instance this piece of land is "adjoining" land within the meaning of the Act.

Vendor and purchaser—Contract—Sale by auction—Offer by conditions of sale—Acceptance by highest bidder—Payment of deposit by cheque—Custom at auction—Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3), s. 4.

A vendor who offers property for sale by auction on the terms of printed conditions can be made liable to a member of the public who accepts the offer if those conditions be violated, and who, being the highest bidder, is not allowed to sign the written contract; and it is no defence to an action to enforce such a liability that there is no contract in writing signed by the vendors.

Under the usual condition of sale that the purchaser shall, immediately after the sale, pay the auctioneer a deposit of ten per cent. and sign the subjoined agreement, cash must be paid.

There is no custom that a vendor is bound to accept the cheque of a person of good credit, much less that of a pauper.

Action.

This was an action by Theresa Johnston, suing as a married woman entitled for her separate use against W. O. Boyes and A. W. Adams, claiming damages under the following circumstances.

The defendants, who were trustees for sale, offered the White Hart Inn, South Mimms, Middlesex, for sale by auction on the 24th of May, 1898. By the first condition of sale, the highest bidder was to be the purchaser, and by the second condition the purchaser was immediately after the sale to pay to the auctioneers a deposit of £10 per cent. on the amount and in part payment of his purchase-money, and sign an agreement subjoined to the conditions to complete the purchase. The subjoined agreement was in the following form: "At the sale by auction made this day of the property described in these particulars, , of , was the highest bidder for, and was declared the purchaser of, the said property, at the price of £ ; and he has paid to Messrs. Rodwell & Son, of Watford, Herts, as agents for and on behalf of William Osborn Boyes, of Barnet, and A. W. Adams, of 90, Ladbroke-grove, Notting Hill, the vendors, the sum of £ by way of deposit and in part payment of the purchase-money, and hereby agrees to complete the purchase in accordance with the above conditions; and the said Messrs. Rodwell & Son, as the vendors' agents, hereby confirm the said sale and acknowledge the receipt of the said deposit."

The plaintiff's husband attended the auction and, on behalf of his wife, bid for the property, which was knocked down to him as the highest bidder at the price of £4,900. He immediately went to the auctioneer's rostrum with a view to signing the contract and paying the deposit amounting to £490. But Mr. Boyes, one of the defendants and the solicitor conducting the sale, recognized him as a man who, in the previous week, had appeared in the county court, of which Mr. Boyes is the registrar, and sworn that he had nothing in the world but the clothes he stood up in. Johnston tendered his own cheque in payment of the deposit, whereupon Mr. Boyes told the auctioneer not to take the cheque. Some further discussion took place, partly in the auction-room, and partly in an ante-room, to which the auctioneer and his clerk and Johnston and the defendants retired, the result of which was that the refusal to accept the cheque was persisted in. Johnston said that his wife would find the money the following day, but Mr. Boyes said he must have the cash that day, and as Johnston did not provide the cash, the matter was treated as at an end so far as he was concerned, and a contract was immediately afterwards signed for sale to another gentleman at the price of £4,950.

It was also proved at the trial that before the transaction was put an end to, Johnston said he was purchasing on behalf of his wife, and that though Johnston had at the time no assets to meet it, the cheque would have been met by the plaintiff providing funds.

The writ was issued on the 27th of May, 1898, and was indorsed with a claim for a declaration that the plaintiff was entitled to be the purchaser of the property; for an order directing the defendants to accept the deposit and to allow her to sign the agreement; and for an injunction to restrain the completion of the resale. On a motion, Stirling, J., refused the injunction (see 42 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 610). The writ was subsequently amended by substituting a claim for damages against both defendants for breach of contract that the highest bidder should be the purchaser, and against the defendant Boyes in particular, in so far as such breach of contract consisted in directing the auctioneer not to accept the cheque, and not to allow the husband to sign the agreement.

Tindal Atkinson, Q.C., and F. P. Onslow, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff being, by her agent, the highest bidder at the auction, accepted the offer contained in the conditions, "that the highest bidder should be the purchaser," and is entitled to maintain an action for the breach of the contract thus made. It is not necessary that such a contract should be evidenced by writing signed by the vendors: Carlill v. Carbolic Smoke Ball Co., 41 W. R. 210, at p. 212, [1893] 1 Q. B. 256, at p. 262; Warlow v. Harrison, 8 W. R. 95, 1 Ell. & Ell. 295; Spencer v. Harding, 19 W. R. 48, L. R. 5 C. P. 561, at p. 563. The plaintiff's agent followed the usual course at auctions in tendering his cheque, and the auctioneer ought to have accepted it. The custom of accepting cheques at auctions in payment of deposits has been judicially recognized: Farrer v. Lacy Hartland & Co., 32 W. R. 196, 34 W. R. 22, 25 Ch. D. 636, 31 Ch. D. 42.

They also referred to Papé v. Westacott, 42 W. R. 131, [1894] 1 Q. B. 272.

Eve, Q.C., A. R. Ingpen, and F. A. Milne, for the defendants.—There is not an enforceable contract. The contract alleged by the plaintiff is that she is entitled to be put into the position of a purchaser of land, and it is necessary that such a contract should be evidenced by writing signed by the defendants. The plaintiff, through her agent, has not complied with the conditions. The deposit was to be in cash, and the vendors were not bound to take the agent's cheque. There is no recognized practice as to the acceptance of a cheque in payment of a deposit: see the judgment of Bowen, L.J., in Farrer v. Lacy Hartland & Co., 34 W. R. 22, at p. 23, 31 Ch. D. 42; Blumberg v. The Life Interests and Reversionary Securities Corporation (Limited), 45 W. R. 246, [1897] 1 Ch. 171.

Tindal Atkinson replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 28.—COZENS-HARDY, J.—In point of law I think such an action as this can be maintained. A vendor who offers property for sale by auction on the terms of printed conditions can be made liable to a member of the public who accepts the offer, if those conditions be violated: Warlow v. Harrison, and Carlill v. Carbolic Smoke Ball Co. Nor do I think that the Statute of Frauds would afford any defence to such an action. The plaintiff is not suing on a contract to purchase land; she is suing simply because her agent, in breach of the first and second conditions of sale, was not allowed to sign a contract which would have resulted in her becoming the purchaser of the land. I think this conclusion results from the decision of the Exchequer Chamber in Warlow v. Harrison. That was not a case under section 4 of the Statute of Frauds, but the observations of Martin, B. (8 W. R. 96, 1 Ell. & Ell., at p. 317), as to section 17, seem to me to be applicable to the present case. It is therefore necessary to consider whether the facts proved have established a breach of the contract alleged by the plaintiff. [His lordship then referred to what took place at the auction, and continued:] These being the facts which I find, do they entitle the plaintiff to relief? In my judgment they do not. I think the defendants were not bound to accept the cheque of Mr. Johnston, who was, and was known by them to be, impecunious. I do not think any custom has been proved to oblige vendors to receive the cheque even of a person in good credit, though it is, doubtless, usual to do so. And certainly no such custom could bind vendors to accept a cheque from a pauper. In my view it makes no difference that they were told that Mr. Johnston was buying for his wife. They were not bound to wait for cash until the next day. The second condition provided that the purchaser should "immediately after the sale" pay a deposit of £10 per cent. This means a payment in cash. No such payment was made, and the defendants were under no obligation to sign the contract unless and until this condition precedent had been fulfilled. The result is that the plaintiff's action fails and must be dismissed with costs in the usual form, having regard to the fact that the plaintiff is a married woman.

NATIONAL COMPANY FOR THE DISTRIBUTION OF ELECTRICITY BY SECONDARY GENERATORS (LIMITED) v. GIBBS. (a.)

Patent—Grant to two persons—Joint tenancy or tenancy in common — Survivorship—Agreement for sale—Covenant for validity—Joint or several—Death of one grantee.

The grant of letters patent for a new invention to two persons, their executors, administrators, and assigns, in ordinary form, makes them joint tenants, and, upon the death of one, the rights under the letters patent, if not previously severed, belong wholly to the survivor, the rule that a grant to A. and B. makes them joint tenants not being merely a rule of tenure or real property law.

A provision in an agreement for the sale of letters patent granted to two persons that an assignment should be executed, and should contain a covenant by the vendors that the letters patent are valid, cannot be enforced against the representatives of one of the vendors who has died after the agreement and before assignment, nor will such representatives be liable for damages for breach of the agreement in this respect.

By letters patent dated the 13th of September 1882, (No. 4,362) after reciting that Lucian Gaulard and J. D. Gibbs had by their petition represented that they were in possession of a new system of distributing electricity for the production of light and power of which they were the first inventors, the Crown granted "unto the said L. Gaulard and J. D. Gibbs, their executors, administrators, and assigns, our special license, full power, sole privilege, and authority that they, the said L. Gaulard and J. D. Gibbs, their executors, administrators, and assigns, and every of them, by themselves, or by their deputy or deputies, servants or agents, or such others as they the said Gaulard and Gibbs, their executors, administrators, and assigns, shall at any time agree with, and no others, and from time to time, and at all times hereafter, during the terms of years expressed, shall and lawfully may make, use, exercise, and vend their said invention," with habendum "unto L. Gaulard and J. D. Gibbs, their executors, administrators, and assigns," for the term of fourteen years. The letters patent contained clauses prohibiting all persons using the invention during the term without the license of the grantees, commanding all public officers not to molest the grantees, declaring grant void if contrary to law or for an invention not new; and requiring as a condition that the grantees should particularly describe the invention by an instrument in writing, and other clauses usual in letters patent of that date, in all of which references to the grantees were to them, "their executors, administrators, and assigns." The patentees also obtained protective monopolies for their invention in other countries.

By an agreement under seal of May, 1883, made between Gaulard and Gibbs (thereinafter called "the vendors") of the one part, and the plaintiff company on the other part, it was agreed that the vendors should sell and the company should purchase the exclusive privilege of using, exercising, and vending the said inventions within the United Kingdom and certain other countries; that "the vendors and each of them" should do all necessary acts for procuring confirmation and extension of the patents, and should give the company advice as to the use of the inventions. Clauses 6 and 7 were as follows: "(6) The vendors shall without delay, at the expense of the said company and to the satisfaction of the solicitors of the said company, establish a title to all the said inventions and letters patent and privileges hereby agreed to be sold, and assign and transfer the same to, and cause the same to be legally vested in, the said company or such person or persons as the said company shall appoint for the purpose. (7) The assignment and transfer of the said letters patent and other premises sold shall be prepared by and at the cost of the said company, and shall be expressed to be made in pursuance of this agreement and in consideration of the payment of the said sum of £220,000, to be paid in fully paid-up shares and cash as before mentioned, and the said vendors and all other necessary parties, if any, shall at the cost of the said company execute such assignments to the said company or as they shall direct, and such assignments respectively shall contain a covenant by the said vendors that all the letters patent thereby assigned or any letters patent which may thus have been obtained in substitution for the same or in respect of such invention as is protected thereby are valid and in nowise void or voidable, and also such other covenants and provisions as may be reasonably required by the said company for giving effect to the sale hereby agreed to be made. Provided that the consideration money may be apportioned among two or more assignments as the said company shall think fit."

Gaulard died in November, 1888, and the defendant, Madame Ruelle, was his administratrix. No assignment of the patents to the plaintiff company had been executed. The plaintiff company alleged that the English letters patent had been declared void, and that the Brevets d'Invention in France, Germany and Austria had been declared void, or so restricted as to be of little or no value, and that the United States patent also had been materially limited. They therefore brought this action against Gibbs and Madame Ruelle claiming that the defendants might be ordered: (1) To assign to them the letters patent; (2) to pay them damages for breaches of the agreement and warranty contained in the said agreement of May, 1883; and (3) to repay to them part of the purchase-money in respect of the patents declared void, or partially so.

Subsequently the plaintiffs came to terms with Gibbs, and the action proceeded against Madame Ruelle. At the trial the point was raised that the covenant was a joint, and not a several one, and that consequently there was no right of action against the representatives of Gaulard.

Moulton, Q.C., and Gore Browne, for the plaintiff company.—The rights of a patentee of an invention are not the ordinary rights of property. They are merely an exception from the general prohibition upon all other persons. The letters patent do not really confer on the patentee the right to make and use the invention. He has such a right if there are no letters patent at all: Mathers v. Green, 14 W. R. 17, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 29; Steers v. Rogers, [1893] A. C. 232, 41 W. R. Dig. 159. Why, then, should the technical rule of real property law as to joint tenancy be applied to patent rights? These rights are intended to be a reward for merit, why should it be supposed that upon the death of one of two grantees the whole benefit of the letters patent is to belong to the survivor? We submit that the Crown must be supposed to intend to confer a tenancy in common. But whether this is so or not the covenant provided for by the agreement of sale was intended to be a joint and several one, and not merely a joint one. In commercial transactions covenants joint at law are treated as several: Beresford v. Browning, L. R. 20 Eq. 564, at p. 576, 23 W. R. Dig. 148, 24 W. R. 120, 1 Ch. D. 30. Moreover, this was a business agreement intended to be provisional and executory, and not complete and final. The assignment under it would have contained a joint and several covenant, which is the proper form: see Key & Elphinstone's Precedents (5th ed.), p. 404; Bythewood & Jarman's Precedents (4th ed.), vol. 4, p. 805. Under the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 7, if the vendors assigned as beneficial owners they would be severally bound in the covenants for title. This shows the previous practice (The case of Walton v. Lavater, 8 C. B. N. S. 162, 9 W. R. C. L. Dig. 61, was also referred to.)

Eve, Q.C., and Rowden, for the defendant.—Letters patent are ordinary property, and a grant to two persons follows the ordinary rule as to joint tenancy. A covenant joint in form is not construed as several in equity unless in special circumstances: Sumner v. Powell, 2 Mer. 30; Richardson v. Horton, 6 Beav. 185; Wilmer v. Currey, 2 De G. & Sm. 347; White v. Tyndall, 13 App. Cas. 263, at pp. 265, 274, 275, 36 W. R. Dig. 113. The proper and ordinary form of covenant for two persons is joint, and not several: Davidson, vol 1, pp. 92, 93; Platt on Covenants, p. 116; Dart's V. & P. (6th ed.), p. 624; Story on Contracts (5th ed.), s. 71, p. 61. The agreement here was not executory; it is under seal, and the covenant is completely stated. The principle of amplifying clauses in articles is confined to cases of real property. As regards the part of clause 6 providing for the insertion of other reasonable covenants, that was not intended to apply to covenants for validity, which had been already completely dealt with.

Gore Browne in reply.—The case of White v. Tyndall is distinguishable, as there the term of the covenant was evidently carefully considered, and intended to be complete.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 28.—COZENS-HARDY, J.—The plaintiffs in this action contracted on the 25th of May, 1883, to purchase certain letters patent for a large sum of money. The vendors were Gaulard, who died in 1888, and the defendant Gibbs. Gaulard's administratrix, Madame Ruelle, is a defendant to the action. It is admitted that the plaintiffs have settled their disputes with the defendant Gibbs, and it is, therefore, not necessary for me to consider the action except as one between the plaintiffs, who are the purchasers, and the defendant Ruelle, who is the administratrix of Gaulard, one of the vendors. The plaintiffs claim that the defendant may be ordered to assign and transfer to the plaintiffs the letters patent, and they also claim damages for breaches of the agreement and warranty contained in the contract of the 25th of May, 1883. At an early stage it became apparent that there was a serious question whether the plaintiffs had any right against the defendant Ruelle. With the approval of the parties, I thought it convenient to deal separately with this point, because, if it is decided adversely to the plaintiffs, it will not be necessary to consider other questions, including questions of foreign law, which may arise. The short point for my decision is whether Gibbs, the surviving patentee, is not the only person having anything to assign, and the only person liable to pay damages for breach of contract and warranty. [His lordship read the material parts of the contract, and proceeded:] It is admitted that all the patents were granted to Gaulard and Gibbs, and not to either of them separately, and it is not alleged that their rights inter se—whatever they may have been originally—have since been varied except so far, if at all, as they were varied by the contract. The first question for my consideration is this—What was the nature of the interest of the patentees? I take the patent dated the 13th of September, 1882, which is the only one to which my attention was called. It is in the form which I believe to be usual, if not universal, in the case of a grant to two patentees. It recites that Gaulard and Gibbs had presented their petition, and that they were the first and true inventors, and that they had prayed her Majesty to grant unto them, their executors, administrators, and assigns, her Royal letters patent for the sole use, benefit, and advantage of the said invention within the United Kingdom for the term of fourteen years, and the letters patent proceed as follows: [His lordship read all except the formal parts, and proceeded:] On the construction of this grant, I think the two patentees took a joint interest which passed by survivorship to Gibbs on the death of Gaulard. It was scarcely disputed that a grant, whether by the Crown or by a private individual, of any ordinary species of property to A. B. and C. D., their executors, administrators, and assigns, would create a joint tenancy or joint interest, and not an interest in common. This is not a rule of tenure or of real property law. It applies to an assignment of a policy of assurance as much as to an assignment of a term of years. But it was urged that letters patent are of such a peculiar quality and nature that different principles of interpretation ought to be applied. I am unable to follow this argument. The right or privilege granted by the Crown by the letters patent is an exception from the general prohibition contained in the Statute of Monopolies. It is for all purposes to be regarded as property. It passes on bankruptcy as part of the assets of a bankrupt. On the death of a patentee duty is payable as it is part of the assets of the deceased, and I can see no justification in principle, nor has any authority been produced, for holding that a grant of letters patent to two persons, their executors, administrators, and assigns, created anything more than a joint interest which will survive on the death of one of them, unless there has been a severance of the joint interest. An elaborate argument was addressed to me with the view of persuading me that survivorship between joint tenants is unreasonable and cannot have been intended by the Crown. It is no doubt true that courts of equity have laid hold of slight circumstances to turn a joint tenancy into a tenancy in common, and there was at one time an idea that in equity all joint tenancies would be construed tenancies in common. This, however, is clearly not so. I may refer to the judgment of Sir William Grant in Aveling v. Knipe, 19 Ves. 441. It must not be forgotten that it is at any time open to two joint owners to sever their joint interest and to create a tenancy in common. A patent can be owned by tenants in common: see Smith v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 2 E. & B. 69, and Steers v. Rogers. It follows, therefore, that in my opinion Gaulard's representative is not a proper party to the action, in so far as it seeks an order for the assignment of the patents, inasmuch as the whole interest in the patents is vested in Gibbs, as the survivor of the two joint patentees. The second, and, in my view, a more difficult question has now to be considered. Assuming that Gibbs and Gaulard were jointly interested in the patents, what is the nature of the obligation created by clause 7 of the agreement? Is it merely a joint covenant, in which case the only person who could be sued upon it would be Gibbs as the survivor, or is it a several covenant, or a joint and several covenant, under which either Gibbs or Gaulard, or the representatives of either of them, could be sued? This must depend upon a careful consideration of the language of the instrument. In the first place, the agreement itself is under seal, so that the obligations imposed are really covenants. In the second place, the obligation in question is something to be contained in the assignment of the patents, and when it is once held that Gaulard's representative is not a necessary party to the assignment it will be somewhat remarkable if the purchaser can require the concurrence of the representative, not for the purpose of assigning, but solely for the purpose of entering into a covenant binding herself not in her individual character, but solely in her representative character, and to the extent of Gaulard's assets. I doubt whether ever such a deed of assignment was ever seen. Certainly I never saw such a deed. It may be that the proper form of covenants for title in an assignment by two joint tenants is to make them, not joint, but joint and several. But it does not follow that after the death of one of the joint tenants before assignment his representative can be required to join for the mere purpose of covenanting. In the third place, the obligation in question is not one which the law implies from the contract of sale. It is a special and peculiar stipulation for which the plaintiffs have bargained, and which they have obtained from the vendors. In this point of view it is difficult to see what justification there can be for enlarging or altering the words used. Those words provide that the deed shall contain a covenant by the vendors. Now, such a covenant, in the absence of any qualifying context, must be a joint covenant. The case of White v. Tyndall is a strong authority on this point. The form of the covenant is joint, and I do not feel justified in making it several. For these reasons I have arrived at the conclusion that the plaintiffs are not entitled to any relief against Gaulard's representative.

Company—Winding up—Surplus assets—Distribution—Fully-paid and partly-paid shares.

One of the articles of association of a company contained the following clause: "If upon the winding up of the company the surplus assets shall be more than sufficient to repay the whole of the paid-up capital, the excess shall be distributed among the members in proportion to the capital paid, or which ought to have been paid, on the shares."

The capital of the company consisted of 60,000 shares of £1 each, of which 26,000 were vendors' shares issued as fully paid, besides which 30,357 other shares had been issued on which 10*s. only had been paid up. On the voluntary winding up of the company there remained a large sum for distribution among the shareholders after paying all debts and the expenses of liquidation.*

Held, that the distribution must be in accordance with the agreement shown in the articles—viz., the balance after repaying the paid-up capital, must be distributed in proportion to the paid-up capital.

Application by the liquidators of the syndicate for the direction of the court upon what principles and in what shares and proportions the surplus assets of the company should be distributed in the winding up as between the holders of fully-paid and partly-paid shares respectively, and whether any call should be made on the partly-paid shareholders.

The syndicate was registered on the 31st of July, 1897, with a capital of 60,000 shares of £1 each; of these, 26,000 vendors' shares were issued as fully paid up; 30,357 other shares were also issued, on which 10s. only had been paid up. The syndicate had recently sold its business and assets to another company, and had passed resolutions for voluntary winding up. When all the debts and expenses of liquidation had been paid there remained for distribution among the shareholders the sum of about £200,000, and the liquidators now applied to the court for directions as to how this sum was to be distributed.

The articles of association of the syndicate which were material to the question were 36 and 42. They were as follows: "(36) Subject to any priorities that may be given upon the issue of any shares, the profits of the company available for distribution shall be distributed as dividend among the members in accordance with the amounts paid up on the shares held by them respectively. (42) If upon the winding up of the company the surplus assets shall be more than sufficient to repay the whole of the paid up capital, the excess shall be distributed among the members in proportion to the capital paid, or which ought to have been paid, on the shares held by them respectively at the commencement of the winding up, other than amounts paid in advance of calls. If the surplus assets shall be insufficient to repay the whole of the paid-up capital, such surplus assets shall be distributed so that as nearly as may be the losses shall be borne by the members in proportion to the capital paid, or which ought to have been paid, on the shares held by them respectively at the commencement of the winding up, other than amounts paid in advance of calls. But this clause is to be without prejudice to the rights of the holders of shares issued upon special conditions."

Upjohn, Q.C., and R. M. Montgomery, for the fully-paid shareholders.—The question is really decided by article 42. Where the articles of association provide for the distribution you cannot go outside of the document. This case differs from Ex parte Lowenfeld, 70 L.T. Rep. 3, for in that case there was a deficit; here there is an excess, and the uncalled capital must not be included in the assets. This is shown in the judgments of Lindley and Davey, L.JJ., in that case. In re Anglo-Continental Corporation of Western Australia, 46 W. R. 413 [1898] 1 Ch. 327, was also a case of a deficit and is to be distinguished.

Theobald, Q.C., and R. J. Parker, for the partly-paid shareholders.—The partly-paid shares should be treated as having the remaining ten shillings called up on them, and then the surplus assets should be distributed in proportion to the shares held by all the shareholders. Article 42 does not alter the general law. The distribution should be made as in Ex parte Maude, 19 W. R. 113, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 51. That case was followed in In re Anglo-Continental Corporation of Western Australia. In Ex parte Lowenfeld the Court of Appeal held that "capital paid" did not merely mean capital paid before the liquidation or called up in the liquidation for the purpose of paying debts and liabilities, but included capital called up or to be treated as called up for the very purpose of satisfying equities in the repayment of capital.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 5.—WRIGHT, J.—In this case the question for decision is—In what way are the surplus assets of the syndicate, which is in voluntary liquidation, to be distributed? The syndicate appears to have so prospered in its business as to have a large amount of surplus assets to be divided amongst its shareholders. Of these there are two classes—namely, the holders of fully-paid vendors' shares and the holders of shares on each of which the sum of 10s. has been called and paid up. The assets remaining after paying all debts, liabilities, and expenses amount to about £200,000, of which about £41,000 must first be applied in repaying to the shareholders the sum of £1 on each of the vendors' shares and the sum of 10s. on each of the other shares. I have now to decide what is to be done with the balance. The fully-paid shareholders say that they are entitled to the full proportion which their paid-up capital represents and that the others are only entitled to the proportion represented by 10s. per share. On the other hand, the partly-paid shareholders say that, according to cases like Birch v. Cropper, 38 W. R. 401, 14 App. Cas. 525, the division should be in accordance with the number of shares, irrespective of the amount paid up. If there were no provision in the articles as to the method of distribution to be adopted, it would be tolerably clear that after the capital account had been properly dealt with the balance would be distributable share and share alike. But there are two articles which must now be considered. Article 36 points out how the profits are to be distributed as dividend. It has been decided over and over again that such a provision is not decisive of the question how surplus assets are to be divided, but that it may have some bearing on the question. The question for my decision really turns on article 42, which, so far as material, is as follows: "If upon the winding up of the company the surplus assets shall be more than sufficient to repay the whole of the paid-up capital, the excess shall be distributed among the members in proportion to the capital paid, or which ought to have been paid, on the shares." At the conclusion of the arguments I did not think there was any reasonable doubt as to the matter, but as the amount distributable was large I took time to look at the authorities again. These authorities are referred to in In re Anglo-Continental Corporation of Western Australia and in In re Driffield Gas Light Co., but there is nothing in the cases to occasion doubt as to how this case should be decided. It is not like the cases where the surplus assets are insufficient to repay the whole of the paid-up capital. The distribution must be in accordance with the agreement shown by the articles—that is to say, the balance, after repaying the paid-up capital, must be divided in proportion to the paid-up capital. No call must be made, and the costs of all parties will come out of the assets.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL v. DIXON. (a.)

Metropolis—London County—Buildings—Commencing to form or lay out a street—London Building Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. ccxiii.), s. 8.

The owner of a building estate, having erected a row of houses adjoining a street, sold a piece of land on the same side of the street to the respondent, who commenced to erect a row of houses in a line with the first row and fronting the street. A space of forty feet, the statutory width of a street for carriage traffic, was left between the two rows of houses. In the house adjoining the space the respondent put a doorway and windows looking on to the space, and the sole means of access for carriages to the stables at the back of the premises was across the space. The respondent had no control over the space, which remained the property of the owner of the building estate. The space was marked in the building plan of the estate as "proposed street," but before the respondent erected his houses it had not been laid out as a street.

Held, that the respondent did not commence to form or lay out a street within the meaning of section 8 of the London Building Act, 1894.

Case stated by a metropolitan police magistrate.

An information was laid by the appellants against the respondent charging that in May, 1898, at Sandhurst-road, in the parish of Lewisham, he did commence to form a street for carriage traffic leading out of Sandhurst-road without having obtained the sanction of the council for such street, contrary to the provisions of the London Building Act, 1894.

The following facts were proved: Sandhurst-road was a new street laid out upon land belonging to A. Cameron Corbett, Esq., and the laying out of such street had been duly sanctioned by the council. Prior to May, 1898, a row of houses had been erected by Corbett upon the south side of Sandhurst-road. In May, 1898, the respondent commenced to erect six shops upon land bought from Corbett on the south side of Sandhurst-road in a line with the houses built by Corbett, leaving a space of forty feet between the last house and the first shop. He at first commenced the foundations of this shop at a less distance than forty feet from the last house, but subsequently altered them so as to leave a distance of forty feet, which was the statutory width of a street for carriage traffic.

The space so left was the street which the respondent was alleged by the information to have commenced to form. It belonged to Corbett, and a portion of it was used as a cart-track leading to certain brickfields situated at the end of the alleged street, which was ninety feet in length.

The shop erected by the respondent at the corner of the alleged street had a doorway at the angle, and a shop window as well as other windows looked into the alleged street. There was also a door opening into the alleged street at a distance of ten or twelve feet from the Sandhurst-road, and at the back of the premises the respondent erected five coach-houses and stables, the only access to which for horses and carriages was by an entrance eighty feet down the alleged street. Persons could, however, enter the stables by a back door from the shops in Sandhurst-road.

There was no evidence that Corbett entered into any formal agreement with the respondent that the space forming the alleged street should be left open, but it was marked on the estate plans of Corbett's property as a "proposed street"; and in the plan accompanying the application sent by the respondent to the local authority for their sanction of his scheme of drainage for the premises erected by him, it was called a "new road."

Nothing was done by the respondent to form or lay out the alleged street except the building of the shops and stables.

The magistrate found as a fact that in the circumstances a new street for carriage traffic had been commenced to be formed and laid out, but he held that, though the respondent undoubtedly erected the shops in the expectation that such space would be a new street, yet he did not commence to form it, upon the ground that he had no control over the roadway of the alleged street, and he accordingly dismissed the information.

Section 7 of the London Building Act, 1894, enacts that before any person commences to form or lay out any street he shall make an application to the county council for their sanction to the formation or laying out of such street.

Section 8 of the same Act provides, in relation to section 7, as follows: "A person shall be deemed to commence to form or lay out a street if he erect a fence or other boundary, or lay down lines of kerbing, or level the surface of the ground so as to define the course or direction of a street, or if he form or lay the foundation of a house in such manner and in such position as that such house will or may become one of three or more houses abutting on or erected beside land on which a street is intended to be or may be thereafter laid out or formed. Provided that no person shall be deemed to commence to form or lay out a street if he do any of the acts in this section mentioned for some purpose other than that of forming or laying out a street."

Avory (Daldy with him), for the appellants.—The magistrate was wrong in dismissing the information. The respondent laid the foundations of the shop at the corner of the alleged street in such a manner and in such a position as that it might become one of three or more houses abutting on land on which a street might at some time be laid out or formed. This section is intended to apply as well in the case of a builder who builds on land adjoining the proposed new street as in the case of the owner of the roadway. The object of the legislation is to give the council power, at the earliest moment, to interfere in the formation of new streets. Under former Acts the council could not interfere until money had been spent upon building houses, the owners of which had either to pull them down again, if they did not conform to the requirements of a new street, or to pay fines in respect of them for the rest of their lives. Here the magistrate has found that a new street has been commenced to be formed and laid out. The only question is, Did the respondent commence to form it or somebody else? It could only be one other person—the freeholder, Corbett. But he has done nothing, for before the respondent built the shops the space found by the magistrate to be a street was mere open country. The question is, When was the street commenced to be formed? It was commenced to be formed when the respondent built his shop. The respondent, therefore, is the person who commenced to form it: St. George's Local Board v. Ballard, 43 W.R. 409, [1895] 1 Q. B. 702, and Roberts v. Richards, 54 J. P. 693.

R. C. Glen, for the respondent.—The circumstances do not constitute a commencing "to form or lay out a street" by the respondent. The respondent had nothing to do with the roadway, therefore he could not lay it out as a street, and as "laying out" must precede "forming," he did not commence to form a street. The fact that on the estate plan it was marked as a new street does not affect him. Before the Act of 1894 was passed the respondent would clearly have not been liable: see Gozzett v. Maldon Urban Sanitary Authority, [1894] 1 Q. B. 327, where it was held that the erection by a person of two houses upon ground adjoining a road over which he had a right of way did not amount to laying out the road as a new street within the meaning of a bye-law made under the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 157. The definition of "commencing to form or lay out a street" given in section 8 is not wide enough to include what the respondent did. The section speaks of a house built in such a position as that it may become one of three or more houses abutting on land on which a street, &c. Here there were only two houses, including the respondent's. The street could not be said to be commenced to be formed or laid out within that part of the definition until other houses were commenced to be built adjoining the alleged street. Were it otherwise it would involve a serious hardship on owners who, having once built two houses adjoining such a piece of land as this, could never afterwards alter their plan and build over the space left vacant. The respondent is within the proviso. His purpose was to build houses fronting on Sandhurst-road, with stables behind them to which he hopes to get access from Corbett by means of the alleged street.

LAWRANCE, J.—The magistrate was right. What he meant by his finding was that the respondent's case came within the proviso to section 8. What the respondent did was this: The freeholder had built a row of houses. Then he left forty feet, and sold the land beyond to the respondent. The space of forty feet is referred to in the plan as the "proposed street," and the respondent built the corner house with windows and doors facing the "proposed street," expecting that it would ultimately become a public street; but it was a matter of indifference to him whether the space did in fact become a public street or not, so long as he obtained a right of way to the back part of his house.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. Section 8 is very difficult to understand. It seems to include what is an obvious absurdity, for any house may become "one of three or more houses abutting on land on which a street may be thereafter laid out," because someone may come and build the other two, and the land on which it abuts may thereafter be laid out as a street; therefore everyone who builds a house is commencing to form a street within the meaning of the section. That is an absurdity. But it seems that the Act is framed in the largest way so as to catch everyone. I could not understand the section until Mr. Avory pointed out that the vagueness is corrected by the proviso. So that if a man builds a house where somebody else may afterwards come and build other houses, and does any of the acts mentioned in the section for some purpose other than that of forming a street he is within the proviso. It is legitimate to say that a man does the acts "for some other purpose than that of forming or laying out a street" when he does them for a neutral purpose; for instance, where a man builds his house so that it may be suitable in the event of the adjacent land becoming a street, but so that it may also be equally capable of being used as a house in the event of the land adjacent not becoming a street. That being the meaning of the proviso, the magistrate has by his findings brought the case within it. For what he appears to mean is that the respondent had purchased the land upon the terms that he was to have a right of way or access to the back of the premises. The respondent had no power to turn the adjacent land into a street, but, knowing it was likely to become a street, he so built his house as to be suitable in the event of the street being formed. That seems to me to be a "neutral" purpose, and one that may be described as "other than that of forming or laying out a street" within the proviso.

Appeal dismissed.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Ex parte CALVERT v. WALKER. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Inland Revenue—Proof for income tax—Inquiry by Court of Bankruptcy into assessment—Income Tax Act, 1845, ss. 52, 111, 113, 118.

The Court of Bankruptcy has no power to inquire into the validity of an assessment by Commissioners of Income Tax.

Application by the debtor for leave to expunge a proof for income tax tendered by a collector of inland revenue.

The debtor had failed to make any return of his profits as required by section 52 of the Income Tax Act, 1845, and the commissioners made an assessment upon him in pursuance of section 113, charging him with income tax upon profits estimated at £10,000 a year. The debtor did not appeal against the assessment within the time limited by the commissioners for such purpose. A receiving order having been made against the debtor, the collector proved for the amount due under the assessment. The debtor, who had obtained the assent of his creditors to a composition, now moved to expunge the proof of the collector upon the ground that within the period covered by the assessment he was making no profits at all.

Reed, Q.C., and Carrington, for the debtor.—Upon the facts it is quite clear that the debtor was making losses rather than profits during the period covered by the assessment; the only question is whether, there having been no appeal, the court has power to go behind the assessment in the same manner in which it will go behind a judgment. We submit that it can, for an assessment by Commissioners of Inland Revenue cannot be considered higher than a judgment of the High Court. [WRIGHT, J.—Can the court go behind a judgment in deciding a question of proof.] Yes; Ex parte Revell, In re Tollemache, 33 W. R. 288, 13 Q. B. D. 720, is an instance. The latest case of inquiry into a judgment is Ex parte Troup, In re Hawkins, 43 W. R. 346, [1895] 1 Q. B. 404, and there is an unreported case in which the court inquired into an assessment in a rate-book.

Danckwerts, for the Inland Revenue.—A judgment and an assessment are not upon the same footing, because there is no consideration for an assessment, and the only reason why the court will go behind a judgment is to inquire if there was consideration for it: Ex parte Kibble, In re Onslow, 23 W. R. 423, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 373.

Reed, Q.C., in reply.—If the court has no power to inquire into an assessment, it leaves the debtor in a position to defeat his creditors by making an exaggerated return of profits which might swallow up his whole estate, income-tax being payable in full as a preferential claim.

WRIGHT, J.—It seems to me that the assessment here is not like a judgment nor within the principle on which the cases of judgment are applied. It seems absolutely necessary in order to prevent fraudulent proofs and fraudulent bankruptcies to adopt the view that judgments should not of themselves be conclusive. That view appears to be founded on necessity. Here there is no such necessity. It is quite inconceivable that a man should act in the way that it is suggested he might act in order to spite his creditors. If he did

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

I am not sure that the bankruptcy law is not strong enough to reach the case within certain limits of time—possibly as a fraudulent preference to the Crown. If not within those limits of time I should think very likely on common law principles it might be possible for the court to deal with the matter. In the case of an assessment there is no question of consideration as there is in the case of a judgment, there is a mere administrative assessment with a special mode of appeal provided, which must be followed. I cannot think it possible that it is competent to the Bankruptcy Court, on the invitation of the trustee in bankruptcy, to re-open questions of that kind. It is quite impossible to conceive that it would be competent for me sitting here to go into the question of the rateable values of a union or of a parish, or any question of that sort. That seems to me to be a case which is analogous to the case in which I am at present invited to act. I think the application fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Bankruptcy — Execution —" Tools and implements of trade"—Sheriffs Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 127), s. 8 —Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 44 (2), 45, 54 (1)—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s. 11.

Where the goods of a debtor are seized in execution, and bankruptcy supervenes, unless the official receiver requires the sheriff to hand over the goods seized before sale, the bankrupt will only be entitled to retain the tools of his trade, &c., to the value of £5, as provided by the Sheriffs Act, 1845, s. 8, instead of to the value of £20, as provided by the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 44 (2).

Motion by the bankrupt to continue an interim injunction restraining the Sheriff of Middlesex from selling the debtor's tools and implements of trade to the value of £20.

Upon the 2nd of February, 1899, the Sheriff of Middlesex, acting under a writ of fieri facias, seized the goods of the bankrupt, other than his bedding, wearing apparel, and tools of trade to the value of £5, to satisfy a debt of £37 2s. and £1 10s. costs.

Upon the 8th of March the bankrupt filed his own petition, a receiving order was made against him and he was adjudged bankrupt upon the same day.

The sheriff not having been required by the official receiver to deliver up the goods to him, advertised them for sale on the 14th of March.

The bankrupt obtained an interim injunction to restrain the sheriff from selling the tools of his trade to the value £20, which he now moved to continue.

Barnard Lailey, for the debtor.—By section 54 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, immediately on a debtor being adjudged bankrupt his property shall vest in the trustee, who, until a trustee is appointed by the creditors, is the official receiver. By section 44 (2) the property of the bankrupt shall not comprise the tools of his trade, wearing apparel, &c., to the value of £20. Further, by section 45 an execution creditor is not entitled to the benefit of his execution unless he has completed it by seizure and sale before bankruptcy supervenes. It follows, therefore, in this case, that upon the applicant being adjudged bankrupt his property vested in the official receiver, except his tools of trade, &c., to the value of £20, which he should be allowed to retain.

P. Rose-Innes, for the sheriff.—By section 8 of the Sheriffs Act, 1845, the applicant was only entitled to exemption from seizure of goods to the value of £5, and the sheriff was right in seizing all goods beyond that value. The official receiver never required the sheriff to hand over the goods to him as he might have done under section 11 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890. The only course, therefore, for the sheriff to pursue is to proceed to sell the goods seized and hand over the proceeds, as provided by section 11 (2) of the same Act, to the official receiver.

Barnard Lailey replied.

WRIGHT, J.—This is a point of some difficulty and importance. What happened was this: there was judgment followed by execution whereby the rights of the execution creditor and the sheriff became fixed, subject only to bankruptcy supervening. Till that event the debtor's right to exemption from the seizure of his tools did not extend to tools beyond the value of £5. The question now is whether he has acquired a right to exemption of tools of greater value by becoming bankrupt. I do not think that a supervening bankruptcy alters the position of the sheriff until the official receiver or trustee comes in and claims the goods. Until that occurrs it is the sheriff's duty to go on and complete the execution by sale.

It is true that the following curious and anomalous result ensues: The sheriff having sold the goods hands the proceeds over to the official receiver; the tools are then no longer tools, they have been transformed into money, which the official receiver is entitled to retain, whereas had the official receiver demanded the goods from the sheriff before sale he would have been obliged to allow the bankrupt to retain his tools, &c., to the value of £20. Such, however, is the law, and nothing short of an Act of Parliament can alter it. The injunction must be dissolved.

Appeal against a decision of his Honour Judge Emden in the county court at Tunbridge Wlels.

Mr. Cripps, the appellant, was a solicitor, and had acted for a man named Fooks in an action against Cook, the bankrupt. The action succeeded, but its ultimate result was the bankruptcy of Cook; and Fooks proved in the bankruptcy for the judgment debt and costs.

In 1895 Fooks went abroad without having paid the appellant's bill of costs in the action, and had never been heard of since. He was over seventy years of age at the time of his departure, and his reappearance seemed improbable.

After Fook's disappearance a dividend was declared in the bankruptcy of Cook and Mr. Cripps applied in the county court for an order charging the dividend payable to Fooks to the extent of his costs. He offered to give any indemnity that might be required, and his application was not opposed by the trustee in the bankruptcy, but the judge was of opinion that he had no power to make the order asked for.

Mr. Cripps appealed.

Mackintosh, for the appellant.—I contend that the court has power to make the order asked, and rely on the provisions of section 102 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which empowers the court to decide all questions whatsoever which may arise in the bankruptcy or which the court may deem expedient or necessary to decide for the purpose of doing complete justice. The appellant cannot enforce his claim by garnishee order (see Prout v. Gregory 38 W. R. 204, 24 Q. B. D. 281), and his only course would appear to be this application to the court: see Ex parte Brown, In re Suffield and Watts, 36 W. R. 584, 20 Q. B. D. 693.

Hohler, for the trustee in bankruptcy, referred to Ross v. Buxton, 42 Ch. D. 190, 37 W. R. Dig. 169.

WRIGHT, J. (after stating the facts).—The power of the court to charge money recovered or preserved depends partly upon the common law and partly upon section 28 of the Solicitors Act, 1860: "In every case in which an attorney or solicitor shall be employed to prosecute or defend any suit, matter, or proceeding in any court of justice, it shall be lawful for the court or judge before whom any such suit, matter, or proceeding has been heard, or shall be depending, to declare such attorney or solicitor entitled to a charge upon the property recovered or preserved." It seems, however, plain that the court sitting in bankruptcy has no power to charge property recovered in the High Court, even though such property may have been converted into dividends. It has been urged that section 102 gives us such power, but I do not think that we have any legal right to deal with this fund in the hands of the trustee in the way we have been asked to do. We must contemplate the possibility of the indemnity offered turning out to be valueless, and in such an event we should have jeopardized property which now belongs to Fook, and if he should not re-appear, or die leaving no legal representatives, would probably be the property of the Crown. We cannot interfere with rights such as these.

COWLEY v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE. (a.)

Inland revenue—Estate duty—Settled property—Value of property passing on death—Mortgage created by tenant for life and remainderman—Annuity charged on estates in favour of remainderman during life of tenant for life—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), ss. 1, 2, 7.

The tenant for life and the remainderman in tail of certain property duly barred the entail, reserving to themselves a joint power of appointment over the fee. They subsequently joined in mortgaging the fee simple to secure £230,000, part of which was applied for the benefit of the tenant for life, and the rest was paid to, or for the benefit of, the tenant in tail. A resettlement was afterwards executed, whereby the property was charged with an annuity of £3,000 for the tenant in tail during the life of the then life tenant, who died in 1895.

Held, that what passed on the death of the tenant for life was the equity of redemption, and, in determining its value, the £230,000 should be deducted, but not the capitalized value of the annuity, which ceased to be payable.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (46 W. R. 222, [1898] 1 Q. B. 355), reversed on the main contention.

Appeal by Earl Cowley from an order of the Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, Rigby, and Collins, L.JJ.), reported 46 W. R. 222, [1898] 1 Q. B. 355, where the facts are set out at length. Shortly they are as follows:

A petition was filed by the third Earl Cowley pursuant to rule 1 of the rules made under section 10 of the Finance Act, 1894, for the determination of the amount of estate duty payable upon the estate of the second Earl Cowley, who died on the 28th of February, 1895. The Mornington estates were settled upon the second Earl Cowley for life with remainder to his son (the third earl) in tail. The second earl had mortgaged his life interest therein in 1868.

By a disentailing deed executed by the second earl and the present appellant on the 14th of January, 1887 (and duly enrolled), the estate tail of the third earl in the settled property was barred, and the settled property limited to such uses as the second earl and his son (the third earl) should jointly appoint, and in default of appointment to the use of the second earl for life by way of restoration of the life estate vested in him immediately before the execution of the disentailing deed, with remainder to the third earl in tail, with remainders over.

The father and son in 1888 joined in creating mortgages whereby, in exercise of the powers given to them by the disentailing deed, they appointed, and by virtue of their estates and interests conveyed all the settled property in fee simple to the mortgagees to secure £230,000. Of this sum nearly £198,000 was paid to or on behalf of the second earl, and some £30,000 to or for the appellant.

By a deed of resettlement, subsequently executed, and which completed as between the second and third earl the arrangement under which the £230,000 was borrowed, it was provided that the third earl should receive during the life of the second earl certain annuities, which at the death of the second earl amounted to £3,000 a year, and that as between the second earl, his trustees, executors, and administrators, and the third earl, his heirs, executors, and administrators, the second earl should during his life be primarily liable for the repayment of the interest on the mortgage debt.

The second earl died on the 28th of February, 1895, and the appellant lodged a statement and valuation of the amount upon which he was liable to pay duty under the Finance Act, 1894.

The Commissioners of Inland Revenue disallowed the deduction of the £230,000 with which the settled estates had been charged, and also of the capital value of the annuity of £3,000.

Upon the petition coming before the Divisional Court (Pollock, B., and Bruce, J.), reported 45 W. R. 538, [1897] 2 Q. B. 47, they allowed the deduction of the £230,000, but not the capitalized value of the annuity of £3,000. The Court of Appeal reversed this decision as regards the deduction of the £230,000 only.

The present appellant appealed on both points.

Haldane, Q.C., and H. Fellows, for the appellant.

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G., and Vaughan Hawkins (Sir Richard Webster, A.G., with them), for the respondents.

THE HOUSE took time for consideration.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—The question in this case is upon what property the duty is payable by the appellant under the Finance Act, 1894. That statute enacts in the 1st section that certain duties shall be levied and paid upon the principal value of all property, real or personal, settled or not settled, which passes on the death of a person dying after the commencement of the Act.

The second Earl Cowley died possessed of the equity of redemption of certain estates, and the appellant, to whom that property had passed, is undoubtedly liable to pay the duties ascertained in the specified manner.

It does not appear to me that that question is a very difficult one. What I have described as the equity of redemption is undoubtedly the true description of the property, and what passed upon the death of the second earl to the third earl was the equity of redemption. How the value of that is to be ascertained is for this purpose unimportant. The thing which is liable to duty is that property and no other thing.

For the purpose of my opinion I discard all reference to the 7th section, which is only applicable to the mode of determining the value of an estate whatever that estate is; and if I am right that the estate which the second earl possessed was that which came to the third earl by the second earl's death, we have nothing to do with allowances or the series of enactments upon that subject, but the whole question must be determined upon the property, real or personal, settled or not settled, which passed on the death of the second earl.

I have great difficulty in following the reasoning by which, in the Court of Appeal, it has been held that one is at liberty to go back to the history of the property to which the third earl succeeded, and to split up that property into the different interests of which it was originally composed. If I may trace out in this case the life estate and the remainder in fee or in tail, I do not know how far back in the history of the property in question I may be entitled to go, nor am I quite certain what is intended to be effected by such an inquiry. There is no part of the Finance Act which appears to me to give ground for such an investigation, and I do not know that the adoption of any such principle by your lordships would not have a far wider operation than upon such taxation questions as arise in such cases.

It would seem to me to be a very pertinent question to ask whether the deeds which were executed in 1887 by the late earl and the appellant did or did not operate as they purported to operate; and if not, why not? But if they did, what prevented the appellant and his father granting a mortgage to the Prudential Co. upon the settled estates? What was done with the money seems to me to be immaterial. Though as a matter of fact the greater part of it was paid to liquidate the liabilities of the second earl, there was a second mortgage for the security of a further advance of £20,000; but in the view that I take of this case it is immaterial to pursue the destination of the money or the source from which it came. As a matter of fact, the whole property which is in question upon this part of the case is the equity of redemption. If that is all that the appellant has received that is all upon which he is bound to pay duty.

Your lordships have already held in Attorney-General v. Beech, ante, p. 257, [1899] A. C. 53, that where a tenant for life and remainderman in fee combine so as to get complete command of the estate in fee they may dispose of it as they will, and I am unable to comprehend why, when they grant a mortgage in fee, that transaction is capable of being dissected so as to prevent the union of the two estates, and by an artificial process resolve the estate into its original elements, or into its original settlement, and treat them as though such new arrangement had not been made at all. It would seem as though the argument suggested (although the Act does not say so) that the ordinary transaction of a resettlement of an estate can, for the purpose of the Finance Act, be traced back to any period, however remote, and duties exacted upon the artificial theory that you must treat each death in the chain of investigation as giving rise to liability to duty under an Act passed long after the resettlement or the death.

There is only one argument—namely, the conveyancing point referred to by Collins, L.J.—which seems to give any ground for looking back to the history of the transactions out of which this question has arisen. It appears that the incumbrances which did or might have existed were assigned to the company advancing the money as a protection to them in case any claim should be made in respect of some dealing with his life estate by the second earl. If it had been found that any such dealing had taken place the lenders wanted to have a right which should take precedence of any such dealing; but I confess I am unable to understand how this transaction could affect or in any way interfere with the power of the second and third earl to resettle the estate, or, having resettled it, to grant a mortgage in fee such as they did grant with the result which I have described. I am wholly unable to give any such interpretation to an Act which seems to me in its ordinary and natural meaning to be clear enough, and I for one decline to go into a minute investigation as to how the equity of redemption was created. It is enough for me that that is the property which, under section 1 of the Act, has passed to the appellant, and that alone is the property upon which he is liable.

I see no ground for dealing with section 2, since for the reasons I have given, I think it is section 1 to which you must look to see what property, real or personal, settled or not settled, passed upon the death of the second to the third earl; but if I were compelled to give a construction to section 2, sub-section 1 (b), I should come to the same conclusion in respect of the liability to duty, since I think the benefit accruing or arising to the third earl was only to the extent of the value of the equity of redemption. But, as I have said, the question must be determined on section 1 alone.

As to the claim by the appellant to a deduction in respect of the cesser of the rent-charge of £3,000 a year, it is enough to say that the argument in respect of it is hardly intelligible, and certainly the appellant has made out no case to establish it.

No question as to the policies has been raised, and I therefore do not allude to them.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed, and with costs.

Lord WATSON (after stating the facts and the claims made by the appellant for deduction).—The legal questions raised by these two claims are so different in their character that I shall notice them separately. I have come, without much difficulty, to the conclusion that the order of the Court of Appeal ought to be reversed, and the judgment of the Divisional Court restored.

With regard to the second deduction claimed by the appellant, I have had no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the decisions of both courts below were right. Very little was said about the point in the argument of the learned counsel for the appellant, and, so far as I can see, their reticence was not injudicious. The annuities, the capitalized value of which forms the subject of the claim, were regularly paid to the appellant during his father's lifetime, and they ceased to be payable on his death. No part of them formed a charge upon the equitable estate to which the appellant has succeeded, under the deed of resettlement, not in fee but in life-rent. In these circumstances I do not think it can, with any degree of plausibility, be maintained that the estate which passed to the appellant upon his father's death has been thereby diminished or affected.

The argument addressed to us with reference to the other point, the charge of £230,000 advanced on mortgage by the Prudential Assurance Co. (Limited), did not, so far as I could discern, involve any serious question as to the construction of the Finance Act. It turned mainly, if not exclusively, upon the real character and legal effect of the deeds by which the advance was secured. On the one hand, it was not disputed by the appellant's counsel that if the original settlement of the Mornington estates had remained unaltered, and these deeds had been executed by the late earl as life-renter, and by the appellant as expectant fiar, no part of the sum of £230,000 would have formed a proper deduction from the amount upon which the appellant is liable for finance duty. In that case the appellant would have derived benefit from his father's decease to the extent to which he had borrowed upon the security of his right in expectancy, and would thereby have been enabled to pay his own debt. On the other hand, counsel for the Crown hardly ventured to dispute that if the £230,000 had been duly charged by the original settlor, or had been subsequently validly charged upon the fee of the settled estates, the appellant must be held to have taken the estates cum onere, and could not be held, upon his father's death, to have taken any benefit from the charge of £230,000, or in the estates, so far as these were affected by it.

The learned counsel for the respondents accordingly addressed themselves to the bold and, in my opinion, somewhat extravagant contention that, notwithstanding the tenor of the securities held by the Prudential Assurance Co., the reality of the transaction between the company and the mortgagors, apart from any question as to the form of conveyancing adopted in the deeds, consisted in the second Earl Cowley and the appellant merely pledging their respective rights of life-rent and expectant fee. I should not have thought that the argument was deserving of much consideration, had it not been that it appears to have found favour with the learned judges of the Court of Appeal.

A. L. Smith, L.J., who was of the same opinion with the other learned lords justices, after stating that the second earl's life estate was not extinguished or merged into an equitable estate in fee in the Prudential Co., goes on to say: "The real substance of what was done, and this is what is to be looked at apart from the form of the conveyancing, was that the second earl mortgaged his life estate in the settled estates to the Prudential Co., and that his son mortgaged his reversion in such estates to that company to secure the repayment of the £230,000, and that this was the real transaction, whether it was bound to be carried out by one deed or by two."

The argument thus stated appears to me to ignore these facts that, in the first place, the Finance Act, 1894—does not prohibit the alteration or modification of the terms of the settlement by any legitimate means; and in the second place, that, assuming the proceedings taken in the years 1887, 1888, and 1889, for disentailing, charging with debt, and resettling the estates, to have been at the time valid, the Act of 1894 does not contain a single provision which, either directly or indirectly, denies effect to them. It is not maintained on behalf of the Crown that any one of these proceedings was illegitimate or invalid. The disentailing assurance had the legal effect of vesting the second earl and his son with the full right and title to dispose of the life-rent and the fee of the settled estates, and in virtue of that right and title they entered into onerous contracts with the Prudential Co., by which they professed to convey, and did convey to the company, in security, the immediate fee of the estate. Notwithstanding the reasoning of the learned lords justices, I fail to comprehend how the merger or non-merger of the second earl's life estate could possibly affect the title of the earl and his son to convey the immediate fee. I see no reason to doubt that, under their two conveyances, the company acquired, and from the date of the completion of their securities was possessed of an interest in fee, which was effectual against the beneficiaries under the settlement made by the last Earl of Mornington, including the appellant. I think the appellant took the estate cum onere of the charge of £230,000, which under the settlement as modified affected the settled estates in the same way as if it had been created by the original settlor, and that upon his father's death no interest or benefit accrued to the appellant in respect of any part of the estates which was covered by the securities of the Prudential Assurance Co. Any other conclusion is, to my mind, at variance with the substance and reality of the transaction.

A certain degree of colour was lent to the respondents' argument by the circumstance that the assurance company took an assignment of the debts due by the second earl to the London Assurance, which were charged upon his life estate with the same powers of recovery which were competent to their assignors. The object of the company in taking the assignment apparently was, not to impair the security which they had obtained from the appellant and his father over the immediate fee of the settled estates, but to enable them to compete with creditors, if any, to whom the second earl might possibly have previously conveyed his life estate. In short, the assignment was a precautionary device resorted to in order to meet the possibilities of events which had never occurred.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—The principle on which the Finance Act, 1894, was founded is that whenever property changes hands on death the State is entitled to step in and take toll of the property as it passes without regard to its destination or to the degree of relationship, if any, that may have subsisted between the deceased and the person or persons succeeding. Section 1 gives effect to that principle. Subject to certain exceptions or savings, it imposes a duty called estate duty upon the principal value of all property "settled or not settled" which passes on death. Section 2 is merely subsidiary and supplemental. It was intended apparently to sweep in a few cases which were thought perhaps to be within the spirit though not within the letter of the proposed enactment, or else were supposed likely to lead to evasion if not made equally subject to estate duty. Section 2 therefore declares that the expression "property passing on the death of the deceased" shall be "deemed to include" property classified under four different heads, to no one of which does that expression literally apply. The rest of the Act deals with matters of detail, valuation, and machinery.

The 1st section contains the pith and substance of the enactment. It is comprehensive, broad, and clear. The other provisions of the Act, which were dragged into the discussion rather unnecessarily as it seems to me, are strangely confused and singularly ill-drawn. But still I do not think that the Act is wholly to blame for the perplexity in which the learned judges below found themselves entangled. I think they took a wrong turn at starting. They left the broad highway for a narrow by-path, which led in a wrong direction and presented difficulties increasing at every step. Is it any wonder if they came to a wrong conclusion?

The first question as it seems to me—the question that lies at the very threshold of our inquiry—is simply this: Under which section of the Finance Act, 1894, does the present case fall? Is it the ordinary and normal case of property passing on death, or is it one of those exceptional cases in which property is deemed to pass, though there is no passing of property in fact? Does it come under section 1 or under section 2? The learned judges of the Court of Appeal, one and all, have held that the case is not within section 1. The reason is given by A. L. Smith, L.J. His lordship quotes the words of section 1, and then goes on to say: "This section would not, I think, embrace the present case, for the life estate of the second earl ceased at his death and passed to no one." I must say I cannot think that reasoning satisfactory. What the Act has in view for the purpose of taxation is property passing on death, not the interest of the deceased, which if it be a limited interest can never pass. With an interest that ceases on death the Act is not directly concerned, except in the one case where without any passing of property a benefit accrues or arises by reason of the cesser of a determinable interest such as a charge that expires. In every case in which property comprised in a settlement passes on death the life estate or other limited interest of the preceding owner must have ceased for good and all. If the criterion proposed by the learned lord justice were the true criterion, settled property could not in any case come within section 1. But then that section expressly and in terms applies to settled property. You might just as well strike the word "settled" out of section 1 altogether as hold that the section does not embrace a case where a limited interest under a settlement ceases on death and passes to no one.

I am, therefore, compelled to differ from the Court of Appeal at the very outset. I think the present case falls within section 1. I think it belongs to a class of cases which the authors of the Act had directly in view when they framed that section.

Now, if the case falls within section 1 it cannot also come within section 2. The two sections are mutually exclusive. Section 1 might properly, I think, be headed, "With regard to property passing on death, be it enacted as follows." Section 2 might with equal propriety be headed, "And with regard to property not passing on death, be it enacted as follows" I cannot, therefore, agree with Rigby, L.J., when he says that section 2 is a provision "explanatory" of section 1. In my opinion the two sections are quite distinct, and section 2 throws no light on section 1. But, then, no doubt section 2 speaks of "property in which the deceased . . . had an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased." And that, it may be said, was just the position of the second earl with regard to the Mornington settled estates. So it was. But section 2 does not apply to an interest in property which passes on the death of the deceased. That is already dealt with in the earlier section. For, if property passing on death was in the lifetime of the deceased subject to a charge or interest which ceased on the death, the property must of course pass free from that charge or interest. And, so passing, it must of course be valued accordingly. That is section 1. You do not want section 2 for that. You cannot resort to section 2. For that would be giving the duty twice over. The Crown cannot have it both ways. Double duty is forbidden by the Act.

It is interesting and, I think, instructive to refer to sub-section 4 and 5 of the Succession Duty Act, from which the provisions of section 2, sub-section 1 (a), and section 2, sub-section 1 (b), are evidently adapted. The marginal note to section 4 is this: "General powers of appointment to confer successions." In the Succession Duty Act a power of appointment confers a succession when it is exercised, but only then. In the analogous provision of the Finance Act "property of which the deceased was competent to dispose at the time of his death" is deemed to pass though the power be not exercised. Then the marginal note to section 5 of the Succession Duty Act runs as follows: "Extinction of determinable charges to confer successions." The section itself provides that "Where any property shall . . . be subject to any charge, estate, or interest determinable by the death of any person . . . the increase of benefit accruing to any person or persons upon the extinction or determination of such charge, estate, or interest shall be deemed to be a succession. It is quite plain, I think, that the provisions of section 2, sub-section 1 (b), of the Finance Act, 1894, have been borrowed and adapted from that section. But they do not, as I said just now, refer to the cesser of an interest in property which passes, but to the cesser of an interest in property which does not pass. On reading the Act I think this is made tolerably clear not only by the opening sentence of section 2, sub-section 1, but also by the directions for valuing "the benefit accruing or arising from the cesser of an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased" in section 7, sub-section 7. If property passes you can put a value on it by considering what it would fetch in the open market. You must resort to other means in order to estimate the value of property deemed to pass when an interest ceases. And here I would venture to say that, in my opinion, the provisions of section 7, sub-section 7 (b), are not open to the severe censure passed upon them in the Court of Appeal. They are quite intelligible if section 2, sub-section 1 (b), be confined to the case which it was really intended to meet. The difficulty, so far as there is any, comes from the drafting of section 2, sub-section 1 (b). There would have been none, I think, if the draftsman had been content to follow the wording of the Succession Duty Act. But the general word "interest" without the word "charge" preceding it at first sight seems to point rather to a life interest than to a determinable charge. And thus it was, I think, that the Court of Appeal were led into the error which seems to run through their judgment.

Now, if the present case is within section 1 and not within section 2, the only remaining question is, what was the settled property that passed on the death of the second earl? "Settled property," according to the definition of that expression in the Finance Act, 1894, "means property comprised in a settlement." It is difficult to see what else it could possibly mean. But at any rate it is a comfort to find something in the Act about which there can be no dispute. The settled property in this case is the property comprised in the resettlement of the 9th of June, 1888. What was that property? Why, the equity of redemption of the Mornington estates, which were subject to certain incumbrances described as the overriding charges, and subject also to the mortgage in fee simple in favour of the Prudential Assurance Co. to secure £230,000. There can be no doubt about that. What, then, was the principal value of the settled property? That, according to section 7, sub-section 5, must be estimated at the price which, in the opinion of the commissioners, the property comprised in the resettlement would have fetched if sold in the open market at the time of the second earl's death. What right the commissioners can have to swell that estimate by adding to it a sum equal to the amount of the Prudential mortgage I cannot understand. The mortgage did not pass on the death of the second earl. The mortgage debt was no part of the settled property. It diminished the property before resettlement. I may remark in passing that we are not concerned with section 7, sub-section 1. Whatever the meaning of that section may be, as to which I do not hazard a conjecture, it can have nothing to do with the present case, for in the present case the property which had to be brought into the aggregated estate "for determining the rate of duty" was not subject to any debt. It was only the equity of redemption that was resettled. Then we had a long argument about the doctrine of merger, and an argument longer still, intended to persuade the House that, for the purpose of this Act, the transaction with the Prudential ought to be split up into two distinct mortgages—one by the second earl and one by the present earl, one by the father mortgaging his life estate and one by the son mortgaging his reversion. The Court of Appeal say that was the real transaction. In my opinion it was nothing of the kind. The Prudential Co. bargained for a mortgage in fee simple, and a mortgage in fee simple they got. Why the commissioners should seek to reform a deed which carried out the transaction between the parties in the way everybody wished to have it carried out is beyond my comprehension. The argument seems to be founded on a fallacious analogy. Because in the case of succession duty it is necessary and proper to trace a disposition of property to its origin for the purpose of seeing out of whose interest the succession is derived and so discovering the predecessor, therefore it seems to be thought you are at liberty, in the case of the Finance Act, to dissect and pull to pieces one entire and completed transaction in order to enable the Crown to exact duty in respect of property which neither passed nor can be deemed to pass. Nor, again, can I see how the question is affected by the circumstance that mortgages, in fact paid off, were transferred and kept alive for the purpose of forming a protection against mesne incumbrances during the life of the tenant for life. That is every-day practice. Every beginner is acquainted with that device. Collins, L.J., thinks it decisive in favour of the commissioners. With deference, I think it has nothing to do with the question. If, indeed, it could be shown that by the cesser of that protective interest any benefit arose or accrued to anybody under section 2, sub-section 1 (b), which has not already been taken into account, and which could be valued under section 7, sub-section 7, there might be some show of reason in the argument. But that would be a hopeless contention in the circumstances.

The result is that in my opinion the commissioners are wrong from beginning to end on the main point. Some people think the Act a harsh Act as it stands. It would be intolerable if it could be construed as the commissioners desire to construe it.

As regards the minor point urged by Mr. Haldane I think the claim to deduct the value of the £3,000 annuity must fail. There is no foundation for it; the property passed free from the annuity, and the Act makes no provision for any such allowance. There was a provision to that effect in the Succession Duty Act. At any rate section 38 of that Act was so construed in this House: Lord Braybrooke v. Attorney-General, 9 W. R. 601, 9 H. L. Cas. 150; Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Harrison, 22 W. R. 559, L. R. 7 H. L. 1. But there is no analogous provision in the Finance Act, 1894.

I agree that the appeal must be allowed with costs here and below.

Lord MORRIS.—I agree a priori it would be expected that an estate duty accruing on a death would be calculated on the amount of property left by the deceased at the time of his death, and which would be payable by the person getting the property so left to the extent to which he did get it. Has the Finance Act of 1894 enacted anything more than that? The appellant on the death of his father succeeded to an equity of redemption in the Cowley estate—a mortgage of £230,000 affecting it. Much of the argument in the case has been addressed to the state of the title under the Mornington will, which, in my opinion, is beside the question, as are all considertions of how the title stood antecedent to the indenture of resettlement of the 9th of June, 1888—that was the settlement under the provisions of which the property passes. It also appears to me to be irrelevant to inquire into the conveyancing mazes or devices by which that was effected. The substance is that the estate was mortgaged and that an equity of redemption remained. If the property passed to the appellant on the death of his father under section 1—as I consider it did—I ask, what passed? Surely a property subject to a mortgage—or, if the property is to be deemed to pass under section 2, sub-section 1 (b) of that section enacts that it is to be deemed to pass to the extent to which a benefit accrues. I ask what extent of benefit in the rest of the Cowley property comes to any person by reason of the death of Lord Cowley? Surely the difference between the value of the Cowley estate and the amount of the mortgage or prior charge. With respect to the allowance claimed by the appellant by reason of the ceasing of the rent-charge payable to him during the lifetime of his father, I fail to see any sound argument for such contention. He succeeded to the Cowley property burdened with its charges; and that he at the same time ceased to enjoy a rent-charge is an indifferent fact.

Lord SHAND.—The questions raised in this appeal have been so fully discussed by some of your lordships that I have not much to add. As to the point on which my noble and learned friend Lord Macnaghten has strongly insisted, I agree in holding that this case falls within the 1st section of the Finance Act.

The property in question, having been disentailed, formed the subject of a deed of resettlement under which it again became "settled estate," as defined in the Act. What, then, was the settled estate, beneficial in its nature, which passed to the appellant on the death of his father, the late Earl Cowley? The answer to that question is, I think, the right to the possession and enjoyment of the settled estate no longer burdened by the right of life-rent of his father, the late earl. This right may be well described in technical legal language as the equity of redemption, which is so described, I presume, because of the power which the appellant has to acquire and enjoy an unburdened right of property by payment of the amount secured by mortgages on the estate and to which that estate was subject. But in ordinary language one would justly say the estate itself passed on the death of the deceased earl to the appellant, his son, and so estate duty became due.

What, then, is the value of that estate? It was well and validly charged with a debt of £230,000, which formed a burden on the succession which opened to the appellant, and I confess I can see no answer to the appellant's demand to have the amount of that charge or burden taken into view as a deduction from the value of the estate in estimating the estate duty payable.

I have only to add that I agree with my noble and learned friends in thinking that the circumstance that the Prudential Assurance Co., in transacting with the late earl and the appellant in the advances they made, took an assignment of the debts due by the second earl to the London Assurance Corporation, and the securities given for these debts, can have no effect on the determination of the present question. That assignment was given and taken obviously for a purpose quite in common use, that purpose being only to enable the Prudential Co. to compete with creditors if there were any in whose favour the second earl might have granted securities affecting his life-rent right.

Lord DAVEY. — I entirely concur in the judgment proposed, and I should not add anything were it not that we are differing from a unanimous and carefully considered judgment of the Court of Appeal.

The first and principal question is whether the mortgage for £230,000 ought to be deducted in assessing the value of the settled estates for the purpose of the payment of estate duty under the Finance Act, 1894. I agree with the views so fully and clearly expressed by my noble and learned friend opposite (Lord Macnaghten) as to the construction of that Act, and I think that the case, the facts of which I need not recapitulate, clearly falls within the 1st section. But, in my opinion, whether it falls within the 1st or the 2nd section we arrive at the same result.

By the 1st section of that Act the tax is imposed on all property, settled or unsettled, which passes on the death of any person, and by the 2nd section, sub-section 1, property passing on the death of the deceased is to be deemed to include the property following. The only material words for the present purpose are in sub-section 1 (b): "Property in which the deceased or any other person had an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased to the extent to which a benefit accrues or arises by the cesser of such interest.'

I ask myself, therefore, what property passed on the death of the second earl, or (which appears to me in this case to be the same question in other words) in what property had the second earl an interest ceasing on his death, and did a benefit then accrue or arise.

The Court of Appeal have held that the property passing was the whole value of the estates without deduction of the Prudential Co.'s mortgage. And they have come to that conclusion on the grounds that the mortgage was not really a mortgage in fee, but was in truth two mortgages—one on the life estate of the second earl, and one on the remainder of the appellant.

Since the decision in Attorney-General v. Beck it cannot be denied that if tenant for life and remainderman in fee combine to sell settled property, it is thereby taken out of the settlement, and does not pass, and is not to be deemed to pass, on the death of the life tenant. And I think the result must be the same if, instead of selling, they combine to create a mortgage in fee upon the settled property. Pro tanto the property is taken out of the settlement, and what passes on the death of the tenant for life is the equity of redemption only, and the benefit accruing or arising in that event is in that equity alone. In the present case the mortgage was antecedent to the settlement under which the appellant now claims title in remainder. But it is said that the conveyancing arrangements in the present case, by which the incumbrances on the life estate were purposely kept alive for the better security of the mortgagees, prevented any union of the life estate and remainder in them, and they were not mortgagees on the fee in possession during the second earl's lifetime.

"It is the existence," says Collins, L.J., "of this mortgage (on the life estate) so kept alive and determining, so far as it was a charge on the life estate, on the death of the second Earl Cowley, that is decisive in favour of the Crown in this case." With the most sincere respect for the learned judges in the Court of Appeal, I find myself unable to concur in this view, which seems to me to overlook the substance and real character of the transaction.

The joint power created by the disentailing deed was the appropriate machinery for enabling the parties to make a conveyance of their respective interests by a simultaneous act and so as to create one estate. By the exercise of that power a mortgage was created which was expressed to be, and intended to be, a mortgage on the fee, and, in my opinion, was a mortgage of the equitable fee, subject, of course, to all existing burdens.

There was no intervening estate or interest which prevented a union in the appointees of whatever equitable estate was left in the life tenant (subject to the charges thereon) with the equitable estate in remainder of the appellant. The money due to the holder of the incumbrances effected by the second earl on his life estate was paid out of the mortgage money. If the matter had rested there, or if the incumbrances had been left outstanding and undischarged, there could not, in my opinion, have been any question that a mortgage was created on the corpus of the property, subject to the subsisting charges created by the will of the first earl, and subject also during the life of the second earl to whatever prior incumbrances, effected by him on his life estate, were subsisting. But the incumbrances were assigned to the Prudential Co., and this is said to make all the difference, and to be decisive of the case. I am really unable to understand how or why the rights of the mortgagees conferred by the exercise of the power were altered or (as is said) split into two mortgages, because, by a conveyancing device, they had also a collateral right in case a mesne incumbrance turned up, to claim priority over it during the life of the second earl.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the property in which the second earl had an interest ceasing with his death, was the equity of redemption only, or (in other words) his interest was in the income of the estate after deduction of the interest on the Prudential Co.'s mortgage (laying aside the paramount charges), and the benefit which accrued or arose on the second earl's death under section 2, sub-section 1 (b), if the case falls under that sub-section, was the principal value of that income only, or, shortly, the value of the equity of redemption.

All the learned judges in both courts below, except perhaps Rigby, L.J., have agreed that section 7, sub-section 1, applies only to the case of an estate passing from a deceased owner subject to his debts and incumbrances. That sub-section is not an easy one to construe, and I am not satisfied that I have quite mastered the meaning of it, but I do not think that it applies to the present case.

There is only one other point I wish to mention. The policies which formed part of the security of the incumbrancers on the life estates were assigned to trustees upon trust to apply the proceeds on the death of the second earl in reduction of the Prudential Co.'s mortgage, and not, as Smith, L.J., seems to have thought, to the Prudential Co. themselves. No claim to estate duty on the proceeds of the policies, or to deduct the proceeds of these policies from the mortgage debt, is made by the Attorney-General in this appeal, and no argument was addressed to your lordships on the point. Consequently, no opinion is expressed or implied upon it in the decision of this case.

As to the other point—whether the appellant is entitled to any deduction in respect of the cesser of the rent-charge of £3,000 a year to which he was entitled during the second earl's lifetime—I agree with your lordships that he is not entitled to that deduction, and I need not repeat the reasons which have been given.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—Before putting the question I think it right to add that my lamented and distinguished friend, Lord Herschell, authorized me to say that he concurred in the conclusion at which your lordships have now arrived.

Order appealed from reversed and order of the Queen's Bench Division restored with costs here and below.

HOLNESS v. MACKAY & DAVIES. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accidental injuries—Accident arising out of and in course of employment—Workman injured on his way to his work—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 1, sub-section 1.

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, it appeared that the workman was in the employment of a firm of contractors, who had contracted with a railway company for the construction of a siding. While he was walking to his work, the weather being foggy, he was run over by a train and killed on the main line, about seven minutes before the time for the commencement of work and at a distance of about 150 yards from the place of work.

Held, by A. L. Smith and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ. (Romer, L.J., dissenting), that there was nothing to justify the county court judge in holding that the accident arose out of and in the course of the workman's employment.

Appeal from the decision of the judge of the Newport County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant was the widow of a workman who had met with his death in consequence of accidental injuries while in the employment of a firm of contractors, who had contracted with the Great Western Railway Co. for the construction of sidings in connection with the company's line of railway between Newport and Cardiff. The workmen employed by the contractors on this work had access to the premises of the railway company by one or other of two gates—viz., the Waterloo gate on the south side of the main line, and the Maesglas gate on the north side.

The deceased was a ganger, and the gang of which he was in charge was engaged in ballasting a siding on the south side of the main line.

On the morning of the 12th of November, 1898, while the deceased was walking to his work, the weather being very foggy, he was run over by an express train on the main line and was killed. His work was to have commenced at 7 a.m.

The accident happened at 6.53 a.m., at a distance of about 150 yards from the siding.

There was no evidence as to whether the deceased entered the railway company's premises by the Maesglas gate, in which case it would have been necessary for him to cross the main line, or by the Waterloo gate, in which case it would not have been necessary for him to cross the main line. He had been told by the contractors' foreman to come upon the line by the Waterloo gate, which was the more convenient gate for him.

The county court judge drew the inference that the deceased came on to the line by the Waterloo gate, and lost his way in the fog, and he was of opinion that, by whichever gate the deceased came on to the line, he began his day's work when he got upon the company's premises in order to go to his work. He accordingly held that the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment of the deceased, and he made an award in favour of the applicant.

The employers appealed.

Ruegg, Q.C., and A. J. David, for the appellants.—The accident did not arise out of and in the course of the employment of the deceased. It happened at a time before his work had commenced and at a place some distance from the locality of his work. The employers had no control over the place where he was killed. The county court judge thought that the employers were under an obligation to obtain a license from the railway company to enable the deceased to get to his work, and that, while he was going to his work under that license he was in the course of his employment: see Brydon v. Stewart, 2 Macq. 30. But there was no necessity for him to go upon the main line at all. The county court judge also based his decision on Tunney v. Midland Railway Co., L. R. 1 C. P. 291, 14 W. R. C. L. Dig. 57; but that case is distinguishable from this.

Montague Lush, for the respondent.—It is not necessary to contend that in every case where a workman is injured while on his way to his work the Act applies. Each case depends on its own circumstances, and there is no reason here for interfering with the finding of the county court judge. This case is analogous to that where a workman employed on work in a particular corner of a quarry meets with an accident while passing through the quarry to his place of work, or where a man employed on an upper floor of a factory meets with an accident on a lower floor while proceeding to his work.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This case raises an important question—viz., whether an employer is liable under the Workmen's Compensation Act for accidental injury sustained by a workman while going to his work. I do not think it can be said as an abstract proposition that an employer is under such a liability. The employment to which the Act applies is employment on or in or about a railway, factory, or one of the other localities specified in section 7, sub-section 1. I cannot say that injuries sustained by a man while he is going to his employment arise out of his employment on, in, or about the railway, factory, or other locality where the employment takes place. In this case the employers, who were contractors, had undertaken the work of ballasting a siding, which was at the side of the Great Western main railway line, and the deceased man was employed by them on that work. The contractors had control over the siding, but they had no control over the main line on which the man was killed. There were two ways by which the deceased might have gone to his work. If he went by the Waterloo gate it would not be necessary for him to go upon the main line at all. If he went by the other gate he would have to cross the main line. He was found dead on the main line, and apparently he had walked along it some way and had then been run over in the fog and killed. Now, did the accident arise out of and in the course of his employment? His employment was on the siding, and not at all on the main line of the Great Western Railway. It was no part of his contract of employment that he should go to his employment by any particular way. While he was on his way to his work, some seven minutes before the time at which his work was to commence, and before he had reached the locality where his work was to be done, he met with his death. It is said that this case resembles that of a workman being killed by an accident in a large quarry while on his way to his work in a particular corner of the quarry, or of a man whose employment is on an upper floor of a factory meeting with an accident on a lower floor while on his way to his work. But in the supposed cases the employers would have the control of the whole quarry or factory. This case seems to me to be quite different, and to be more similar to that of a man meeting with an accident while going along a highway to his work. There was no contract here between the employers and the workman that the employment should extend so as to embrace within it matters occurring before the time for the commencement of the work and not upon the locality where the work was to be done. And I think the county court judge was wrong in holding that there was anything in the facts to show that the employment was so extended. It was suggested that the employers were under an obligation to obtain a license for the workman to cross the line, and the case of Brydon v. Stewart was referred to as an authority to show that the workman while going along or across the line was in the course of his employment. In my opinion, that case does not govern the present case, and I cannot think that the deceased's work began when he came upon the premises of the railway company and was still going to his work. The case of Tunney v. Midland Railway Co. seems to me to be distinguishable from this case. I therefore think that the accident did not arise out of and in the course of the employment of the deceased, and that the appeal must be allowed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not agree with the conclusion of law at which the county court judge arrived, but I recognize that he grappled with the question of law which he had to decide. The question is whether on the facts as found by him this accident was an accident which arose out of and in the course of the employment of the deceased. It occurred before the time when, by the contract between the parties, the workman's work was to begin, and before he arrived at the place where the work was to be done. The county court judge came to this conclusion, that, as a general proposition, a workman's employment does not begin until he gets to the place where he has to do his work, but that the duration of the employment may be amplified by reason of the nature of the employment. The case of Brydon v. Stewart was cited before him, and he asked himself whether the facts of this case showed anything arising out of the contract of employment which had the effect of thus amplifying the duration of the employment, and he found that a state of things did exist which, as he thought, involved some duty on the part of the employer towards the workman even before the workman arrived at the place of his work, and he accordingly held that this accident arose in the course of the employment of the deceased. I arrive at a different conclusion. On the facts I think that the employer owed no such obligation to the workman as would have the effect of extending the duration of the employment so as to make this accident an accident arising in the course of the employment. In my opinion the employer was bound to obtain a license for the workman to go upon the railway company's premises so as to enable him to get to his work without being a trespasser, but the employer was not under any obligation to the workman, either by giving warning as to the running of trains or otherwise, to take care of him while crossing the line. I think that at the time of the accident the employer had no duty towards the deceased, and that there was nothing in the nature of the employment to extend its duration. As to the case which has been suggested of a man meeting with an accident in a factory while going to his work in another part of the same factory, if the whole factory was not under the control of the same employer, the suggested case does not assist the consideration of the present case, for it is idem per idem with it. If, on the other hand, the whole factory was under the control of the employer, the case is useless as an analogy, unless it is also explained why the case of a factory not all under the control of the employer should be treated as analogous to the case of a factory which is all under the control of the employer.

ROMER, L.J.—I differ from my learned brethren with much diffidence. But the county court judge has found that this accident arose out of and in the course of the employment of the deceased man, and I think there was evidence which justified him in so doing, and that therefore we ought not to differ from his finding. The place where the deceased man's work had to be done was surrounded by railway lines, and he had to cross what might be called a dangerous zone in order to get to his work. It was clearly necessary for him to have through the contractors a license to go upon the railway company's premises

That license was obtained and given by implication, and at the time of the accident the deceased man was acting under it. In my opinion the contractors were not free from all obligation towards the workman while he was going across the railway company's premises to get to his work, and I think that his employment commenced when he began to act under the license and go upon the company's premises. The view which the county court judge took of the circumstances seems to me to be correct, and I think those circumstances show that the man was acting in the course of his employment, and that the accident arose out of his employment. I do not think that I am bound to say that he was not acting in the course of his employment until his work had actually begun. The case of Brydon v. Stewart seems to be in point. In my opinion this case is like that of a man who is employed in a particular part of a factory, and has to go through the rest of the factory to get to his work. If, while so going to his work, he sustained accidental injuries, he would have sustained those injuries in the course of his employment. It is said that that case is different from this, because the factory would all belong to the same employer. But I think that this case is analogous, for the contractors had some power over the line which had to be crossed. I do not think that this case is like that of a workman who meets with an accident while going along a public highway to his work. In my opinion, therefore, the appeal ought to be dismissed.

CHAMBERS v. WHITEHAVEN HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS. (a.)

Master and servant—Employer's liability—Accident to workman—Employment "on or in or about engineering work"—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7.

A workman was employed on a steam dredger in a harbour, part of his duty being to take a barge filled with mud which had been dredged up, a mile and a-half out to sea and to deposit the mud there. The workman, while depositing the mud a mile and a-half out at sea, was injured.

Held, that (assuming that the work carried on in the steam dredger constituted "engineering work" within section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897) the workman was not injured "on or in or about" the main locality of the engineering work, and was not, therefore, entitled to compensation.

The words "engineering work" in section 7 indicate locality.

Appeal from an award of the judge of the Whitehaven County Court under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The appellant, Ann Chambers, was the widow of a workman who was killed while in the employment of the respondents, the Whitehaven Harbour Commissioners.

The respondents owned a steam dredger, which was used for dredging their harbour, and some hoppers, into which the spoil which was dredged up was emptied, and the hoppers when filled were towed about a mile and a-half out to sea, and the spoil emptied out. Two of the labourers who were employed on the dredger went out in turn with the hoppers to sea. Upon the day in question the deceased went with another man out in a hopper, and when the hopper got a mile and a-half out, the deceased knocked out the bolts which fastened the doors at the bottom of the hopper, and so opened the doors and let out the spoil. Just as he did so a sea struck the hopper, and the deceased fell into the well and was carried with the spoil into the sea and was drowned.

The county court judge held that the deceased man was at the time of the accident employed as a seaman, and that therefore the Act did not apply. He was also of opinion that the deceased was not employed at the time of the accident "on or in or about an engineering work" within the meaning of section 7, sub-section 1, of the Act. He accordingly held that the appellant could not recover compensation.

By section 7, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, "the Act shall apply only to employment . . . on or in or about a railway, factory, mine, quarry, or engineering work. . . ." By sub-section 2 "'engineering work' means any work of construction or alteration or repair of a railroad, harbour, dock, canal, or sewer, and includes any other work for the construction, alteration, or repair of which machinery driven by steam, water, or other mechanical power is used."

Shepherd Little, for the appellant.—The dredger was worked by steam, and was employed in the repair of the harbour. The work, therefore, which was being carried on was "engineering work" within the definition of those words in section 7, sub-section 2, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The deceased man was employed on the dredger, and it was his duty, when his turn came, to take the hopper out to sea and deposit the mud there. The whole operation constituted one job, as it was necessary to carry the mud out to sea. The deceased man was, therefore, at the time of his death employed "on or in or about an engineering work" within section 7, sub-section 1, of the Act. In that sub-section the words "railway, factory, mine, quarry," indicate locality. But "engineering work" does not, the word "work" indicating the operations carried on.

Rueyg, Q.C., and A. Powell, for the respondent.—Assuming for the purposes of the argument that this was an engineering work, the deceased man was not employed at the time of his death on or in or about engineering work. "Engineering work" signifies locality. The expression follows words in section 7, sub-section 1, which are clearly words of locality, and the definition of engineering work in sub-section 2 implies locality. The words "on or in or about" signify locality, that is, the place where the engineering work is being carried on. The engineering work was here being carried on in the steam dredger, and the deceased man could not he said to have been killed on or in or about the locality of that work.

Shepherd Little replied.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—In my opinion the decision of the county court judge must be affirmed, but not upon the first ground stated by the county court judge. The deceased man was employed to a certain extent upon a steam dredger used for dredging the harbour. When the mud was dredged up from the bottom of the harbour it was emptied into a hopper, and it was the duty of two of the men employed on the steam dredger to take the hopper out to sea to a distance of about a mile and a-half from the harbour, and to deposit the mud there. The deceased man having assisted in taking one of the hoppers out to sea was killed while emptying the mud out of the hopper. The question we have to determine is whether the deceased man was at the time of the accident employed "on or in or about engineering work" within the meaning of section 1 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. Sub-section 1 of that section provides that "this Act shall apply only to employment . . . on or in or about a railway, factory, mine, quarry." Stopping there, these words obviously indicate locality. Then follow the words "or engineering work." The material words are therefore "on or in or about engineering work." For some time I doubted whether those words indicated locality, but I have come to the conclusion that they do, because, as my brother Vaughan Williams has pointed out, when the definition of engineering work in sub-section 2 is looked at, it seems to me that the words there used all indicate locality. Therefore, in order to bring the case within the Act the workman must have been employed at the time of the accident on or in or about the main locality of the engineering work. There have been two cases dealing with the words "on or in or about." In Powell v. Brown, ante, p. 145, [1899] 1 Q. B. 157, a workman in the employment of the owners of a factory was engaged in loading timber on to a cart standing in the street just outside the factory gate, and he was killed while doing so. The county court judge held that he was "about" the factory, and we upheld his decision, saying that the word "about" was an enlarging word, and was intended to cover more than the words "on or in," and I said that "about" meant in close propinquity to the factory. Then came the case of Lowth v. Ibbotson, ante, p. 506, where a carter in the employment of a miller, the mill being a factory, was delivering sacks of flour about one and a-half miles away from the mill when he met with an accident. The county court judge held that the carter was not employed "about" the factory when he was injured, and we affirmed his decision. The question, therefore, in the present case is whether the deceased man was at the time of the accident "on or in or about" the locality named—that is, the engineering work carried on in the dredger. I do not think it can be said that the deceased man was killed on or in or about the engineering work. If, for instance, supposing such a thing possible, the mud had been taken away from the dredger in carts, instead of in hoppers, and the accident had happened when the cart was being emptied at a place a mile and a-half away from the dredger, to my mind the Act would clearly not have applied. I decide in this case nothing more than that the deceased man was not killed while employed on or in or about what has been assumed to be engineering work.

CASTNER-KELLNER ALKALI CO. (LIMITED) v. COMMERCIAL DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION (LIMITED). (a.)

Patent—Particulars of objections—Shorthand writer's transcript of evidence—Costs—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 29, sub-section 6.

In patent actions the settled practice is that certificate under section 29, sub-section 6, of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, are always granted so as to secure to the party delivering the particulars the costs of everything reasonably and properly inserted in them, although he may fail to prove the specific objection under which the detailed particulars may be ranged.

In the above patent action, tried by Bigham, J., defences of anticipation, disconformity, and want of subject-matter were raised, with numerous particulars of objections. At the trial all the issues were found in favour of the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed, and the Court of Appeal allowed the appeal (Vaughan Williams, L.J., dissenting).

The defendants then applied for the costs of three copies of the transcript of the shorthand notes of the proceedings at the trial.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 22.—The written judgment of the court was delivered by

LINDLEY, M.R.—The appeal in this case having been allowed with costs we have to consider whether the costs of the shorthand writer's transcript of the evidence should be allowed, and what certificate we ought to give under section 29, sub-section 6, of the Patents Act, 1883, relating to particulars of objections. As regards the shorthand transcript of the evidence, it was taken and referred to day by day in the court below, and three copies of it were really necessary to enable this court to follow the argument. The costs incurred by the appellants in obtaining not only those copies but also such other copies as were reasonably required for the purposes of their appeal ought therefore to be allowed them.

As regards the particulars of objections, the defendants raised eight objections to the plaintiffs' patent, and the second, which was want of novelty, was followed by a list of patents said to be anticipations. They were not anticipations, and the second objection was not proved. But a knowledge of the patents enumerated in the list, with one exception (Petres') was really necessary to enable the court to understand the subject-matter to which the patent related and the state of knowledge which persons conversant with that subject had at the date of the patent. We felt a difficulty, however, in adopting the ordinary form of order owing to the objection for want of novelty. The particulars to which the Act refers are not confined to the objections, but include whatever is stated will be relied upon by the party delivering them. The specifications enumerated under the second objection are particulars within the meaning of the section quite as much as the objection itself; and as they (with the exception of Petre's) were all reasonably and properly mentioned in the defendant's particulars of objections we cannot properly decline to certify in the usual form that the costs of the defendants' particulars ought to be allowed except as regards Petre's specification mentioned in No. 2. We do not think it necessary to except Nos. 3 and 4, considering the difficulty of distinguishing the costs, if any, occasioned by them from the costs occasioned by the other particulars, which were all reasonable and proper. Having regard to the language of section 29, and to our own limited experience in granting certificates under it, we have thought it right to consult our colleagues and one of the most experienced taxing-masters as to the practice in these cases. We are informed that certificates under section 29 are always granted so as to secure to the party delivering the particulars the costs of everything reasonably and properly inserted in them, although he may fail to prove the specific objection under which the detailed particulars may be ranged. The practice has grown up owing to the difficulty of doing justice as regards costs in any other way.

We were also asked to stay execution unless the defendants' solicitor gave his personal undertaking to repay the costs in the event of our decision being reversed in the House of Lords. But ever since Attorney-General v. Emerson, 38 W. R. 102, 24 Q. B. D. 56, this court has said that it will not make any such order without some reason to justify it; and at present there is none in this case.

Summons.

By an indenture of assignment made on the 30th of October, 1897, the leasehold house and premises in Bournemouth, known as "Bournewood," were assigned to John Gjers for the residue of a term of eighty years from the 24th of June, 1891, subject to the payment of the rent reserved by and performance of the covenants contained in the lease, which was dated the 7th of December, 1891.

By an indenture of mortgage made the 1st of November, 1897, John Gjers mortgaged the premises to the trustees of his vendor to secure the sum of £3,000 advanced to him by them and interest thereon.

By his will dated the 8th of November, 1892, John Gjers gave all his real and personal estate to his son Lawrence Farrar Gjers, Charles Ellison Mills, and John Vernon Cooper, upon trust to pay to John Vernon Cooper ("in case he shall act as executor and trustee of my will") a certain legacy, and upon further trusts to pay certain other specific legacies, and subject thereto, he gave devised and bequeathed the whole of his real and personal estate to his son Lawrence Farrar Gjers. By a second codicil to his will dated the 9th of December, 1897, John Gjers bequeathed to his "wife" (Florence Longdon Gjers) "my leasehold house known as 'Bournewood' and all the contents of the same . . . for her life, or so long as she shall remain my widow, and from and immediately after her death or second marriage . . . I give and bequeath the same to my daughter Hilda absolutely."

On the 6th of October, 1898, John Gjers died, and on the 5th of January, 1899, his will was proved by John Vernon Cooper. On the 8th of February, 1899, an originating summons was taken out between John Vernon Cooper, the plaintiff, and Florence Longdon Gjers (widow) and Lawrence Farrar Gjers, defendants, to have it determined whether the widow of the testator, as tenant for life, was "liable during her life to pay and keep down the interest of the mortgage" on "Bournewood," and "to pay the rent reserved by and perform the covenants and conditions on the part of the lessee contained in" the original lease of the 7th of December, 1891, "or by whom . . . the same interest, rent, covenants, or conditions respectively ought to be paid and performed," and for necessary inquiries and directions.

The rent and interest had been duly paid and the covenants and conditions duly performed up to the time of the testator's death. The will contained no directions as to the question by whom these burdens should be borne.

R. J. Parker, for the executor and trustee.—The decision of North, J., in In re Betty, Betty v. The Attorney-General, [1899] 1 Ch. 821, conflicts with that in In re Tomlinson, Tomlinson v. Andrew, 46 W. R. 299, [1898] 1 Ch. 232, and in these circumstances the plaintiff comes to the court for direction.

George Lawrence, for the tenant for life.—The tenant for life of the leasehold is under no liability to keep up the lease, though there are cases in which he has been held liable, as from the death of the testator: Hawkins v. Hawkins, 28 W. R. 526, 13 Ch. D. 470; Eccles v. Mills, 46 W. R. 398, [1898] A. C. 360.

George Northcote, for the residuary legatee.—The tenant for life is liable: In re Redding, 45 W. R. 457, [1897] 1 Ch. 876; In re Betty, and Kingham v. Kingham, [1897] 1 Ir. Rep. 170, 45 W. R. Dig. 180. These cases all adopt a different view as to the decision in In re Courtier, 35 W. R. 85, 34 Ch. D. 136, to that expressed in In re Baring, 41 W. R. 87, [1893] 1 Ch. 61, and In re Tomlinson.

KEKEWICH, J.—The position of the question as regards the authorities is such that I do not think I ought to allow it to pass by merely saying that I will dispose of it in a certain way. The question arose before me in the case of In re Baring, Jeune v. Baring, where the point no doubt was raised quite plainly. The headnote states the case shortly, it was this: There was a tenant for life of leasehold property with no provision in the will for that tenant for life bearing the burdens attaching to such leasehold property, such as the payment of the rent, repairs, and insurance; there I was pressed by the able counsel for the plaintiffs, Sir Horace Davey and Mr. Ingle Joyce, with the maxim, which is quoted in the report, "Qui sentit commodum sentire debet et onus." It went entirely upon that; they did not think it necessary to quote any cases except In re Fowler, Fowler v. Odell, 29 W. R. 891, 16 Ch. D. 723, decided by Fry, J., and In re Courtier, Coles v. Courtier, which the Court of Appeal professed to distinguish from the former case. The case was argued on either side with reference to these cases, and Sir Horace Davey in reply, put his case entirely on the distinction between In re Fowler and In re Courtier, and never went into the general principle at all; he considered that was sufficiently dealt with by the maxim. The view which I took was that I was bound by In re Courtier, and I observe that the Vice-Chancellor of Ireland, in the case of Kingham v. Kingham, says that I followed the decision in In re Courtier with some reluctance. I thought myself bound by In re Courtier, which decided that a tenant for life was not bound to do anything at all, but that the burdens must be borne by the estate. Then the question came before Stirling, J., in In re Redding, Thompson v. Redding, and he thought that I had misinterpreted the decision in In re Courtier, and that all that the Court of Appeal in that case intended to decide was that the tenant for life was not bound to fulfil the covenants so far as they were broken at the testator's death. The property in the case of In re Courtier was not in a good and proper state of repair; there were things which ought to have been done to make the lease a good one, and that was the point which the Court of Appeal decided. Stirling, J., thought that the decision of the Court of Appeal was confined to that, and did not understand it as absolving the tenant for life from liability from the date of the testator's death onwards. Of course, the judgment of Stirling, J., deserved respect of the profession and of myself, and it received the respect of myself in the case of In re Tomlinson, Tomlinson v. Andrew. In that case I read In re Courtier again with all the care that I could give to it in view of the decision of Stirling, J.; and although I saw that perhaps the lords justices had not, in In re Courtier, said quite as much as I thought, I was unable to see that the Court of Appeal had not decided it upon the ground upon which I thought they had decided. There it remains. The case of In re Baring was not appealed. There was, therefore, a difference of opinion between Stirling, J., and myself. Then a similar question came before North, J., in the case of In re Betty, Betty v. The Attorney-General, and he gave an elaborate judgment after full argument. It was a considered judgment. He has gone into the cases before that of In re Courtier, my comments upon which he has considered; and he has gone into the law generally with reference to a tenancy for life of leaseholds. Thus he approaches the case of In re Courtier from a judicial aspect, and says that it cannot be intended to introduce new law, and that that is the view expressed by the judges who decided it. He says: "I can quite accept the decision in In re Courtier by limiting it to the state of things existing at the testator's death, without giving it the more extensive view which Kekewich, J., proposed to do." And then North, J., refers to the case of Eccles v. Mills, 46 W. R. 398, [1898] A. C. 360, and also to a case which, although not binding upon me, is yet entitled to respect and attention—namely, the case of Kingham v. Kingham, where the Vice-Chancellor of Ireland also thought that I had misconstrued In re Courtier, and says, "I am of opinion that a tenant for life whether legal or equitable is within the maxim, Qui sentit commodum sentire debet et onus." So we have these three judges arguing upon the same lines, the only difficulty being that I have taken a different view of In re Courtier from that which the other judges have taken. I am not prepared to say that the language of the Court of Appeal in In re Courtier does not bear the interpretation that I placed upon it. Of course I admit that it is capable of bearing another interpretation, not only because other judges have thought so, but because language very often bears two possible interpretations.

(a.) Reported by C. C. HENSLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The view I take is that I am not entitled as a judge to say that my view of the decision in In re Courtier is the right one. I find that Stirling, J., North, J., and the Vice-Chancellor of Ireland all think differently from myself, so I am bound to arrive at the conclusion that I must be wrong, and I will act upon that assumption. It might seem to some persons to be a strong line for me to take, if I adhered to my former decision, and allowed the Court of Appeal to put it right. To my mind sometimes weakness may be strength and strength may be mere obstinacy. I do not profess to say that I do not still think that the decision in In re Courtier is capable of two interpretations, but I give way. I think it is the right course to take. I must therefore decide that the tenant for life must bear these burdens, including insurances, as the lease contains a covenant to insure. That I understand to be the view of North, J., and the Vice-Chancellor of Ireland.

There will, therefore, be a declaration that the tenant for life of the leasehold is bound during his life or widowhood to keep down the interest on the mortgage and pay the rent and perform the covenants in the lease.

In re HOPE'S SETTLED ESTATES.
DE CETTO v. HOPE. (a.)

Settled land—Tenant for life—Heirlooms—Sale of heirloom by tenant for life—Pecuniary position of the tenant for life—Discretion of judge—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 37, 53.

The discretionary power of the court in directing a sale of heirlooms under section 37, sub-section 3, of the Settled Land Act, 1882, is a power which will be exercised on a consideration of the circumstances of each particular case and of the interests of the persons entitled.

The fact that a tenant for life has, through his own extravagance, brought himself into pecuniary difficulties will not induce the court to relieve him by ordering a sale of heirlooms under the section above mentioned.

This was an application under the Settled Land Acts.

Lord H. Francis Hope Pelham-Clinton Hope applied for the sanction of the court under section 37 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, to a contract for sale into which he had entered, for the sale of diamond known as the Tavernier Blue or Hope Diamond, settled as an heirloom.

The facts of the case were as follows: The Tavernier Blue or Hope Diamond was a blue diamond weighing 44¼ carats, set in a brooch surrounded by twenty-two brilliants. It was said to have formerly been one of the crown jewels of Louis XIV. of France, but had only been for a comparatively short period in the possession of the applicant's family. It appeared from the evidence that this diamond is not at the present time unique in the sense of being the only known blue diamond in existence. It is, however, unique as being the first known, and until recently the only known, blue diamond. The diamond formed one of certain chattels settled with the family mansion-house and estate of Deep Dene, and other real estates, upon the applicant for life under the will of his grandmother Mrs. Hope. The limitations in the settlement were to the applicant for life with remainders in the event of his death without having issue to his three sisters in tail male, with an ultimate remainder in fee to his elder brother, the Duke of Newcastle. The income arising from the settled estates was estimated at £15,000 to £16,000 a year. The diamond had, since 1894, been deposited at Parr's Bank. The applicant, who was born in 1866, married in 1894, but had no issue. For several years past he had been in embarrassed financial circumstances and had ceased to be in a position to reside at the family mansion. In 1893 he applied to Chitty, J., for an order authorizing the sale of the Hope collection of pictures which were settled with the diamonds. The application was opposed by the parties interested in remainder, and was refused, Chitty, J., being of opinion that no satisfactory reason for a sale had been shewn and that the applicant's difficulties were the result of his own extravagance.

In 1895 the applicant was adjudged bankrupt. In the following year, however, he entered into a deed of arrangement with his creditors and obtained his discharge. Under the provisions of this deed the life estate of the applicant was vested in trustees until a sum of £210,000 had been raised, and an income of £2,000 per annum was assigned to him.

In 1898 the parties interested in remainder withdrew their opposition to the sale of the pictures, an arrangement having been made, for the application of a part of the income arising from such sale upon the the maintenance and education of the eldest son of the first of the tenants in tail in remainder, and the pictures were accordingly sold under an order of Romer, J. The applicant stated in his affidavit that his position had not been benefited by the sale of the pictures. There was a considerable discrepancy in the evidence as to the value of the diamond. A jeweller who had valued it on behalf of the applicant put it at about £18,511, which was understood to be the price at or about which it had been contracted to be sold. The parties interested in remainder submitted evidence to the effect that it was of far greater value, and all strongly opposed the sale.

Farwell, Q.C., and Martelli, for the applicant.—The only questions to be considered, having regard to sections 37 and 53 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, is whether the sale of the diamond is for the interest of all parties. The mere fact that the parties interested oppose the sale ought not to be considered: Bruce v. Marquis of Ailesbury, 41 W. R. 318, [1892] A. C. 356; In re Hope's Settlement, 9 Times L. R. 506. The sale is one that a prudent person would make. The diamond is not an old family possession, but a mere curiosity. If the diamond is sold the applicant will be placed in a satisfactory pecuniary position, and all persons interested will be practically benefited. The applicant is willing, however, not to ask the court to approve of the present contract, but will be satisfied with an order for sale in the usual way under the Settled Land Act.

Mulligan, Q.C., and A. à B. Terrell, for the parties interested as tenants in tail in remainder.—The decision in Bruce v. Ailesbury turned partly on the fact that the court was dealing with landed property, and there the interests of the tenants on the estate had to be considered. Here no such question can arise. The applicant would never have made this application if he had not dissipated the greater part of his income; but this is no reason why the court should assist him: In re Beaumont's Settled Estates, 58 L. T. 916, 36 W. R. Dig. 177; Earl of Radnor's Trusts, 45 Ch. D. 402, 39 W. R. Dig. 202. The court will pay attention to the sentimental feelings of remaindermen. The sale, if carried out, will benefit only the tenant for life: Sutherland v. Sutherland, 42 W. R. 12, [1893] 3 Ch. 169.

Benn, for the Duke of Newcastle.

J. H. Young, for the mortgagees.

E. S. Ford, for the trustees of the will.

Farwell, Q.C., replied.

BYRNE, J.—Lord Francis Hope, who is the tenant for life of the estates settled under the will of Mrs. Hope, applies to the court to approve a provisional contract for the sale of the celebrated Hope diamond. The applicant has no issue, and the sale is opposed by his sisters, who are entitled in remainder in tail, and by the Duke of Newcastle, in whom is the ultimate interest. Lord Francis Hope, in his summons, asks the court to sanction the sale of the diamond. I could not under any circumstances sanction this contract because there is a difference between the experts as to the value, and I cannot say whether the sum proposed to be given represents the fair market price.

But I am asked to decide this matter as if it were an application to the court for the sale of the diamond in a proper way. As to the way in which such a case as this should be considered, there is an important passage in the judgment of Chitty, L.J. (then Chitty, J.), in the case of Earl of Radnor's Trusts, which is repeated with approbation by Lord Esher, M.R.: see 45 Ch. D., at p. 418. "I think, therefore," says the Master of the Rolls, "that the passage in the judgment of Chitty, J., in which he lays down the way in which the law is to be administered in a court of first instance, is correct." "I desire," he says, "to repeat here what I have said before, that the controlling power of the court is a discretionary power, and that it must be exercised with regard to all the circumstances of each particular case, anxious attention being given to the said circumstances, which vary greatly. For myself I say emphatically that this discretion ought not to be crystallized, as it would become in course of time, by one judge attempting to prescribe definite rules with a view to bind other judges in the exercise of the discretion which the Legislature has committed to them. This discretion, like all other judicial discretions, ought as far as practicable to have been left untrammelled and free, so as to be fairly exercised according to the exigencies of each particular case. I agree with every word of this, and say that this is the right rule." This does not mean that a judge in considering the grounds upon which he shall exercise his discretion, ought not to notice what other judges before him have done, or what matters they had regard to as circumstances to be taken into consideration in various cases. There has already been an application before Chitty, J., for the sale of certain pictures belonging to this estate, and on that occasion, the sale being opposed by the rest of the family, Chitty, J., refused to sanction a sale at the instance of Lord Francis Hope. Now I have here certain circumstances existing which were also circumstances existing then. One was that in that case the applicant had himself made the pictures homeless. This does not apply to the present case, because the jewel in question is probably exactly in such custody as it would be—namely, at the bank—if the tenant for life had not been extravagant and rendered it impossible for himself to live at the family mansion. Another argument brought forward both then and now was the financial position of the applicant. This is not a circumstance which affects the rest of the family and those who may succeed him, and this too is a circumstance (I do not wish to use any harsh term) which has been brought about by the applicant's extravagance, and I have said before and I now repeat that the fact of a tenant for life having got himself into difficulties is not a circumstance which ought to have weight in deciding in favour of a sale. Then the learned judge had in that case to consider, what I have also to consider here, the strong opposition of all the members of the applicant's family, and the learned judge proceeded to say that although this Act of Parliament did not give any special intimation to the court as to the grounds upon which it was to decline or allow a sale, yet he thought that the person who came to the court and asked the court's sanction, must make out his case for the sale. Now, what have I here? The applicant is not in a position of a tenant for life, who, if certain of the heirlooms were sold, would be able to take his natural position as the head of the family, and reside in the family mansion, taking up that position which probably the testatrix anticipated would be his; but I have the case of a tenant for life who is unable to occupy that position. It would be a reasonable and a fair and proper ground to take into consideration if substantial relief could be given, in the way of increased income, to a member of the family. That is a circumstance to be taken into consideration; but what I have here is the possession in the family of a jewel, which is acknowledged to be unique, as being the first known and until recently the only known blue diamond, and one which has taken its name from the family, and which is known to all the world as the Hope diamond. It is said to be no longer unique in the sense of being the only blue diamond in the world; but I cannot from the evidence before me say that the diamond does not still stand out as a jewel unique in its size, from the circumstances connected with it, and it bears the name of the family. I appreciate Mr. Farwell's contention to the full that the argument in favour of having regard to what may be called feelings of sentiment on the part of the family, does not apply in the same way or perhaps with the same strength to the case of the possession of a family jewel without any particular family history attached to it, as it does in the case of an old mansion-house or of pictures of ancestors which have been in the family a great number of years;, but it is nevertheless a possession to which people, I cannot say unreasonably, do attach very great value as making them the possessors of a unique article. An illustration of the feeling may be found in the possession of a Warwickshire vase. A person may not know the history of a particular vase, but the possession of such a unique work of art is one that may well be the object of pride in a family. I do not think that too much weight should be attached to this, but it is a circumstance for consideration. Then there is another matter to be considered in this case. Every member of the family who is in existence, except the applicant, is opposed to the sale of the diamond, and further, there is no evidence to show that Lord Francis would get what I may call any further usable income if the sale were effected. It might or might not be that such an arrangement could be made, but at present there is none such.

Giving the best attention that I can to the circumstances and arguments in the case, I do not think that a sale would be for the benefit of all the parties concerned, and therefore there is nothing for me to do but to refuse the application.

BROWN v. MAYOR, &c., OF DUNSTABLE. (a.)

Local government—Sewers—Sanitary authority—Unauthorized connection of sewage drains — Private nuisance—Liability of sanitary authority—Form of injunction—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 21.

A householder has, under section 21 of the Public Health Act, 1875, an absolute right to connect his drains with the public sewers, and the local authority cannot legally prevent him.

Where householders have connected their sewage drains with the public sewers which, without any legal right so to do, discharge upon the land of a private owner, and thereby cause a nuisance to him, the local authority will not be restrained, at the suit of the owner, from "permitting," although they will be from "directing or authorizing" future connections of the kind complained of, to be made.

Action.

This was an action by W. F. Brown, who was the owner of Dunstable Park, for an injunction to restrain the Corporation of Dunstable from continuing to discharge sewage upon the park.

Dunstable Park consisted of a farm and farm buildings which were in the occupation of a tenant for years, who was joined as co-plaintiff, and of certain messuages in the occupation of other tenants. It was situate partly within and partly without the borough.

W. F. Brown (who is referred to below as the plaintiff) derived the property from his father, who died in 1846, leaving it to his widow the mother of the plaintiff, for life, and then to the plaintiff in fee. Mrs. Brown, the tenant for life, died in 1875.

Dunstable was an ancient town. Two Roman roads —Watling-street and Icknield-way—crossed each other at this point. It was nothing more than an ordinary parish until 1863, when a local board of health was formed, and in 1864 for the first time it was incorporated as a municipal borough. There were along Watling-street, which is now High-street, sewers of great age. Through these sewers, surface water from the streets had, as far as living memory goes, flowed in three directions—part through the drain or pipe under what is known as Perkin's-house, in High-street, and thence into a pond in the park, the overflow of which went to a low-lying piece of land near the railway embankment. Another part crossed Icknield-way, now known as Church-street, and then entered land not belonging to the plaintiff, but this also ultimately found its way into the low land near the railway embankment. The third part went, until recently, in a comparatively short sewer in the High-street, towards the north, outside the boundary of the parish, to a field formerly belonging to the plaintiff, known as the Dog-kennel-close. It was proved that these ancient sewers had for many years conveyed not only surface water, but also slops and foul matter coming from house drains, the consequence of which was that the open ditches or receptacles in Dunstable Park and in Dog-kennel-close became from time to time offensive. It was proved that as far back as 1869 no less than 610 houses were connected with the sewers. With reference to sewage matter other than slops and house drainage, it was not shown that it found its way into the sewers to any considerable extent until after the year 1873, when for the first time a water company supplied the town with water, though probably there were a few water-closets prior to that date which were flushed by means of rain-water cisterns, and there may have been a few privies the contents of which found their way into one or other of the sewers. But, speaking generally, the ordinary mode of dealing with sewage of this nature was by cesspools which were periodically emptied. In 1887 part of the Dog-kennel-close was sold by the plaintiff, and the pond into which the overflow from the third sewer above mentioned used to pass, was filled up. Two dome-wells were constructed nearer the road in order to receive and retain the sewage and other matter which formerly went to the pond, and the plaintiff covenanted with the purchaser (in effect) to prevent any sewage matter from coming on to the land. In 1890 the plaintiff sold the rest of the Dog-kennel-close, including the two dome-wells. These soon proved a nuisance, and the corporation. with a view to remedy this nuisance, reversed the gradient of this third sewer so that the fall was towards the south instead of towards the north, and the contents of this sewer, which formerly discharged into Dog-kennel-close thenceforward passed by another way into the park. For thirty years complaints had been made of the inadequate drainage of the town, and letters had repeatedly been addressed by the Local Government Board to the corporation on this subject, but nothing had been done for more than a quarter of a century. The park had thus become the receptacle for the sewage of a large part of the town. There was a foul pond of several acres in extent in it, and the surface was so clogged with filth coming from the sewers that water would not pass away into the chalk. The value of the park was thus substantially lessened, but there was no evidence of any injurious effect upon health. Among the houses thus draining into the park were some belonging to the plaintiff. The defendants alleged a lost grant by the owners of the park to trustees for the inhabitants of the parish of Dunstable of the right to discharge both surface and sewage water from houses in the parish into the park. They also alleged that the plaintiff had acquiesced in and taken advantage of such grant and had used the existing system of sewage.

Eve, Q.C., and W. M. Cann, for the plaintiff.—No such prescriptive right as that set up could exist. You cannot prescribe for all persons present and future to discharge their sewage upon the land of the of the plaintiff: Gale on Easements, p. 3; Wood, V.C., in Attorney-General v. Richmond, 14 W. R. 686, L. R. 2 Eq. 306. Moreover, the only prescriptive user alleged is to send sewage into the sewers of the defendants, not upon the land of the plaintiff. The defendants must be treated in this matter as a private person (Attorney-General v. Acton Local Board, 31 W. R. 153, 22 Ch. D. 221), and if they exceed their easement they will be restrained: Metropolitan Board of Works v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 29 W. R. 693, 17 Ch. D. 246. The defendants may, under section 21 of the Public Health Act, 1875, stop up unauthorized connections with their sewers (Charles v. Finchley Local Board, 31 W. R. 717, 23 Ch. D. 767), and they should do so. At anyrate they should be restrained from permitting fresh connections: Attorney-General v. Richmond. If they cannot stop these existing connections they must alter their sewers and discharge them elsewhere: Attorney-General v. Acton Local Board.

A. T. Lawrence, Q.C., Hughes, Q.C., and Kenyon Parker, for defendants.—The plaintiff cannot require the local authority to provide another system of sewers, nor are they liable for what others do to their sewers, but only for their own acts: Glossop v. Heston and Isleworth Local Board, 28 W. R. 111, 12 Ch. D. 102; Attorney-General v. Clerkenwell Vestry, 40 W. R. 185, [1891] 3 Ch. 527. The only remedy open to the plaintiff is to apply to the Local Government Board under section 229 of the Public Health Act, 1875: Pasmore v. Oswaldtwistle Urban District Council, [1898] A. C. 387, 46 W. R. Dig. 106. Householders have an absolute right to connect their drains with the public sewers, and the local authority cannot prevent them, although it may prescribe the mode: Ainley v. Kirkheaton Local Board, 60 L. J. Ch. 734, 40 W. R. Dig. 133. The court will not restrain the local authority from allowing present connections to continue (Attorney-General v. Acton Local Board), nor from permitting fresh connections: Attorney-General v. Guardians of the Poor of Dorking, 30 W. R. 579, 20 Ch. D. 595. Charles v. Finchley Local Board was not a case of sewers at all, and therefore distinguishable. As to the prescriptive right, a lost grant would have been presumed if the corporation had been for the time being existing (Haigh v. West, [1893] 2 Q. B. 19, 41 W. R. Dig. 87); and such a grant for the benefit of the inhabitants of a parish is valid: Gatewards' case, 6 Co. Rep. 59*b*; Grimstead v. Marlowe, 4 T. R. 717.

Eve, Q.C., in reply.—Such a user as that alleged would be clam, and indefinite, and cannot create rights by prescription: see observations of Lord Herschell, Lemmon v. Webb, [1895] A. C. 1, at p. 6, 43 W. R. Dig. 125.

May 19.—COZENS-HARDY, J. (after stating the facts as above mentioned, and remarking that the Attorney-General was not a party, that no public nuisance was alleged, and that no mandamus was or could be asked for, proceeded:)—The defendants allege a lost grant, and that the plaintiff had taken advantage of such grant. This allegation, if well founded, would dispose of the whole action; but, in my judgment, it cannot be maintained. A lost grant is a valuable legal fiction devised to support long-continued possession and oft-repeated acts which otherwise could not be legally justified. Thus prior to the Prescription Act it was the custom to direct juries to find a lost grant after more than twenty years' enjoyment of an easement, and Haigh v. West is a modern example of the use of this fiction. But the evidence in the present case falls far short of what is requisite to raise the presumption of a lost grant. Such a grant must have been made before 1846, and the state of things existing at that date was essentially different from the present state of things. It would be highly dangerous to allow the trivial and occasional passage along a natural channel, of water more or less contaminated, to ripen into a legal claim to pour sewage of all kinds and of indefinite amount along such natural channel. I therefore hold that the defendants' claim of right fails, and I must grant an injunction to restrain them from exercising that alleged right.

This, however, by no means disposes of the action, and it remains to consider what, if any, further relief the plaintiff is entitled to. In the first place, there are a large number of houses in respect of which prescriptive rights to pass sewage into and along the sewers have been gained; and it is plain that no injunction can be granted which will interfere with such rights. For this reason, amongst others, it is impossible for me to make any order which will involve the complete closing or abandonment of the sewers. In the second place, there are other houses, the connections of which with the sewers have been made with the consent or by the acquiescence of the defendants, and it is settled law that I cannot interfere with them: Attorney-General v. Clerkenwell Vestry. In the third place, there are a few houses which have been connected with the sewers, in spite of the protest of the defendants, and the plaintiff contends that the defendants ought to stop up these connections. But I think the defendants must be taken to have acquiesced in that to which they at first objected, so that these houses really fall under the second head. If, however, I am wrong in this, they must be treated as falling under the fourth head. In the fourth place, the plaintiff contends that an injunction ought to be granted to restrain the defendants from allowing any future connections to be made. The defendants are willing, if they fail, as I hold they have failed, in their major claim of right, to undertake not to authorize or direct any such connection, but beyond this they will not go. The strength of the plaintiff's case lies in this, that the defendants can, without being guilty of any trespass, stop up any future connection with their sewers, and it is urged that this is the true test, and that which has been applied by the court in similar cases. On the other hand, it is urged that under section 21 of the Public Health Act, 1875, a householder adjoining the sewer has a right to connect his house with the sewer, and could obtain an injunction if the defendants absolutely refused on any terms to allow him to connect his house with the sewer. It is necessary to consider some of the authorities cited by counsel on this point. In the case of Attorney-General v. Guardians of the Poor of Dorking it was held in 1882 by the Court of Appeal that where a sanitary authority had not themselves constructed the sewers which were a nuisance, but only permitted them to be used as formerly by the inhabitants, they could not be restrained by injunction. But Sir George Jessel, at p. 606, laid stress upon the fact that the defendants could not physically put an end to the nuisance, and could only proceed by means of actions for injunction against persons who, with or without legal justification, were pouring sewage matter into the defendants' sewers. Section 21 of the Public Health Act, 1875, was cited, but Sir George Jessel does not seem to have considered that section to be material. In the same year, 1882, in the case of Attorney-General v. Acton Local Board, Fry, J., refused to grant a mandatory injunction, which would compel the stopping up of existing drains, but he granted an injunction as to the future, restraining the defendants from directing or authorizing sewage to flow into the sewers in question, but he deliberately declined to insert in the injunction the word "permitting." In the following year, 1883, the case of Charles v. Finchley Local Board came before Pearson, J., who granted an injunction restraining the local board from allowing sewage to flow into a brook opposite the plaintiff's house, on the ground that they could at any time physically put an end to the nuisance without any action at all. This decision was primarily based upon the fact that the defendants had given permission to the third person to lay down a pipe from his house to the brook to pass pure water only, and that as he, in breach of their permission, was sending sewage through the pipe, they could, and ought to, revoke the permission. This may be a sufficient ground for the decision, but the learned judge, at p. 775, expressly held that the local board had a right under section 21 of the Public Health Act, 1875, to abate the nuisance without asking any leave, and without bringing any action. Now, section 21 is as follows: "The owner or occupier of any premises within the district of a local authority shall be entitled to cause his drains to empty into the sewers of that authority on condition of his giving such notice as may be required by that authority of his intention so to do, and of complying with the regulations of that authority in respect of the mode in which the communications between such drains and sewers are to be made and subject to the control of any person who may be appointed by that authority to superintend the making of such communication. Any person causing a drain to empty into a sewer of a local authority without complying with the provisions of this section shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding £20, and the local authority may close any communication between a drain and sewer made in contravention of this section, and may recover in a summary manner from the person so offending any expenses incurred by them under this section." I am not satisfied that in the Finchley case there was any sewer to which section 21 would be applicable, but this does not diminish the weight to be attached to the deliberate opinion of Pearson, J. He certainly held that the board could prevent an adjoining owner from connecting with the sewer. In 1891, in the case of Ainley v. Kirkheaton Local Board, Stirling, J., held that under section 21 a right is given to the owner or occupier to drain into an existing sewer, without reference to the question of whether sewage matter, if it once enters the sewer, occasions a nuisance to a third party. This absolute right is no doubt subject to any regulations in respect of the mode of making connections and subject to the control of any person appointed to superintend the making of the connections, but no regulations can justify an absolute refusal to allow a connection to be made on any terms. No regulations under section 21 have been made by the defendants. But certain bye-laws were made by their predecessors, the local board of health, in 1864. The 20th bye-law is the only relevant bye-law, and I assume that it is in force. It prescribes no notice, and it only directs that the drains of all houses shall be connected with the sewers in such manner as the local surveyor shall direct. It is obvious that under this bye-law the surveyor can only prescribe the manner of connection—he cannot refuse to allow any connection. Upon consideration I adopt the view of Stirling, J., in preference to the view of Pearson, J., and I must follow the precedent of Fry, J., and decline to grant an injunction which would prohibit the defendants from permitting or allowing fresh connections to be made, or, in other words, would oblige the defendants to stop up all future connections. A sanitary authority, in whom sewers are vested, has only a limited property in these sewers. It is not in the same position as an owner of a private sewer, who can absolutely prevent anyone from touching his property. It seems to me that the plaintiff has mistaken his remedy. He ought to have applied to the Local Government Board to make an order under section 299, which might ultimately be enforced by writ of mandamus.

There are two minor points which I have not overlooked. It is said that the defendants ought to be restrained from allowing the sewage from the town-hall to pass into the sewer. But the defendants are sued as the urban sanitary authority only, and not as owners of the town-hall. I am not satisfied that the town-hall has not a prescriptive right; but however that may be, I am not prepared to give the plaintiff a relief which is not sought by the pleadings. Again, it is said that the reversal of the gradient of the sewer in High-street for the purpose of bringing the Dog-kennel sewage into Dunstable Park increased the burden on the plaintiff's property, and was an illegal act on the part of the defendants. But I think it was really done in order to satisfy the complaints of the plaintiff and to relieve him from the legal liability which rested upon him by reason of his covenant. The houses draining into this short reversed sewer are those which drained into the unreversed sewer and are few in number, and I cannot interfere with their de facto enjoyment of the sewer. To grant an injunction in respect of these two matters might occasion serious damage to health without conferring any benefit upon the plaintiff, and this is a consideration to which weight ought to be attached. The result is that I must grant an injunction restraining the defendants, as the urban sanitary authority of the borough of Dunstable, from directing or authorizing any sewage or foul matter to flow or to be discharged from sewers or drains vested in them as such sanitary authority, on to Dunstable Park.

Water company—House occupied by tenant—Water rate paid by owner—Pipe out of repair—Liability of owner—Waterworks Clauses Act, 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 93), s. 17.

In the case of a house of the annual value of less than £10, the owner is liable to pay the water rate instead of the occupier. Such an owner comes within the meaning of the words "any person supplied with water" in section 17 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1863, and in a local Act, and was rightly convicted under the local Act, which made it an offence for any person supplied with water to wilfully or negligently do or suffer any act whereby the water supplied was wasted.

Case stated by the stipendiary magistrate for the district of the Staffordshire Potteries.

An information was laid against the appellant by the respondent, the engineer of the Staffordshire Potteries Waterworks Co., charging that the appellant being supplied with water by the company did unlawfully and negligently suffer a certain pipe to be out of repair so that the water supplied to her was wasted. The information was laid under section 51 of the Staffordshire Potteries Waterworks Act, 1853, which is to the same effect as section 17 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1863, and which provides that, "If any person supplied with water shall wilfully or negligently do or suffer any act so that the water supplied to him by the company shall be wasted, or the supply thereof improperly increased, he shall forfeit for every such offence a sum not exceeding £5."

The appellant was the owner of a house let to a tenant at a weekly rent amounting to less than £10 a year, including the use of the water. The company supplied the house with water, and the appellant, as owner, paid the rate in accordance with the provisions of section 72 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, which enacts that in the case of houses not exceeding £10 in annual value the owner and not the occupier shall be liable to pay the water rate. The appellant's name appeared in the company's books as the person liable to pay the rate.

One of the pipes in the house got out of repair, causing a considerable waste of water. The tenant called the appellant's notice to the leakage, but the appellant did nothing to repair the pipe.

The magistrate held that the appellant had been properly charged, and that the offence had been proved, and he fined the appellant £5.

Montague Lush, for the appellant.—The conviction was wrong. The occupier, who used the water, and not the appellant, was the person "supplied with water" within the section in question. The mere fact that the appellant is liable to pay the rate, the house being under £10 in annual value, cannot have the effect of bringing the appellant within the words "any person supplied with water." Under the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847 the mere letting of pipes get out of repair was an offence. Under the Act of 1863 and this local Act the waste must be due to some wilful or negligent act of the person supplied. This points to the occupier and not to the owner. Further, in section 7 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, a distinction is drawn between the person supplied and the person liable to pay the rate, which shows that the latter is not included in the former.

Macmorran, Q.C., and Shearman, for the respondent, were not called upon to argue.

DARLING, J.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed. I think that the magistrate was perfectly right in holding that the appellant came within the definition of "any person supplied with water." I do not say that the appellant was the only person supplied, but she certainly was a person supplied with water.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree. I think that the appellant was a person supplied with water.

Appeal dismissed.

THE OWNER OF 238, OLD FORD-ROAD v. FOOT. (a.)

Metropolis — Sewer — Drain — Liability to repair —

Drainage by combined operation—Deviation from plan sanctioned—Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), s. 250.

A plan for draining a group of houses by a combined operation was sanctioned by the vestry. The course of one of the pipes indicated in the plan, which drained more than one of the houses, was in the laying of it altered so as to run within a few feet of the course indicated in the plan.

Held, that the pipe was a drain and not a sewer within the meaning of section 250 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, the number of houses draining into it not being added to or interfered with by the deviation from the plan sanctioned.

Case stated by a Metropolitan police magistrate.

The appellant was summoned as owner of No. 238, Old Ford-road to abate a nuisance which existed thereon.

The existence of a nuisance was admitted, and it was also admitted that it proceeded from pipes conveying drainage under No. 238. The register containing applications to the vestry by persons desirous of draining houses by a combined operation was produced, from the proper custody of the vestry, and it contained a plan relating to the house in question and to other houses adjoining belonging to the same owner, and showing the proposed scheme of combined operation. The plan was dated the 27th of June, 1879, and was signed by the surveyor. The register contained no formal order of the vestry upon the subject, and it was proved that it had been and still is the practice of the vestry to treat a plan so signed as being approved by the vestry and as giving authority for the proposed scheme to be carried out without any formal order.

If the pipes forming the combined operation had been laid as shown upon the plan, they would, after collecting the drainage from the various houses, have passed, by making a slight bend, underneath No. 236, Old Ford-road, the house immediately adjoining No. 238; but, upon an examination being made to discover the source of the nuisance, it was found that the pipes were continued in a straight line and passed underneath No. 238, and so through into the main sewer, giving a better flow by doing away with the bend and entering the main sewer at a somewhat lower level, thus giving a better fall. There was no record in the register of the vestry of any such deviation being sanctioned, and it was not shown that there was any other deviation from the plan, nor was it shown that any houses other than those on the plan were drained by the combined operation.

It was contended on behalf of the respondent that the pipes as laid formed a drain for draining a group or block of houses by a combined operation under the order of the vestry, and that therefore it was a drain within section 250 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, and as such was repairable by the owner of the premises. It was contended on behalf of the appellant, the defendant, (1) that there was no "order of the vestry" within section 250; (2) that if it could be said that the dealing with the plan as above was "an order of the vestry," the system as now existing was not that authorized by the vestry, and, that, even if any part of it had been laid as authorized by the vestry, that which passed under No. 238 was not authorized, and so constituted a "sewer" within section 250.

The magistrate was of opinion (1) that the order of the vestry mentioned in section 250 need not be in any special form, but that it was quite sufficient if it appeared clear that the vestry intended to approve and had approved any plan of proposed drainage by a combined operation; (2) that the plan had been duly approved by the vestry, and amounted to an order within section 250; (3) that the alteration in the course of the drain mentioned in no way altered its character, and that it did not by reason of such alteration cease to be a system of drainage by combined operation under the order of the vestry. He therefore ordered the defendant to abate the nuisance.

Section 250 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, provides as follows: "The word 'drain' shall mean and include any drain of and used for the drainage of one building only, . . . and shall also include any drain for draining any group or block of houses by a combined operation under the order of any vestry or district board, and the word 'sewer' shall mean and include sewers and drains of every description, except drains to which the word drain, interpreted as aforesaid, applies."

Packard, for the appellant.—The effect of section 250 is that every pipe which carries off the drainage of more than one house is de facto a sewer unless it is part of a combined system of drainage authorized under section 74, which is to be read with section 73: see Vestry of St. Matthew, Bethnal Green v. The School Board for London, 46 W. R. 353, [1898] A. C. 190. Unless this pipe, therefore, can be shown to be part of a combined operation made under the order of the vestry, it is a sewer, and as such it vested in the vestry by virtue of section 68, and is repairable by them by virtue of section 69. Even a wrongful and unauthorized connection of drainage to a pipe already draining one house is sufficient to convert such pipe into a sewer: Kershaw v. Taylor, 44 W. R. 28, [1895] 2 Q. B. 471; Geen v. Vestry of St. Mary, Newington, 46 W. R. 624, [1898] 2 Q. B. 1; Florence v. Paddington Vestry, 12 Times L. R. 30. In the present case it cannot be shown that the pipe was constructed under the order of the vestry. There was, in point of fact, no order, and even if there was, the act of deviating from the plan sanctioned by the vestry converted the pipe into a sewer.

Avory, on behalf of the respondent.—The cases cited by the appellant show two things—(1) that in order that a pipe draining more than one building should come within the definition of a drain there must be evidence of an order by the vestry under section 74; and (2) that a pipe ceases to be a drain and becomes a sewer if at any time the drainage of other buildings is made to flow into it. The decisions in Kershaw v. Taylor and the other cases cited are based upon the fact that other drainage was introduced into the pipe in question. Here there is evidence that an order was made by the vestry. Such order would be an order sanctioning a combined operation and not one authorizing a particular line of pipes. That this is so is shown by the words of section 74, which provides that the vestry may order that "such group or block of houses be drained and improved, as hereinbefore provided, by a combined operation." The order having been made, the owner is at liberty to lay the pipes where he pleases so long as the fall, &c., is such as has been approved by the vestry.

DARLING, J.—We are asked to decide whether the magistrate was right in holding that the pipe in question in this case was a drain repairable by the owner, and not a sewer repairable by the vestry. The question arises mainly under section 250 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, which provides that under the term "drains" are included other things besides ordinary drains—namely, drains used to drain a block or group of houses by a combined operation made under an order of the vestry—; and it is said by the respondent that this pipe is a drain used to drain a group of houses by a combined operation, and that it was made under an order of the vestry. It does drain a group of houses. The question is, Was it made under an order of the vestry? It is said that the operation of drainage was not carried out in accordance with the plan sanctioned by the vestry, but that there was a deviation from the plan, the effect of which was to turn the pipe in question into a sewer. The facts, however, show that precisely the same number of houses are drained by the pipe in its present position, as would have been drained by it had the plan been adhered to. The cases cited to show that such a deviation as took place here, altered the character of the pipe are not cases of a mere slight deviation, but are cases in which the effect of the deviation was to increase the number of houses drained by the pipe. If in this case other houses had by means of the deviation of the pipe been added to the number of those already draining into it, I do not say that our decision would not have been different. But here that was not the case. The deviation left the pipe practically the same as before, and in no way altered its character. So long as the scheme of drainage is practically the same as that sanctioned by the order of the vestry, the deviation of one of the pipes for a foot or two does not matter. This pipe, therefore, which was originally a drain, remains so still, notwithstanding the alteration.

CHANNELL, J.—There is taken out of the definition of sewer not only ordinary drains but also pipes used to drain houses under a combined operation sanctioned by the vestry or district board. When the order for the construction of this system of drainage was obtained from the vestry the pipe in question became a drain of the house under which it ran, and the owner of that house had control over it, and had power to alter its course, just as each of the owners of the other houses, had they been separately owned, would have had the power to alter the course of the drains situated under his house. There is just as much power to alter the course of a drain in the one owner of all the houses as there would have been in each of the eleven owners had they been separately owned.

In this case we do not know whether the alteration in the course of the drain was made at the time of its construction or afterwards; whichever was the case, the alteration would not turn the drain into a sewer. The cases cited to support the proposition that it would, were all cases in which by the alteration an addition was made to the number of houses drained by the pipe in question. They were, therefore, not in point, because in this case no addition was made to the number of houses drained.

Appeal dismissed.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Wright, J.) — May 2.

In re O'GORMAN.
Ex parte BALE. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Damages in the Divorce Court—Bankruptcy of co-respondent—Provable debt—Judgment summons—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 33—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s. 10.

Damages awarded to a petitioner in a divorce suit constitute a debt provable in the bankruptcy of the co-respondent, although no order directing the damages to be paid to the petitioner has been made at the date of the receiving order.

Judgment summons.

On the 27th of February, 1897, Bale obtained a decree of dissolution of marriage in the Divorce Court, and a verdict for £1,200 damages against the co-respondent O'Gorman.

The order of the court directed the damages to be paid into the registry within fourteen days. O'Gorman failed to comply with the order, and filed his own petition upon the 6th of October, 1897, when a receiving order was made against him. Upon the 15th of January, 1898, Bale obtained an order that the damages directed to be paid into court by O'Gorman should be paid to Bale personally. Bale took out a judgment summons to enforce payment of the order.

Carrington, for the judgment creditor.—An order of the Divorce Court can be enforced by judgment summons (Ex parte Fryer, In re Fryer, 34 W. R. 766, 17 Q. B. D. 718); but I admit that if this is a provable debt, the summons cannot succeed. I contend, however, that it is not a provable debt. Ex parte Muirhead, In re Muirhead, 24 W. R. 351, 2 Ch. D. 22, decides that it is not a debt on which a petition can be founded, and in the case of Ex parte Sacker, In re Sacker, 37 W. R. 204, 22 Q. B. D. 179, where Ex parte Muirhead was considered, Lord Esher seems to treat that case as authority for the proposition that a petitioner in a divorce suit is not in any sense a creditor. Further, there was no order for the payment of damages to Bale existing at the date of the receiving order, but only an order that they should be paid into court. The liability, if any, has arisen since the receiving order. It is like a verdict for damages for a tort which does not constitute a provable debt: In re Newman, Ex parte Brooke, 25 W. R. 261, 3 Ch. D. 494.

Cosmo Rose Innes, for the judgment debtor.—It was held in the case of Wood v. Wood, 16 W. R. 568, L. R. 1 P. & D. 467, that damages in divorce constituted a provable debt, and also in the case of Patterson v. Patterson, 19 W. R. 232, L. R. 2 P. & D. 189.

Carrington, in reply.—Wood v. Wood was decided under section 149 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, which defined a creditor as any person entitled to enforce payment by process of contempt. In Patterson v. Patterson a special order was made to enable the petitioner to prove. Arrears of maintenance payable under an order of the Divorce Court are not provable: Kerr v. Kerr, 46 W. R. 46, [1897] 2 Q. B. 439.

WRIGHT, J.—This is a question of great difficulty, and one on which eminent bankruptcy judges have declined to express any opinion. It seems to me that when a petitioner claims damages in a divorce suit and obtains them by decree he does acquire a certain right against the co-respondent. I think, when he gets the judgment, he ought in some sense to be said to be a creditor of the co-respondent, although he is obliged to employ the money as directed by the court. I think this was the opinion held by Lord Penzance in Wood v. Wood.

But although he may be a creditor in some sense, it does not follow that he can be a petitioning creditor, or prove in the bankruptcy of the co-respondent. Ex parte Muirhead decides that he cannot be a petitioning creditor in respect of damages ordered to be paid to him, and when received to be paid by him into the registry to abide the further order of court, but in deciding that case Cockburn, C.J., confines it to the case of a petitioning creditor's debt. Mellish, L.J., says in his judgment: "I do not mean at all to express any dissent or any express opinion as to the effect of such an order for the purpose of enabling a proof to be made" (which is what I have to decide to-day). "As at present advised I should rather think that there being a sum presently payable, and an order for its payment, it would in some shape be provable in bankruptcy, and that the mere uncertainty as to who was ultimately to receive it and for whose benefit it was ultimately to be applied would not prevent its being a provable debt."

Then in the case of Ex parte Sacker it was held that a receiver appointed in an action in the Chancery Division may not be a petitioning creditor in respect of a sum ordered to be paid to him in that character, but that does not carry the matter any further in spite of the remarks of Lord Esher (22 Q. B. D., at p. 184). Fry, L.J., refuses to consider the question.

I cannot help thinking that the matter is left entirely open; Patterson v. Patterson does not really help me. I am left without any guide, and that being so I can only say that, subject to the order of the court appropriating damages, there is a liability provable as a debt in bankruptcy, and therefore this application should fail. Then I have to consider the point that there was no liability at the date of the receiving order, the order for personal payment to the petitioner having been made some months after receiving order. But if I am right in the view I have taken on the other point the conclusion on this point must be the same. It is true that there was no direction for payment to the petitioner, but there was a decree founded on the verdict of a jury giving damages to the petitioner, which was sufficient to constitute a provable debt.

Summons dismissed.

Ex parte HASLUCK v. THE BOARD OF TRADE. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Release of trustee—Revocation of release by Board of Trade—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 82 (3); r. 309.

By sub-section 3 of section 82 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the Board of Trade may revoke an order releasing a trustee in bankruptcy "on proof that it was obtained by fraud or by suppression or concealment of any material fact."

Held, that an order of release ought not to be revoked on the ground that it was obtained by "suppression or concealment of any material fact" unless there is such suppression or concealment as has in it some element of fraud.

Appeal by Mr. Hasluck, the trustee in the bankruptcy, against the revocation of his release by the Board of Trade.

Mr. Hasluck was appointed trustee in July, 1896; he collected the assets, paid two dividends of 4s. 6d. in the pound, and applied for his release upon the 19th of February, 1898.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Among the proofs which had been tendered was one by the collector of Inland Revenue which the trustee decided to reject.

On the list of proofs sent in to the Board of Trade after payment of the first dividend the trustee had marked this proof "standing over," and on the list sent in after payment of the final dividend he marked it "disallowed." He omitted, however, to give notice to the collector of rejection. He posted to the collector a notice of his application for release as required by section 309, but did not send one to the Board of Inland Revenue.

In March, 1898, the trustee received a letter from the collector, and on the 3rd and 13th of June he received letters from the Board of Inland Revenue on the subject of the proof, but being under the bonâ fide belief that he had rejected the proof, he paid no attention to them. His release was granted by the Board of Trade upon the 28th of June, 1898. After that date the Board of Inland Revenue complained to the Board of Trade that their proof had not been dealt with, and that they had had no notice of the trustee's application for his release. The Board of Trade, having taken ex parte evidence, revoked the release upon the 23rd of January, 1899, upon the ground that it had been obtained by "suppression or concealment of a material fact"; the concealment alleged being that, in the affidavit in support of his application for release, the trustee had sworn that he had posted notices of his intended application to all the creditors; whereas in fact he had (the Board of Trade alleged) sent no notice to the collector, or to the Board of Inland Revenue.

The trustee appealed.

Reed, Q.C., and Rolland, for the appellant.—By section 82 (3) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the release of the trustee may be revoked "on proof that it was obtained by fraud or by suppression or concealment of any material fact." In this case there was no regular "proof" of anything, for the Board of Trade only took ex parte evidence which the trustee had no opportunity of meeting. "Suppression or concealment" can only mean wilful suppression or concealment, which is not the case here. Moreover, notice of the trustee's intention to apply for his discharge was posted to the collector, although it is now alleged that he never received it.

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G., and Muir Mackenzie, for the Board of Trade.—The Board of Trade were right in revoking the discharge, for it was a grave error on the part of the trustee not to bring the letters he had received from the Inland Revenue to the notice of the Board of Trade.

Reed, Q.C., replied.

WRIGHT, J.—This is a case of some importance and involves the construction of sub-section 3 of section 82 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883: "An order of the board releasing the trustee . . . may be revoked on proof that it was obtained by fraud or by suppression or concealment of any material fact." I think those words ought to be construed "such suppression or concealment as has in it some element of fraud." If there is no true element of wrongfulness in the concealment, the discharge ought not to be revoked. I have to inquire here whether the conduct of the trustee was blameworthy. The letters he received from the Inland Revenue and did not answer, do tell against him. I think his explanation is satisfactory; he says, firstly, that he had disallowed the claim of the Inland Revenue, which is quite true; secondly, that he took no notice of the letters because he thought he had sent notice of rejection of the claim and had received no appeal against it. It is difficult to understand why no notice of rejection was sent to the Inland Revenue, but such seems to have been the case. I accept the trustee's story, and am of opinion that he had no intention of concealing anything.

Appeal allowed.

BULLI COAL MINING CO. v. OSBORNE AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Statute of Limitations (21 Jac. 1, c. 16)—Mine—Trespass—Fraudulent working of mine—Concealed fraud—Account.

Where a colliery company wilfully and secretly took coal from an adjoining property, and the fact was not brought to light for many years afterwards, and no laches could be attributed to the adjoining owner in not discovering the existence of the wrongful workings,

Held, that the Statute of Limitations had no application, and that the adjoining owner was entitled to recover from the wrongdoers the value of the coal so wrongfully taken, and, in the case of a winding up, then to prove for that amount.

This was an appeal by the Bulli Coal Mining Co. from the Supreme Court of New South Wales. The facts are given in their lordships' judgment.

Warrington, Q.C., and Sims Williams, for the appellants.

Asquith, Q.C., Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the respondents.

The judgment of their lordships (Lords MACNAGHTEN, MORRIS, and JAMES OF HEREFORD) was delivered by Lord JAMES OF HEREFORD.—In this case the appellants seek to reverse a judgment or order of the Supreme Court of New South Wales dated the 10th of September, 1897, dismissing an appeal against an order of the Honourable William Owen, Chief Judge in Equity, dated the 27th of July, 1896, and allowing a cross-appeal on the part of the respondents against the said order and varying it in certain particulars.

The proceedings in the courts below were commenced by a summons issued by the respondents in the winding up of the appellant company for liberty to prove for a sum of money claimed as the value of coal alleged to have been wrongfully taken by the appellants from land belonging to the respondents. Such claim was, by an order dated the 20th of December, 1895, directed to be tried before the Honourable William Owen, Chief Judge in Equity, and it was accordingly heard before him in April, May, and June, 1896. On the 27th of July, 1896, the learned judge delivered judgment in the case, and afterwards ordered that it be referred to the master in equity to inquire and certify what was the market value at the pit's mouth of all the coal worked and gotten by the appellant company from the land of the respondents, being a portion of their land known as Watt's Grant, and that the respondents should be allowed to rank as creditors of the appellant company for such aggregate amount as should be certified by the master in equity.

During the hearings in the courts below the principal defence made by the now appellants to the claim of the now respondents was based upon an alleged champertous agreement.

It was proved that the respondents had on the 25th of March, 1895, made an agreement with a certain company called the Bellambi Coal Co. whereby it was agreed that the respondents should employ the solicitor of the Bellambi Coal Co. to conduct proceedings for the purpose of recovering damages from the appellants, and that in consideration of the respondents paying to the Bellambi Coal Co. 92½ per cent. of the amount recovered, that company would indemnify the respondents from all costs and expenses incurred by the taking of the proceedings. It was also found that by an indenture of the 15th of May, 1893, the respondents had leased to the Bellambi Coal Co. the land and the coal under it, which had been entered upon and taken by the appellants, so that by their wrongful acts the Bellambi Co. had been deprived of coal which was believed by them and the respondents to be the subject of their lease.

The chief judge held that the agreement of the 25th of March, 1895, was champertous in its character, but that its existence did not preclude the respondents from enforcing their rights against the appellants.

The full court overruled the judgment of the chief judge so far as it determined the agreement to be champertous, but agreed with him in holding that if champertous it would not preclude the respondents from enforcing their rights against the appellants.

In his argument before the committee the leading counsel for the appellants intimated that he felt he could not rely upon this defence of champerty and virtually withdrew it. Their lordships are therefore relieved from delivering any judgment upon the subject beyond saying that they see no ground for differing from the judgment delivered on this head by the full court.

Among the other grounds of defence put forward in the courts below was the plea of the Statute of Limitations. This plea was dealt with fully by the chief judge after he had disposed of the question of champerty in a preliminary judgment. It was raised again before the full court but not much pressed there, and the full court simply adopted the judgment of the chief judge on this point. It formed, however, the principal subject of discussion at their lordships' bar, where it was presented by the learned counsel for the appellants in a most elaborate and ingenious argument.

The material facts bearing on the defence of the statute appear in the findings of the chief judge, which had the entire concurrence of the full court. They were arrived at after an exhaustive inquiry lasting for eighteen days, during which much oral and documentary evidence was given. The counsel for the appellants endeavoured to some extent to contest these findings, but their arguments not only failed to show that there was manifest error in the findings of facts by the court below, in which case alone would their lordships differ from them, but being called upon by arguments of counsel to consider the correctness of these findings, their lordships are of opinion that they are in every respect correct.

It appeared that on the 1st of February, 1854, the Crown granted to John Alexander Watt fifty-one acres of land near Bulli Illawarra. By several conveyances the said fifty-one acres of land, known as "Watt's Grant," became vested in Henry Osborne, whose personal representatives are the present respondents. Henry Osborne died in 1858. Early in 1873 the appellants, who were working coal in land adjoining to Watt's Grant, found that their workings were approaching the boundary between the two properties and so informed the then trustees of Henry Osborne's will, and entered into negotiations with them for the purpose of obtaining a lease of Watt's Grant. These negotiations fell through, but the appellants proceeding secretly with their workings entered upon Watt's claim, and between the years 1878 and 1880 removed the coal from under some fourteen acres of such land. The trespass was distinctly shown upon the appellants' own working plan. It was committed underground, and committed wilfully. Until the workings by the Bellambi Coal Co. under their lease of May, 1893, brought to light the fact that a trespass had been committed by the appellants, the respondents and their predecessors were ignorant of the appellants' wrongful working, and had no reason to suspect that any had occurred.

Upon these facts the courts below have come to the conclusion that no laches can be attributed to the respondents in not discovering the existence of the wrongful workings by the appellants, a conclusion with which their lordships entirely concur.

Accepting, however, for the purposes of argument the findings of the chief judge the learned counsel for the appellants contended that the Statute of Limitations was an answer to the respondents' claim. Their argument was to this effect: Granted, they said, that the trespass was intentional—as, indeed, most trespasses were—that circumstance of itself was no answer to the plea of the statute. To use the language of Alderson, B., in Hunter v. Gibbons, 5 W. R. 91, 1 H. & N. 459, at p. 465, there was "no distinction between trespasses underground and upon the surface." It constantly happened, as one of the learned judges observed in the case of the Imperial Gas Light and Coke Co. v. London Gas Light Co., 2 W. R. 527, 10 Exch. 39, at p. 42, that the owner of a coal mine takes coal from an adjoining mine and by fraud prevents its being found out for more than six years. "Yet that," adds the learned judge, "is no answer to the Statute of Limitations." Clearly it was no defence at law. Why, then, should it be a defence when the claim is put forward in a court of equity. The foundation of the claim must be the same wherever the injured party may seek redress. At law he sues for damages in an action of trespass. If he comes into a court of equity still it is in respect of the trespass that he claims compensation. There being, therefore, a concurrent jurisdiction at law and in equity in respect of the very same wrong and the very same cause of action, the statute is as binding in equity as it is at law, in accordance with the views expressed by the House of Lords in the well-known case of Knox v. Gye, L. R. 5 H. L. 656, at p. 674. If, indeed, the respondents had been able to make out a case of what Pallas, C.B., terms "active or aggressive concealment"—Barber v. Houston, 14 L. R. Ir. 273, 33 W. R. Dig. 125—that might have been a different matter. Possibly relief might then have been had in accordance with the principles to be deduced from the case of Gibbs v. Guild, 30 W. R. 591, 9 Q. B. D. 59, and similar cases. But nothing of the kind was suggested here. The appellants have taken the respondents' coal. Be it so. They have done nothing more. That is the beginning and the end of their offending. It cannot be said that they have done anything actively to prevent the respondents or their predecessors in title finding out what they did.

Such was the contention of the appellants' counsel, but their lordships are unable to accede to it. It seems to ignore the nature and character of the act of which the respondents complain and to disregard the principles on which courts of equity proceed in dealing with fraud.

It will not be out of place to cite a passage from the judgment of Lord Hatherley in Livingstone v. Rawyards Coal Co., 28 W. R. 357, 5 App. Cas. 25, at p. 34, before the House of Lords. The House was there dealing only with the measure of damage in a case of underground trespass. But in pointing out the distinction between a case of fraud and a case of inadvertence Lord Hatherley uses very plain language, and his remarks may be useful in clearing the ground. "There is no doubt," said his lordship, "that if a man furtively and in bad faith robs his neighbour of property, and because it is underground is probably not for some time detected, the court of equity in this country will struggle, or, I should rather say, will assert its authority to punish fraud by fixing the person with the value of the whole of the property which he has so furtively taken, and making him no allowance in respect of what he has so done as would have been justly made to him if the parties had been working by agreement, or if as in the present case they had been, the one working and the other permitting the working, through a mistake. The courts have already made a wide distinction between that which is done by the common error of both parties and that which is done by fraud."

In the present case the coal was taken furtively. No one can deny that it is a fraud to rob your neighbour furtively of his property or that a court of equity ought to give redress for such a wrong. "This court," as Lord Hardwicke, presiding in a court of equity, observed in Chesterfield v. Jansen, 2 Ves. sen. 125, "has an undoubted jurisdiction to relieve against every species of fraud." Where the remedy is given on the ground of fraud, Lord Westbury pointed out in Rolfe v. Gregory, 13 W. R. 355, 4 De G. J. & S. 576, at p. 579, that "it is governed by this important principle, that the right of the party defrauded is not affected by lapse of time, or generally speaking by anything done or omitted to be done, so long as he remains without any fault of his own in ignorance of the fraud which has been committed."

The Statute of Limitations has really no application to a case such as this. Courts of equity are not within the words of the statute, which only apply to certain legal remedies, though they are, as it has been said, within its spirit and meaning. The way in which the statute came to be applied in proceedings of equity is explained by Lord Camden in his judgment in Smith v. Clay, 3 Bro. Ch. Cas. 639*n*, which was published from his lordship's own notes. A court of equity, he says, "which is never active in relief against conscience or public convenience," always refused its aid to stale demands. As, however, it had no legislative authority it could not define exactly the time of bar. It was governed by circumstances. But as often as Parliament prescribed a limit to proceedings at law the Court of Chancery adopted that rule and applied it to similar cases in equity. "For," he adds, "what the Legislature had fixed the time at law it would have been preposterous for equity, which by its own proper authority always maintained a limitation, to countenance laches beyond the period that law had been confined to by Parliament." Now, it has always been a principle of equity that no lapse of time is a bar to relief in the case of fraud in the absence of laches on the part of the person defrauded. There is therefore no room for the application of the statute in the case of concealed fraud so long as the party defrauded remains in ignorance without any fault of his own.

The contention on behalf of the appellants that the statute is a bar unless the wrongdoer is proved to ave taken active measures in order to prevent detection is opposed to common sense as well as to he principles of equity. Two men acting independently steal a neighbour's coal. One is so clumsy n his operations or so incautious that he has to do omething more in order to conceal his fraud. The ther chooses his opportunity so wisely and acts o warily that he can safely calculate on not being ound out for many a long day. Why is the one to o scot free at the end of a limited period rather than he other? It would be something of a mockery for ourts of equity to denounce fraud as "a secret thing" nd to profess to punish it sooner or later and then o hold out a reward for the cunning that makes etection difficult or remote.

There is very little direct authority on the particular oint which was urged with so much ingenuity at the ar. Indeed, the case of the Ecclesiastical Commisioners for England v. The North-Eastern Railway Co., 4 h.D. 845, 25 W. R. Dig. 158, before Malins, V.C., was ited as the only reported case in which the account was arried back beyond the period prescribed as a bar y the statute of Limitations. And their lordships re compelled to say that they are unable to rely on he decision in that case. It is very difficult to follow he reasoning of the learned Vice-Chancellor. His onour said distinctly "there was no improper intenon." He held that what was done "was done nder a mistake." Yet the defendants were visited ith all the pains and penalties of fraud. The ccount was carried back beyond the six years; the easure of damages was in accordance with the verest rule ever applied. The ground of the decision eems to have been that although there was no moral raud—no fraud in fact—yet "for the purposes of e statute the breaking of bounds into a neighbour's illiery must be considered a fraudulent act." There no foundation for that proposition. Underground espass may be committed in good faith without any inister intention or it may be committed under rcumstances which would render the wrongdoer able to a prosecution for felony. Every case must pend upon its own circumstances. There is nothing principle or in authority or in the exigencies of public licy to require that the same measure of justice injustice should be meted out to all transgressors ike, ignorant or wilful, innocent or fraudulent.

In all, or almost all, the other cases cited at the r the court held that fraud was not established. st Sir John Romilly in Dean v. Thwaite, 21 Beav. 2, and Fry, J., in Trotter v. Maclean, 28 W. R. 244, Ch. D. 574, expressed their opinion that fraud ould or might be an answer to the plea of the atute. In Dean v. Thwaite, where the learned aster of the Rolls held that the evidence of fraud as not conclusive, his honour made these observaons: "The case of fraud alleged, and the only aud that I think would justify the court in coming a conclusion that the coal gotten before that riod"—that is, before the period of limitation—ought to be accounted for, is that the defendant d intentionally taken the plaintiffs' coal and d concealed the fact, and during the process d taken steps to prevent the plaintiffs disvering it." If those observations are to be nstrued to mean that in his honour's opinion nothing more was required beyond taking the coal rtively, their lordships are unable to agree in them. t they think that is not the fair meaning of the nage cited, which must be understood as applied to e alleged facts of the case on which his honour was en commenting. In Trotter v. Maclean Fry, J., marks that the period of limitation imposed by the tute of James ought to apply to proceedings in the hancery Division in respect of a trespass unless there was some equitable ground for repelling the application of the statute. "Such an equitable ground," he adds, "has in many cases been found in fraud. When fraud or any other equitable circumstance exists undoubtedly the statute will not apply." It may be observed that in Trotter v. Maclean no fraud was suggested beyond the fraud that lies in the secrecy of wilful trespass underground, and that the plaintiffs failed to prove in that case that the trespass was wilful.

Their lordships are therefore of opinion that the Statute of Limitations cannot be set up as a bar in the present case, and they think that this conclusion is not opposed to any authority.

A comparatively minor question remains to be be noticed. By the order of 27th of July, 1896, the chief judge directed the master in equity to inquire and certify what was the market value of the coal which had been wrongly worked and gotten by the appellants under Watt's Grant, and then proceeded to order: "In making such inquiry the master is to take into consideration that the court has decided that there is not sufficient evidence to satisfy the court that the pillars were extracted or that the bords were worked otherwise than in the usual and proper mode of working."

By the order of the full court of the 10th of September, 1897, this direction was negatived, the court ordering "that the master in equity should determine the quantum and value of the coal extracted from the said land freed and unembarrassed by any direction in the said order (of the 27th of July, 1896) contained as to extraction of pillars or proper working of bords." But in the judgment delivered by the full court the following dictum occurs:

"It appears that his honour by his order directed the master in making the inquiry to take into consideration that his honour had decided that there was not sufficient evidence to satisfy his honour that the pillars were extracted or that the bords were worked otherwise than in the usual and proper mode of working. This objection is complained of and objected to on the part of Messrs. Osborne. It was pointed out that the usual mode of working would be to remove the pillars as soon as the bords were worked out, and that if they were not in fact removed it lay upon the Bulli Co. to satisfy the court as to the fact. We think that this must be so, and that once it has been proved that the coal has been worked from under the fifteen acres it should be presumed until the contrary be shown that the pillars were worked out and the roofs allowed to fall in."

Their lordships do not agree with the direction given by the chief judge or with the dictum of the full court on the subject. No presumption of any kind as to the pillars having been either left or worked, or the reverse, should be made. The master in equity in taking the account must be guided alone by the evidence before him. His task may be a difficult one — but still he must arrive at the quantum of coal taken as best he can. The evidence given by the litigants appearing before him must be his guide, and no presumptions such as have been referred to should affect his decision. Their lordships express no opinion as to the effect the master should give to any evidence—or the inferences he should draw from it—they only determine that presumption should not exist without being founded on evidence.

Their lordships will therefore humbly advise Her Majesty that the appeal be dismissed, and that the judgment of the court below be affirmed. The appellants will pay the costs.

COOTE v. FORD. (a.)

Practice — Payment into court—Denial of liability—Acceptance by plaintiff—Counterclaim—Admission—R. S. C., ord. 22, rr. 1, 6, 7.

The object of payment into court, where all liability is denied, is to enable a defendant to deny a plaintiff's right to sue, yet to offer a sum as the price of peace and for the prevention of further litigation. Such an offer is not an admission of the plaintiff's title, and cannot be converted into such by the plaintiff accepting the sum paid in.

Decision of Stirling, J. (ante, p. 489), affirmed.

Plaintiff's appeal from Stirling, J. (reported ante, p. 489).

The action was brought by the plaintiff against nine defendants for trespass in pursuit of game and rabbits on the manor of Martin. Damages and an injunction were claimed.

The defendants in their defence alleged that as copyholders of the manor they were entitled to kill and take rabbits both by themselves or their servants, and their tenants. Furthermore, the copyholders and their tenants had exercised and enjoyed the right and privilege from time immemorial.

By paragraph 7 of the defence it was pleaded that, "denying liability, each of the defendants brings into court the sum of 1s. and says that the same is sufficient to satisfy his liability to the plaintiff (if any) in respect of the matters complained of."

The 9s. paid into court was taken out by the plaintiff, who gave notice, dated the 22nd of February, 1889, that he accepted the sum paid in, in satisfaction "of the claim in respect of which it is paid in."

Two of the defendants, tenants of copyholders, by counterclaim asked for a declaration that they had the rights and privileges which they claimed, and for an injunction.

An application by the plaintiff was made in chambers to strike out the last-mentioned part of the counterclaim on the ground that "they raise again upon the counterclaim matters already disposed of upon the claim."

The application was refused, and the decision was affirmed by Stirling, J., on motion.

The plaintiff appealed.

Butcher, Q.C., and Terrell, for the appellant.

Duke, Q.C., and Kerly, for the respondents, were not called upon.

LINDLEY, M.R.—This is an application by the plaintiff to strike out a portion of the defendants' counterclaim, and it arises in this way. The plaintiff is the lord of the manor, and he brought an action with a double aspect against the defendants for taking rabbits. He has brought an action for trespass and damages, and he has claimed in the same action an injunction to restrain the defendants from taking game. The defendants have put in a defence, and they deny the plaintiff's right, and set up a custom entitling them to take rabbits; and in paragraph 7 of their defence they say this: "Denying liability, each of the defendants brings into court the sum of 1s., and says that the sum is sufficient to satisfy his liability to the plaintiff (if any) in respect of the matters complained of." Then they go on to state the counterclaim. They repeat by reference their allegation custom entitling them to take rabbits; they ask for a declaration that they are entitled to take rabbits, and for an injunction to restrain the plaintiff from interfering. That being the case, the plaintiff takes out the 9s. in satisfaction. He has given a proper notice in proper time, and the plaintiff accepts the 9s. paid into court in satisfaction of the claim in respect of which it is paid in. Now, the plaintiff having done that, seeks to stop this counterclaim and prevent the defendants from setting up the custom which they allege, because they must be treated as having estopped themselves by the admission they made by paying the money into court, and by the plaintiff taking it out in satisfaction, from saying that he has no right to take it out in satisfaction. That would appear to me to be the legal effect of what has been done.

Now, the money is paid into court under the existing rules of 1883. The question in controversy turns on the true effect of ord. 22, rr. 1 and 6. Ord. 22, r. 1, enables a defendant to pay money into court in one of two ways. It is confined to actions to recover debt or damages; it has nothing to do with ordinary injunctions. I do not say it has nothing to do with this action because this action is an action for damages as well as for an injunction. So far as it is an action for damages it is quite within a defendant's rights to pay the money into court. He pays it in in one of two ways under this rule. He can pay it in by way of satisfaction. If he does that, it shall be taken to admit the claim or cause of action in respect of which the payment is made. That is what he has not done. He has paid it in under the next part of the rule, which says instead of paying it in that way, he may with the defence denying liability pay money into court; not a word about it being, in that case, in satisfaction which shall be taken to admit the claim or cause of action. It does not mean that at all. It is obvious why; it is utterly inconsistent to say a man may deny liability and pay money into court, and admit it at the same time. Not if he does that—if a defendant with a defence denying liability pays moneys into court, then it is subject to rule 6. Rule 6 says: "When the liability of the defendant in respect of the claim or cause of action in satisfaction of which the payment into court has been made is denied in the defence, the following rules shall apply: (1) The plaintiff may accept in satisfaction of the claim or cause of action in respect of which the payment into court has been made, the sum so paid in, in which case he shall be entitled to have the money paid out to him as hereinafter provided" (that refers to rule 7) "notwithstanding the defendant's denial of liability, whereupon all further proceedings in respect of such claim or cause of action, except as to costs, shall be stayed." What does that mean? Does that mean that the plaintiff can by taking the money out of court treat a denial of liability as an admission of the liability? Can he force the defendant to admit that which he has strenuously denied? That appears to me to be nonsense. It means what it says. It says, if you like to take the money out in satisfaction, all proceedings in the action, so far as it relates to the matter in respect of which the money is paid in, are at an end. You are not to fight it out if you like to take it in satisfaction of all damages, and then the action is stopped. One sees the sense of that from the plaintiff's point of view and the defendant's point of view. The defendant says "I am not going to admit your right, but it is not worth fighting so far as the damages are concerned, and I shall pay 1s. into court and get rid of it so far." He cannot get rid of it so far as the injunction is concerned.

(a.) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Whether the plaintiff can in this action, as Stirling, J., thinks he can, go on with a view to an injunction may be possibly a question. I should think he could, because you cannot properly pay into court as a defence to an injunction. You can only treat a payment into court as in respect of that in which it can be properly paid in—the claim for damages.

Supposing the plaintiff cannot be wrong, which is not my view, and is not Stirling, J.'s, view so far as the injunction is concerned, what right has the plaintiff to ask us to strike out the counterclaim and prevent the defendant in his counterclaim setting up the custom on which he relies? It appears to me if the court were to accede to the plaintiff's contention it would enable the plaintiff to put the defendant in a position which the defendant carefully avoided being put in. That is to say, it is the plaintiff forcing upon the defendant an admission contrary to the protest of the defendant, who denies the whole thing. I think Stirling, J.'s, view is quite right, and I do not think that the cases referred to have really any bearing upon the present controversy.

I cannot help thinking, so far as the working out of these rules is concerned, the view taken by Cotton, L.J., in Berdan v. Greenwood, 26 W. R. 902, 3 Ex. D. 251, is right. That is to say, if the plaintiff goes on with this action for an injunction, or if the defendant goes on—if either goes on—and the plaintiff succeeds in establishing his right, there is no reason that I can conceive of why he should not get the costs of that controversy. Neither can I conceive why the defendant should not, if he is right—that being the real question—set up the custom of this manor; and to say that the custom of this manor cannot be investigated either now or hereafter because the plaintiff has taken this money in satisfaction of the damages is illogical and unreasonable, and altogether wrong.

RIGBY, L.J.—I agree with all that the Master of the Rolls has said, and I shall add only a few observations of my own. First of all I say that ord. 22, r. 1, is confined to the case of an action brought to recover damages. It does not mean that where an action is brought to establish a right, the consequences involved in rule 1 shall be that that right shall be established by the payment into court of money accompanied by a denial of liability. It would be very strange to me if it were so. I have no doubt that the money paid in here with a denial of liability was paid in respect of the action so far as it is an action for damages. That being so, I see really no difficulty on the construction of the rules as they stand. We were invited to consider several cases; but they are all distinguished from the present by the fact that down to the latest time before issuing the rules there was no such thing as payment of money into court which is now rendered legal along with a denial of liability. If you paid the money into court, it must be taken in satisfaction. Then the Judicature Act permitted of several inconsistent defences. The difficulty was first of all how to reconcile them. What they said in fact was, this is money paid in satisfaction. Another defence was denial of the right.

All the cases cited, so far as I can see, are absolutely and entirely right, and not in the least inconsistent with the new state of things that has permitted payment into court otherwise than in satisfaction along with denial of liability. It is contrary to the whole purport of the rule to suppose that a claim of right is settled because damages in respect of a past alleged infringement are settled by payment of the money and taking it out. I can see no reason, as far as I am concerned, why the plaintiff should not go on with his claim for right, and I can see no reason why the defendant should not go on with his counterclaim.

The result is, I consider Stirling, J., to have been right throughout, and as regards this appeal it is dismissed with costs.

WYATT v. PALMER. (a.)

Practice—Striking out statement of claim—Action to set aside judgment by default on ground of fraud—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 27, r. 15—Payment into court—Action for malicious presentation of bankruptcy petition—Allegation of special damage.

Notwithstanding the provisions of ord. 27, r. 15, which provides a short method of setting aside a judgment by default, an action to set aside such a judgment on the ground of fraud is still, subject to the discretion of the court as to costs, maintainable without leave. The court will not, therefore, strike out as frivolous the statement of claim in an action for that purpose, though it may order the plaintiff to pay into court the amount of the judgment impeached. Nor will the court strike out as frivolous a statement of claim in an action for damages in respect of bankruptcy proceedings maliciously taken, on the ground that it does not contain an allegation that the plaintiff has sustained special damage.

Appeal from Kennedy, J., at chambers.

The plaintiff in the above action, on the 14th of December, 1895, signed an agreement in writing by which he agreed the costs due by him to the defendant, a solicitor, for professional services, at £650, and executed an instrument of charge upon certain shares to secure that sum and interest.

In May, 1897, the solicitor delivered to the plaintiff two further bills of costs, amounting respectively to £275 3s. 9d. and £201 11s. 5d. for services alleged to have been rendered after the date of the agreement. In June, 1897, the solicitor commenced an action against the present plaintiff claiming payment (with certain small deductions) of those two further bills. The present plaintiff allowed judgment in that action to go by default, and on the 12th of July, 1897, judgment was entered for the solicitor accordingly for £221 1s. 8d. and costs.

On the 11th of November, 1897, the solicitor presented a bankruptcy petition against the present plaintiff, alleging that the plaintiff was indebted to him in the sum of £844 7s. 6d. for moneys due under the said agreement and the said judgment, and also alleging that the plaintiff had, with intent to defeat and delay his creditors, departed out of England on or about the 31st of July, 1897, and remained out of England till November.

On the 24th of March, 1898, the petition was dismissed, and the petitioner was ordered to pay the plaintiff's costs.

In March, 1898, the plaintiff commenced proceedings against the defendant to have the agreement set aside, and to have the defendant's costs and charges taxed. In July, 1898, an order was made setting aside the agreement and directing the defendant to deliver bills of the costs covered by the agreement. When the taxation took place and an account was taken between the plaintiff and the defendant it was found that there was due to the plaintiff a balance which (including the plaintiff's costs of the taxation payable by the defendant) amounted to £75 5s. 1d. This the defendant was ordered to pay to the plaintiff.

In February, 1899, the plaintiff commenced the present action against the defendant in the Queen's Bench Division claiming damages for the bankruptcy petition, which he alleged to have been presented falsely, maliciously and without reasonable and probable cause; that the judgment of July, 1897, which he alleged to have been fraudulently obtained, should be set aside; and that the bills of costs for £275 3s. 9d. and £201 11s. 5d. should be ordered to be taxed. The defendant applied that so much of the statement of claim as claimed damages for the malicious presentation of the petition should be struck out on the ground that without an averment of special damage it disclosed no reasonable cause of action; and that the remainder of the statement of claim should be struck out unless the money secured by the judgment was paid into court or secured. On the 11th of April, 1899, the master refused this application, and, on the 1st of May, Kennedy, J., at chambers, dismissed an appeal against the master's order, but gave leave to appeal. The defendant appealed accordingly.

It was stated that both the master and the learned judge expressed themselves inclined to stop the plaintiff's action, but considered that they were bound by the case of Cole v. Langford, [1898] 2 Q. B. 36, 46 W. R. Dig. 133, to decide otherwise.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Montague Lush, for the appeal.—An action to set aside a judgment by default will not lie. The proper procedure is under ord. 27, r. 15. The old practice, which required an affidavit of merits, was not altered by that rule. Leave to commence such an action is necessary: Flower v. Lloyd, 25 W. R. 793, at p. 794, 6 Ch. D. 297, at p. 300. The claim for damages for malicious bankruptcy proceedings is frivolous, because to support such an action in respect of civil proceedings, special damage must be proved: Cotterell v. Jones, 11 C. B. 713.

They also cited Cole v. Langford; Flower v. Lloyd, 27 W. R. 496, 10 Ch. D. 327; Baker v. Wadsworth, 67 L. J. Q B. 301; 46 W. R. Dig. 133; and Quartz Hill Consolidated Gold Mining Co. v. Eyre, 31 W. R. 668, 11 Q. B. D. 674.

Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie, for the plaintiff, were not called upon.

LINDLEY, M.R.—I do not think we should gain anything by taking further time to consider this case. It seems to me that it is certainly not a case for summarily striking out the statement of claim, which means putting an end to the plaintiff's action, on the ground that it is reasonably plain he has really no chance of success. I do not think we can at this stage say that the plaintiff here has no chance. I do not, of course, say anything about the merits of the dispute; but I do not think we can deal with the case on such a ground. The facts, so far as we have to consider them, are simple. Here is a judgment by default, which has been obtained by the present defendant against the present plaintiff. The present plaintiff has now brought an action to impeach that judgment on the ground of fraud. On behalf of the present defendant it is then said that that action will not lie. That proposition, I must say, was quite new to me as an equity lawyer, and I confess I was startled by it. I of course knew perfectly well that there were summary methods of getting rid of a judgment which had been obtained by default; but the broad proposition that a judgment by default could not be impeached by bill on the ground of fraud, certainly startled me. On refreshing my memory by reference to the books on pleading, I find that my first impression is right. In equity a judgment might be impeached by original bill without leave. Why, then, should not a judgment by default be so impeached? Suppose the default was of this sort—that a man was induced by fraud not to appear in the action, whereby judgment was got against him. To say that a judgment obtained in that way could not be impeached by an action would, I think, be quite wrong. I am not prepared to say that because the rules now provide a shorter method of setting aside a judgment by default, you cannot any longer have recourse to the old method. Although the old method of proceeding by bill is now called an action, the old jurisdiction to set aside a judgment by default has not been touched or taken away.

But there is another subordinate question. There being now a short method of doing, by an application which the court would grant only upon terms, what the plaintiff seeks to do by this action, it is worthy of consideration whether, if the plaintiff chooses not to avail himself of that procedure, but prefers to have recourse to the longer, more expensive, and more dilatory method of an action, he should not be put upon the same terms which the court would have imposed if he had adopted the shorter method—i.e., the terms of paying into court the amount of the judgment he seeks to set aside. But the answer to that question is that it would not be right here to order payment into court, because the defendant has himself admitted that he is a secured creditor. Therefore I pass over that part of the case, which, in view of the actual facts, it seems to me it is not necessary to consider. As a general proposition, it strikes me as dangerous and unadvisable for any court to stop summarily an action brought on the ground of fraud. An allegation of fraud is a very serious matter, and ought not to be made except where there is some adequate proof to substantiate it. But for us to say to the plaintiff that he shall not have an opportunity of substantiating such an allegation would not, in my opinion, be right.

Then there is another point which is less important. It is said that the plaintiff's action is frivolous so far as it is grounded upon a malicious proceeding in bankruptcy. It is said that an action would not lie for such a proceeding, even if malicious, without proof of special damage to the plaintiff. I do not know whether an action will lie or not; but even if it will not, it by no means follows that we can now declare the action to be frivolous. The suggestion that we can, does not at all commend itself to me. The question whether the plaintiff's action is maintainable on such a ground requires careful consideration, especially since the alteration in the law relating to bankruptcy which enables people who are not traders to be made bankrupt. To ask us summarily to stop this action and to strike out the statement of claim, or to do what is asked for here in the alternative, is plainly hopeless. A long argument would be necessary before we could ascertain what we ought to do. Now, applications of this kind ought to be made only for the purpose of stopping actions which are evidently frivolous. This action is one which must be tried on its merits, both on the questions of law and on the facts. In my opinion, therefore, this appeal ought to be dismissed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I agree. This case is certainly one in which we can arrive at a conclusion only by a consideration of both sides.

EDWARDS v. GODFREY. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers liability—Accidental injury to workman—Dismissal of action under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42)—Subsequent proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37).

Where a workman has brought an action against his employer to recover damages independently of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, for personal injuries caused by accident, and the action is dismissed, the workman cannot subsequently take proceedings to recover compensation under the Act of 1897 in respect of the same injuries, the only remedy being to apply, under section 1, sub-section 4, of the Act of 1887, as soon as the previous action was dismissed, to the court in which the action was tried to assess compensation under the Act of 1897.

Appeal from an award of the judge of the Wandsworth County Court under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The respondent, who was a workman in the employment of the appellant, was, on the 12th of September, 1898, injured by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment.

He brought an action against the appellant in the Wandsworth County Court to recover compensation, under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, when verdict and judgment were entered for the appellant.

The respondent did not then apply to the judge under section 1, sub-section 4, of the Compensation Act, 1897, to assess compensation under that Act, but subsequently took proceedings to recover compensation under the Act of 1897, and on the hearing before the judge of the Wandsworth County Court an award of 11s. a week was made in favour of the respondent.

Frank Gover, for the appellant.—The respondent having brought an action against the appellant under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, cannot take fresh proceedings to recover compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. Section 1, sub-section 2 (b), of the Act of 1897 gives a workman the option of taking proceedings under the Act of 1897 or of bringing an action independently of that Act, but he cannot take both proceedings. If an action is brought independently of the Act and fails, then by sub-section 4 the court in which the action is tried shall, if the plaintiff so choose, proceed to assess compensation under the Act of 1897, and in such case the costs of the action may be deducted from the compensation. This is the only mode in which a workman, who has brought an action against his employer to recover damages for personal injuries and failed, can get compensation under the Act of 1897 for those injuries. If the workman were allowed to take fresh proceedings under the Act of 1897, after having failed in his action, a great hardship would be inflicted on the employer, as the costs of the action could not be deducted from the compensation: Schedule I., clause 14. The claim under the Act of 1897 is therefore barred.

Colam, for the respondent.—The dominant idea in section 1, sub-section 2 (b), of the Act of 1897 is to prevent the common law liability of the employer or his liability under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, being taken away. This sub-section only refers to a case where there is negligence or a wilful act on the part of the employer or of some person for whose act or default the employer is responsible. But there is no provision that the workman may not take proceedings under the Act of 1897 after having failed in an action against his employer. The sub-section only says that the employer shall not be liable to "pay" compensation twice over. A double remedy is given, but not double compensation. Sub-section 4 does not apply, because the plaintiff in the action did not ask to have compensation under the Act of 1897 assessed. The claim therefore is not barred.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The respondent first brought an action against his employer under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880. In that action the respondent failed, the action being dismissed, and in ordinary circumstances that would have been an end of the matter, for in any other proceedings in respect of the same cause of action the employer could have pleaded res judicata. Subsequently, however, the respondent took fresh proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, in respect of the same cause of action, and an award was made in the respondent's favour. It is contended on behalf of the employer that the respondent, having exercised his option of taking proceedings independently of the Act of 1897, cannot now, when he has failed in those proceedings, revert back to the Act of 1897. Whether the respondent can do so or not depends upon section 1, sub-sections 2 (b) and 4, of the Act of 1897, and some light is thrown on the matter by clause 14 of Schedule I. Section 1, sub-section 2 (b), gives the workman the option in the circumstances there mentioned of proceeding under the Act or independently of it. In the present case the respondent exercised his option by bringing an action against the employer under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880. In that action he failed. In such a case sub-section 4 comes to the aid of the workman, and gives him an advantage when he has failed in the action—it gives him a locus penitentiæ—by empowering the court which has seisin of the action, if requested by the workman, to assess compensation under the Act of 1897. If it had not been for that sub-section the matter would have been res judicata. While giving the workman that benefit the sub-section confers a benefit also upon an employer by giving the court jurisdiction to deduct from the compensation awarded the costs caused by the workman having wrongly brought the action. This seems to me to be the true construction of the Act. Any other construction would entail serious consequences. If a workman, having failed in an action, could take fresh proceedings under the Act of 1897, the result would be that he would never apply under section 1, sub-section 4, to the court that tried the action to assess compensation under the Act of 1897, but would take fresh proceedings under the Act of 1897, when there would be no power to deduct the costs of the former action from the compensation awarded. The claim under the Act of 1897 is therefore barred, and the appeal must be allowed.

Company—Winding up—Proof—Costs of proceedings commenced before winding up—Contingent liability—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 35—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 37.

An application under section 35 of the Companies Act, 1862, to rectify the register and for a return of money paid is not a claim for unliquidated damages.

After a successful application to rectify the register of shareholders, sums paid by applicants for shares are provable debts in the liquidation of the company; and the costs of rectifying the register, being costs of obtaining an order without which the debts could not be recovered or admitted to proof, may properly be added to the provable debts.

Appeal from Wright, J.

In November, 1896, an application was made under section 35 of the Companies Act, 1862, by certain shareholders of the company that the costs incurred by them in proceedings taken before the winding up for the purpose of having their names removed from the register of shareholders might be paid by the liquidator. These shareholders had applied for shares on the faith of representations contained in the prospectus of the company and had, after allotment, commenced proceedings against the company for the purpose of having their names removed on the ground of misrepresentation.

Fifty-six shareholders had commenced proceedings against the company—two of these actions were proceeded with, the other fifty-four applicants consenting to postpone their claims till these two cases had been settled. No order was made that they should abide the result of the two actions which were to be tried, nor as to the costs of the actions which were to stand over. These two actions were successful, and these two shareholders' names were ordered to be removed from the register.

Before, however, the other fifty-four could proceed with their actions, in January, 1898, a petition was presented and a compulsory winding-up order was made against the company.

The liquidator admitted their right to have their names removed from the register, and admitted the liability of the company to repay the money they had given for their shares. They now claimed the right to be repaid the costs they had incurred in the actions commenced when the company was a going concern. This the liquidator opposed on the ground that the bankruptcy rule applied to a winding up, and that costs incurred in proceedings before bankruptcy cannot be proved, and that therefore the applicants were not entitled to add such costs, which did not come within section 37 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, to the amount of their debt.

On the matter being referred to Wright, J., his lordship held that the liquidator should add to the debts the taxed costs incurred before the winding up, and that the applicants might prove for the same in the winding up of the company.

Section 37 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, enacts as follows: "(1) Demands in the nature of unliquidated damages arising otherwise than by reason of a contract, promise, or breach of trust shall not be provable in bankruptcy. (2) A person having notice of any act of bankruptcy available against the debtor shall not prove under the order for any debt or liability contracted by the debtor subsequently to the date of his so having notice. (3) Save as aforesaid, all debts and liabilities, present or future, certain or contingent, to which the debtor is subject at the date of the receiving order, or to which he may become subject before his discharge by reason of any obligation incurred before the date of the receiving order, shall be deemed to be debts provable in bankruptcy."

The liquidator appealed.

Gore-Browne, for the appellant.—This is not a debt or liability, present or future, or contingent, within the meaning of the Act. Until there is an order for payment of costs it is not a liability, and after a winding-up order the costs cannot be proved for. Prior to 1875 the question would have been governed by section 158 of the Companies Act, 1862, where no distinction was made between debts incurred before and after bankruptcy; that is now cut down by section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, in the case of an insolvent company: Ex parte Bluck, 35 W. R. 720, 57 L. T. Rep. 419.

Kenyon Parker, for the respondents.—I rely upon section 35 of the Companies Act, 1862, under which my application was made. The Bankruptcy Act has nothing to do with it; but even if it has, this is a contingent liability which can be proved for.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 13.—The written judgment of the court was delivered by

LINDLEY, M.R., who stated the facts and continued: Upon carefully examining section 37 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and the decisions upon it and corresponding sections in earlier Bankruptcy Acts, I am satisfied that the order appealed from is correct.

The 10th section of the Judicature Act, 1875, has rendered section 37 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the enactment by which the question must be determined; section 158 of the Companies Act, 1862, is no longer the governing section in a case like this. The decisions on section 37 have established the following rules which are consistent and reasonable and quite in accordance with the language of the section. If an action is brought against a person who afterwards becomes bankrupt for the recovery of a sum of money and the action is successful, the costs are regarded as an addition to the sum recovered and to be provable if that is provable, but not otherwise. If, therefore, what is recovered is unliquidated damages "arising otherwise than by reason of a contract, promise, or breach of trust" that sum is not recoverable unless judgment, or at least a verdict for it has been obtained before adjudication, or, now, the receiving order; and if the sum recovered is not provable, neither are the costs of recovering it: In re Newman, Ex parte Brooke, 25 W. R. 261, 3 Ch. D. 494; In re Bluck. On the other hand if what is recovered is provable so are the costs of recovering it: see Emma Silver Mining Co. v. Grant, 29 W. R. 481, 17 Ch. D. 122. If the action against a person who becomes bankrupt is unsuccessful no costs become payable by him or out of his estate, and no question as to them can arise. But if an unsuccessful action is brought by a man who becomes bankrupt, then, if he is ordered to pay the costs, or if a verdict is given against him before he becomes bankrupt, they are provable: Ex parte Peacock, 23 W. R. 755, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 682. On the other hand, if no verdict is given against him and no order is made for payment of costs until after he becomes bankrupt, they are not provable. In such a case there is no provable debt to which the costs are incident, and there is no liability to pay them by reason of any obligation incurred by the bankrupt before bankruptcy, nor are they a contingent liability to which he can be said to be subject at the date of his bankruptcy. This was the case of Vint v. Hudspith, 33 W. R. 738, 30 Ch. D. 24.

An application under section 35 of the Companies Act, 1862, to rectify the register and for a return of money paid is not a claim for unliquidated damages. It is a claim for two things—viz., first, for the removal of an impediment which prevents the demand for a return of the money from being successful; and, secondly, it is a demand for the repayment of a liquidated sum, and not for unliquidated damages. The register being rectified, the sums paid by the applicants are clearly provable debts, and the costs of rectifying the register are costs of obtaining an order without which these debts cannot be recovered or admitted to proof. The costs are, therefore, properly added to the debts provable. It is hardly necessary to add that the ordinary bankruptcy rule by which the costs of proving debts in bankruptcy have to be borne by the proving creditors (Schedule II., rule 6) has no application to such costs as are in question here. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Divorce — Wife's petition — Answer alleging wife's adultery with third party, and no claim for cross-relief — Co-respondent — Intervention — Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 28—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1866 (29 Vict. c. 32), s. 2.

If, on the presentation of a petition for divorce, a respondent merely puts in an answer to the petition asking that the petition shall be dismissed and no further relief, the intervention of a third party, whose name has been mentioned in the answer, is not permissible. He can only intervene if the answer claims such further relief as would admit of the answer being treated as a cross-petition.

Harrop v. Harrop, [1899] P. 61, approved.

Appeal from Jeune, P.

A wife presented a petition praying for the dissolution of her marriage on the ground of her husband's adultery and cruelty. The husband, in his answer, denied the charges brought against him, and alleged that the wife had committed adultery with a gentleman whom he named. He asked simply for the wife's petition to be dismissed, and claimed no further relief. The gentleman charged with adultery with the wife denied the charge on oath, and took out a summons for leave to intervene in the suit.

The summons being adjourned into court, Jeune, P., said that no case had been cited in which leave to intervene had been granted, unless the applicant had some direct pecuniary interest in the suit, and such was not the case here. Personally, he should be very glad to see a right of intervention given to anyone whose name was introduced into a suit. Being bound by the authorities, he must dismiss the application.

By section 28 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, "Upon any such petition presented by a husband the petitioner shall make the alleged adulterer a co-respondent to the said petition, unless on special grounds, to be allowed by the court, he shall be excused from so doing; and on every petition presented by a wife for dissolution of marriage the court, if it see fit, may direct that the person with whom the husband is alleged to have committed adultery be made a respondent." By section 2 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1866, "In any suit instituted for dissolution of marriage, if the respondent shall oppose the relief sought, on the ground, in case of such a suit instituted by a husband, of his adultery, cruelty, or desertion, or in case of such a suit instituted by a wife, on the ground of her adultery or cruelty, the court may in such suit give to the respondent, on his or her application, the same relief to which he or she would have been entitled in case he or she had filed a petition seeking such relief."

The applicant appealed.

Carson, Q.C., and Barnard, for the appellant.—It is not right that this charge of adultery should be tried in the appellant's absence. By section 2 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1866, the court may treat an answer to a petition as if it were a cross-petition, and may give the same relief as might have been given had a cross-petition been presented. The contention on the other side is that, if a respondent asks for any other relief beyond a dismissal of the petition against him a third party may intervene; but if he asks simply for a dismissal of the petition on grounds stated, a third party, although his name is mentioned, may not intervene. This cannot have been the intention of the Legislature.

They referred to Wheeler v. Wheeler and Rhodes, 14 P. D. 154, 38 W. R. Dig. 71; Grieve v. Grieve, [1893] P. 288; and Harrop v. Harrop, [1899] P. 61.

Inderwick, Q.C., and Willock, for the respondent.—In the old ecclesiastical cases there is no case in which any alleged adulterer, man or woman, has been a party to the suit either on his own application or originally. A party was only allowed to intervene where he or she had some direct pecuniary interest in the suit. Here the husband is only defending himself; he does not attack the third party, nor does he wish to have the marriage dissolved.

Barnard, in reply.—There was a recent case, not reported, in which leave to intervene was given under precisely similar circumstances. The Queen's Proctor cannot intervene until after decree: the appellant ought not to be forced to wait until after a decree has been made before he has an opportunity of defending himself.

LINDLEY, M.R.—I do not think we shall gain anything by taking time to consider this case. We have considered the sections and arguments carefully, and it seems to me that we cannot disturb the judgment appealed against. There appears to me to be a crying injustice in investigating in public the conduct of a person who is accused of adultery without his being able to defend himself. The present state of things has grown up out of the practice of the old Ecclesiastical Courts in cases of divorce. The inquiry in such cases was not technically a private inquiry, but there were no jury, no witnesses, and no scandal, and it did not take place under any statute. It was not really a trial, but only an inquiry into the conduct of the husband and wife with other people, and nothing was heard about it; but now that is all altered. Everything is in public; and the injury is enormous, and very great and serious injustice is done to a person whose conduct is assailed with the publicity of modern times, when he is not able to say a word in his defence. That, however, is for the Legislature, not for us.
